When the affairs of any community are managed in this way, it scarcely needs to be said that they soon fall into confusion. Want of method may be democratic, but it is not business-like. Quincy proved no exception to the rule. In 1870 government by town-meeting was there plainly breaking down. A general laxity in ways of doing public business had crept into all the departments. The school committee, the surveyors of highways, the overseers of the poor, the engineers of the fire department were in the custom of asking for such appropriations as they thought sufficient. If in the hurly-burly of town-meeting these were voted, it was well and good. Those who had the disbursements to make would then keep within the sum allotted them, provided they were under no special temptation to exceed it. If the whole amount asked for was not voted, it would be spent all the same; and the town found itself liable for the bills its agents had contracted. There was no great amount of jobbery and scarcely any corruption, except in the small and more contemptible way; but the soil was being rapidly prepared both for jobbery and corruption. The growth of a municipal "ring," the members of which would live on taxpayers just as parasites live on dogs, was a mere question of time. The laborer who worked on the roads, the pauper who lived at home while the town paid his rent, the tradesman who supplied the pensioned poor, all began to feel a direct interest in the growth of bad government. As yet the evil had made no great headway, but the sense of official responsibility and obedience to instructions was already relaxed. Officers were disposed to do what seemed in their own eyes "about right," regardless of rule; and the town good-naturedly condoned the offense. The result was that the finances fell into confusion. Every year a liberal appropriation would be made to reduce the town debt, but each year saw that debt grow larger. It rose in this way from $8000 in 1844 to $112,000 in 1874, and a committee then reported that it represented an outlay incurred neither for educational or war or other special purposes. It was a pure deficiency debt. The money time and again raised to pay it off had been regularly diverted, and applied to those ordinary purposes, the amount spent on account of which regularly exceeded the sums appropriated by the town.

Such were the facts. It remained to find a remedy. This remedy was found not in a representative city government, but in a return to the old and correct town-meeting methods; and in this matter the experience of Quincy might be of value to her sister-towns, for many of them have already found themselves, and others yet will find themselves, in the same position. The younger John Quincy Adams had then for years been chosen by common consent as the moderator of all town-meetings at which he was present. Mortified at the way in which business was done and at his own inability to preserve order, he announced a reform. In 1870, when the town came together at the annual meeting, after the polls for the choice of officers were closed the hall was ordered to be cleared and seats brought in. Then, after the vote was declared, the articles in the warrant were taken up, but not until every voter was uncovered and seated, and pipes and cigars extinguished. Order was thus established, and deliberation became possible. This was a great step gained; but more was necessary. The warrant had now grown to thirty, and even forty articles, all of which were acted upon in the single evening of a day which had been occupied with voting. The townsmen were tired, excited, noisy, and in no mood to do business. Accordingly, in 1874 a new step was taken, and the town went fairly back to that old system which had been abandoned more than twenty years before. When at the annual meeting officers were elected, it was also voted to refer all the business articles in the warrant to a large committee, which was to subdivide itself, investigate everything, and at an adjourned meeting report its conclusions in the form of votes properly drawn up. These the town would then consider.

The result of this return to business-like methods was remarkable. The town-meeting at once showed itself equal to the occasion. After 1874 every question was again fairly considered and acted upon intelligently, with full opportunity for debate; the appropriations were carefully made, and all officers required to keep the expenses within them; a responsible government was established. Then, as if by magic, the finances assumed shape. The debt which for nearly half a century had defied every effort to extinguish it, now fell in nine years from $112,000 to $19,000, and then shortly disappeared. Deficiencies were met by special appropriations; exceptional outlays were distributed over a series of years; rigid accountability was established. This was done through an intelligent development of the ancient village system; and it is probably safe to assert that never in the two centuries and a half of town history had that system worked so well, or to such general satisfaction, as during these years when Quincy had grown in wealth and population to city limits.

Nor did the reform in town methods stop here. It extended itself into other fields. The work done at this time in the schools has already been described. But while Mr. Parker was busy in one way there, another man was busy in a very different way elsewhere. In the days of John Adams it has been seen that Braintree did not enjoy a reputation for temperance. His labors in that field of reform, and the poor results derived from them, have been referred to. As time passed on the state of things hardly seems to have improved; and the large foreign element which the working of syenite brought into the town tended to make it distinctly worse. The Washingtonian movement made some headway before 1840; but, even then, when a temperance convention was to be held in Quincy, the use of the stone church was refused it. Mr. Adams being invited to deliver an address before that convention, accepted; and then, to their dismay, the parish authorities found that they had shut the ex-President out of his own church. It was too late to retract, and the address on temperance was delivered elsewhere. It was at this time that the town voted (117 to 81) "to discontinue the use of ardent spirits at the almshouse;" but still, and for several years to come, the post-office was in the bar-room of the principal tavern, and thither, among drinking men, daily went women and little girls and boys to have letters and papers handed to them across a counter which reeked of rum. Then came the period of anti-slavery education, and the minds and thoughts of all were absorbed in that. At last, when the Rebellion was suppressed, it is not too much to say that, through its peculiarities of position, population and labor, Quincy was a stronghold of the liquor interest. Indeed, peace was scarcely established, and the wave of sectional feeling had not yet begun to subside, before the town was again Democratic. In 1867 it gave J. Q. Adams 650 votes, to 348 which it cast for the Republican ticket. For a town to be Democratic on State issues and Republican on national issues—and that was the position of Quincy—meant then but one thing. It meant intemperance. The foreign vote combined with the Democratic vote, and, having the ascendancy, decreed that unrestrained sale of spirits against which John Adams had so manfully contended.

Where such an evil exists, some man is very sure soon to rise up and protest against it. In Quincy that man appeared in the person of one descended from the oldest of North Precinct stock, for the name of Faxon is met with on many pages of the town records, and can be found on not a few head-stones in the old graveyard. Henry H. Faxon was a man of many peculiarities. Into these it is not necessary to enter. It is sufficient here to say that he became deeply interested in the cause of temperance. Perhaps it would be more correct to say in the cause of total abstinence; for in the virtue of temperance, whether in drink or speech, he had but limited faith. Very imperfectly educated, Mr. Faxon was not conspicuous for dignity of bearing; and as a public speaker his deliverances were more noted for directness and frequency than for eloquence or correctness of speech. He was known to address the audience forty times at a single annual town-meeting, and hardly once in those forty times did his remarks fail to elicit laughter, cheers, or hisses. That he was deficient in judgment it is hardly necessary to say. Yet, though often exciting unnecessary opposition and ridicule by his methods and the way with which in place and out of place he advocated the reform he had come to have at heart, he clung to it with a tenacity sure to produce results. Many at first doubted his sincerity, but he showed that he was in earnest by the freedom with which he contributed his labor, his time, and his money. His attacks on individuals were so open, public, and fearless that from the mouth of any one else they would have been sure to lead to blows. Once they did so in his case; and he was often threatened. Much of his security lay probably in the fact that he was not malignant. Indeed, he was good-natured in his enmities. He did not lose his temper, and become ugly and bitter under defeat; nor did he follow up wrongs or slights in any spirit of revenge.

He had apparently none of that brooding desire to "get even," as it is expressed, with a successful opponent, which is always the characteristic of small, vindictive, and sour-tempered men. Under these circumstances, while in town-meeting, and not without cause, his opponents laughed and jeered at him and hustled him, yet he laughed and jeered in return. So Yankee met Yankee; but his work went on. It was a long, hard fight. Not only was a sentiment of reform to be roused, but a strong business and political combination had to be broken down. The town had become in a certain way a liquor-selling centre, and, as usual, the thing had worked its way into local politics. The reputation of the place suffered. John Adams noted down in 1760 that to be "as litigious as Braintree" had become a common expression; so now it was said that other towns were "as intemperate as Quincy." It was spoken of as "a hard place," and the stone-cutting population was held accountable for it. The evils of the thing also were keenly felt in many households. Mothers and fathers saw their young sons falling into drunken ways. But it had always been so, and the political combination which favored the continuance of the system was very strong. The Democratic leaders controlled the foreign vote, and the liquor interest had a complete understanding with the Democratic leaders. The foreign vote was thus juggled into perpetuating a system under which those whom it represented suffered more than any others in the community.

So things went on year after year. But as wealth and population increased it grew plain that it was not only a question of temperance. The cause of good and honest municipal government was also involved. The condition of affairs in this respect already described was rapidly growing from bad to worse. No reform in town-meeting methods would suffice unless the dominant combination was broken down. Then Mr. Faxon found new and potent allies, and suddenly the town was revolutionized. In March, 1881, a Democratic and liquor licensing board of selectmen was, as usual, chosen. That same year, largely through the efforts of Mr. Faxon, the law of the State was changed so that the question whether "licenses be granted for the sale of intoxicating liquors in this town" was presented squarely to the voters. The result was astonishing. In 1882 there were 1057 who voted "No," to 475 who voted "Yes." When the thing was presented in this plain way the issue was understood, and the foreign vote broke from Democratic control. At the same time the friends of good government and temperance came together. The town-meeting had been reformed, and now the barroom was closed. But the length of the struggle against the last is worthy of record. It largely exceeded a century; for in 1760, John Adams described himself, to use his own words, as discharging his venom "against the multitude, poverty, ill government, and ill effects of licensed houses, and the timorous temper, as well as criminal design of the selectmen" who licensed them; but not until 1882, one hundred and twenty-two years later, did his local successor in that crusade close, at least for the time being, the last of those houses in Quincy.

In the "Memoirs of John Quincy Adams" there is a striking passage wherein he records his boding thoughts as he wandered about his native town one day near the close of October in the year 1844. He was then an old man, for it was hard upon seventy years since he had, as a boy, served as post-riding between Braintree and Boston. Anxious, despondent, overworked, he at this time had just received the tidings of those earlier elections which indicated the choice of Polk as President, foreshadowing the annexation of Texas and the spread of slavery. He looked upon his own re-election to Congress as improbable. Engaged in bitter political controversy, nearing his own end, he foresaw more clearly than others the terrible trials which did indeed then remotely impend over the country. It was the month of October, and the time and the solitude quickened his feelings. He thus described them:

"I took a walk round the garden, nursery, and orchard. The desolation of the season cast a gloom on my spirits. The fruit has been gathered from all the trees. The ground is strewn with sere red and yellow leaves; it is wet and gathered in clods. Most of the large trees are mere stems, stripped of all their leaves. I hastened in from this prospect. Again, as the sun went down, I walked up the hill to Charles' house,¹ to see the sunset. But, although it was not quite five o'clock, the sun was already behind Mount Ararat. I went further over the hill, and surveyed the village, the surrounding country, the harbor and bay of Boston, the State-House of Boston itself, and the shaft of Bunker Hill Monument; and memory returned to the fact that this day eighty years ago² my father and mother were united in marriage. What an ordo sventorum commenced for me from that day! What was then the condition of the people who constituted the town of Braintree? What is the condition of the three towns of Quincy, Braintree, and Randolph now? And what will be the condition of the occupiers of the soil of these three towns in eighty years from this day? The recollection of the past is pleasing and melancholy; the prospect of the future—oh, how gloomy it is! Not a soul now lives who was then in the bloom of life. Not a soul now living will be here in 1924. My own term—how soon it will close! And to whom will all this belong in eighty years from this day? Will prayer to God preserve the branches and shoots from my father's stock?"

One-half of the allotted period thus sadly forecast is already gone. Nor was it without reason, in the autumn of 1844, that to the trained eye of the old statesman the future seemed gloomy, for over it clouds both thick and black were then already gathering. His were no idle forebodings, for better than any one else he realized what those clouds portended. What he feared came about. At last that slavery question on which his whole mind was intent ripened into war,—a civil war which involved his native place and his family, even as it and he had been involved in his own early youth. But all in good time each new danger was met and overcome by those who succeeded him, just as he and his had met and overcome their dangers in the past. And now that forty years have elapsed, it may fairly and truthfully be said that Quincy has not before met better days. There is also a stability and permanence in the town which in America is not always seen. It adheres to the ancient ways. The inhabitants yet meet in their own hall and manage their own affairs as did their fathers for generations before. And just as, a century and a half ago, John Quincy by common consent presided over each town-meeting that was held, so now does a descendant five generations removed, but still bearing his name. Never in the history of the town were those meetings more orderly, more intelligent, or more prone to do right. Never was the town so populous, so rich, or so temperate. It is now more than two hundred and sixty years since Miles Standish first set foot on the Squantum beach, and six years only are wanting to complete a quarter of a millennium of continuous municipal life. Two centuries and a half is no small portion of recorded history, and there are few forms of human government to which a longer existence is given. It is hardly to be expected that the old simple village system, even in its most developed shape, can in Quincy long outlast that period. But none the less, whatever the future may have in store, it may fairly be said that never did the town contain within its limits so many prosperous, well-to-do, contented, self-governed, and well-governed human beings as are contained within them to-day. Never was the standard of virtue, temperance, education, and public spirit so high. Never did Quincy face the coming years with such confidence in its own ability to master each new difficulty as it shall arise. As in 1844, "the recollection of the past is pleasing;" but in 1884 "the prospect of the future" cannot be said to be "gloomy."

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

THOMAS ADAMS.

Thomas Adams, for many years sheriff of Norfolk County, was born in Quincy (then Braintree), April 19, 1804. He had but the educational advantages of the farmers' boys of the period of his youth, but what they supplied him was retained and used with profit during his life. He married Mehetabel, daughter of Joseph and Relief (Baxter) Field, April 4, 1826. (She was born Jan. 3, 1804.) He early became identified as a political worker with the Whig party, and received the appointment of deputy-sheriff, for which office he possessed great qualifications, and whose duties he discharged to the perfect satisfaction of the people. He was continued a long time as deputy, and so much were his services demanded, that he relinquished all other business, removed from Quincy to Roxbury in 1842, and was prominent in official relations. Marked and decided in his character, positive and energetic in his nature, he showed such adaptability to the duties devolving upon him, that when placed in nomination for high sheriff he was elected by a very flattering vote, which also continued him for many years in this office. Probably no resident of the county was better fitted for this position than Mr. Adams. He was popular, quite humorous, could both tell and enjoy a good story, had a large circle of friends among the best men of both political creeds, and united with a gentlemanly bearing and fine personal presence undaunted courage and rapidity of execution. He felt all the dignity of his office and sustained it well, but ever softened the sharp edges of his duty by his kindness and humanity toward those upon whom he was forced to execute his power. To this end he often took responsibilities from which weaker men would have shrunk. Ex-Governor Gaston relates the following instance of his kindness of heart: "One Saturday a man was remanded to his custody until Monday. Mr. Adams turning to him, asked, 'Do you want to be with your family over Sunday?' The man answered 'Yes.' 'Go home, then, and be here when court opens,' said Mr. Adams. The man went joyfully, and was prompt in his attendance at the opening of court on Monday."

Such characteristics as these did not fail to give him a large personal following of friends. Outside of his official duties, he was an able business man, a valued member of the Sagamore Club, an excellent citizen, and acquired wealth. He was very hospitable, and was noted for his kindness in aiding young men both by his counsels and monetary assistance. During the Rebellion he filled numerous contracts for horses for the government. For this he was well qualified, as he had a great love for and skill in selecting fine horses. He was the original inceptor, and became one of the incorporators and directors of the Rockland Bank, now Rockland National Bank, Roxbury, with which he was identified until his death, which occurred Jan. 2, 1869. Mrs. Adams, who survives him, is an amiable lady of gentle and unassuming manners, possessing the same kindness of heart toward the poor and unfortunate as Mr. Adams, and is noted for her benevolence and charity.

JAMES A. STETSON, M.D.

James A. Stetson, M.D., son of Maj. Amos Stetson, was born in Braintree, Dec. 28, 1806. He acquired a classical education and was graduated at Columbia College, New York, and afterwards studied medicine at the Harvard Medical School. He came to Quincy about 1830, not long after his graduation, and established himself as a physician. His agreeable manners and well-founded medical knowledge soon made him popular among all classes, and at the time of his marriage he had built up a fine practice. He married, Nov. 10, 1842, Abigail F., oldest daughter of Josiah Brigham, of Quincy. Their children are Josiah B. and James H. Josiah B. is a teacher of vocal and instrumental music in Boston. James H. is a salesman and commercial traveler, and is in the employ of a Boston wholesale firm.

As a physician Dr. Stetson was skillful and successful, possessing great judgment and decision which always inspired confidence in him; kind, charitable, and faithful, he was ever ready to attend the calls of the poor, and never required a fee if he thought they were unable to pay for his services.

At the time of his decease, which occurred March 15, 1880, he was the oldest practicing physician in Norfolk County, having been the representative physician of Quincy for about half a century. He had a very extensive practice, and not until failing health, some ten years before his death, warned him that his labors were too engrossing and fatiguing, did he commence to relinquish his work to younger physicians.

Politically Dr. Stetson was a Democrat, and at one time he was elected to represent the town in the General Court, but aside from that, we believe held no public office. His religious belief was that of the Unitarians. As a physician, citizen, and friend, Dr. Stetson won all hearts by his unpretentious goodness, unassuming manners, fidelity, and probity. Probably no man ever lived in Quincy who had a larger circle of strong personal friends. He was a highly respected member of the Massachusetts Medical Society, and kept himself well versed in everything pertaining to the advancement of his chosen profession. He was well read in the current literature of the day, and always deeply interested in the progress of art and discoveries of science. His clearness of mental vision gave strength to all his convictions. His opinions were not hastily formed, but were tenaciously held, and, when occasion offered, fearlessly expressed, whether upon social, political, or religious subjects. If his prejudices were sometimes strong, they were not invincible, for he was open to argument, and candid in weighing the reasons of his opponents. His independence of nature made him superior to the love of popularity and to the pursuit of it, and kept him through life (with one exception) from taking public place or official position. He was impatient of all that was vulgar and pretentious, intolerant of deception, prevarication, and meanness. His dislike of ostentation led him to veil beneath a somewhat cold exterior a generosity of character and a tenderness of feeling which were among his most striking traits, and which will be borne witness to by all who were admitted to the intimacy of his friendship. He was a sincere Christian, one of the firmest of friends, and one of the most thoroughly honest and upright of men.

HENRY HARDWICK FAXON.

Henry Hardwick Faxon, son of Job and Judith B. (Hardwick) Faxon, was born in Quincy, Mass., Sept. 28, 1823. He is a descendant in the eighth generation of Thomas Faxon, who came, with his wife, daughter, and two sons, from England to America previous to 1647, and settled in that part of Braintree now Quincy. He consequently represents one of the oldest New England families in this section.

Job Faxon was quite an extensive farmer, owning and managing, in connection with his farm, a stall in Quincy Market, Boston, for many years, and leaving at his death an estate of forty thousand dollars.

J. A. Stetson.

Henry H. Fayon.

Henry passed his youth on the farm, with merely common-school advantages for education. He was apprenticed to learn the shoemaker's trade when about sixteen, and during his five years' experience became thoroughly conversant with the manufacture of all parts of a boot and shoe. In 1843, in company with his brother John, he began manufacturing boots and shoes principally for the Boston and Baltimore markets. About 1846 he changed his business, opening a retail grocery and provision store in Quincy, which he conducted for about seven years. During the last three years of that time he carried on a bakery, and also was a real-estate and merchandise auctioneer. His temperament was too active, however, to be confined within the comparatively narrow limits of country trade, and he became a retail grocer at the corner of South and Beach Streets, Boston, the firm-name being "Faxon, Wood & Co." Two years later he, with his brothers, moved to Commercial Street, changing the title of the firm to "Faxon Brothers & Co.," and the business to wholesale transactions exclusively. In 1861, retiring from the firm, Mr. Faxon went to New Orleans and made large purchases of molasses, shipping it to his former partners. Returning to Boston the next year, he engaged in speculating on Chatham Street, and subsequently located on India Wharf. Here he operated largely in chicory, kerosene oil, raisins, spices, and everything in the way of staple merchandise upon which he could realize a profit. At this time Mr. Faxon had given no special thought to temperance matters, and was not himself a "total abstainer." Anticipating the rise in the price of liquors on account of an increase of duty, he purchased several hundred barrels of whiskey and rum, and held them for the expected advance. The result proved the accuracy of his judgment. This is the transaction upon which Mr. Faxon's bibulous opponents have founded the essentially false charge, so often heard, that he "made his money selling rum," the intention being to convey the impression that the temperance campaigner was at one time in his life distinctively a liquor-seller.

Relinquishing speculation, he dealt in real estate on a large scale, and it was in this that he made the bulk of his fortune. He purchased for the most part at auction, and through careful management cleared great amounts of money. He is now the largest real-estate owner in Quincy, where he has about one hundred tenants, besides having nearly the same number in Boston and Chelsea. He married, Nov. 18, 1852, Mary B., daughter of Israel W. and Priscilla L. (Burbank) Munroe. They have one child, Henry Munroe, born May 22, 1864.

Mr. Faxon was chosen to represent Quincy in the State Legislature, as a Republican, in 1864 and 1871. With these exceptions, Mr. Faxon has never held public office, save his present peculiar one of "Special Police," to enforce the laws relative to the sale of intoxicating liquors in Quincy. A man of rare judgment, of irrepressible energy, he has "hewed to the line" of an unshaken purpose. His life is of a type rarely found elsewhere than in America—a noteworthy manifestation of that tireless, ceaseless, sleepless effort, ending only at death, which seems to characterize our people, and which strikes thoughtful foreigners with astonishment. As a business man, Mr. Faxon seemed to know intuitively the state of future as well as current markets; and the boldness of his operations, and the manner of his purchases, though unerringly clear to himself, seemed to others audacious, even wild and reckless, and astounded his associates by their successful issues. As a legislator, Mr. Faxon looked keenly to the best interests of his constituents. His attention was first attracted to the temperance question while a member of the Legislature. He voted for all measures tending to restrict the sale of intoxicating liquors.

This action on his part was met with fierce denunciation by the advocates of license, which caused Mr. Faxon to thoroughly investigate the liquor traffic in all its phases. He soon saw the enormity of the evil, and its destructive effects upon society. He immediately adopted the principles of prohibition, and has since devoted himself untiringly to the temperance cause. It is in connection with this movement that he has become so widely and prominently known. He became at once one of the acknowledged leaders of the temperance forces of Massachusetts, and inaugurated a bold, aggressive policy of active and vigorous war on intemperance wherever intrenched. "Through the pulpit, the Sunday-schools, the press, the conventions, the polls, he has assailed the traffic in intoxicating liquors with an uncompromising spirit. He has treated with defiant scorn that political policy which has so often betrayed the friends of prohibitory legislation. Consequently he has encountered much opposition, personal abuse, and misrepresentation of motives; but his courage, consistency, and perseverance are unyielding. His entire freedom from sectarian bigotry, and his Christian integrity, place the purity of his motives beyond question, and render ineffectual the attacks of those who find his sincerity unsuited to their political purposes."

Mr. Faxon has applied the same methods to his temperance work that were so successful in his business career. He has never attempted to use his principles as levers to elevate himself to office, but has persistently refused to be a candidate for any position. To use his own words, "I want it distinctly understood that it is not for office or honor that I take so active a part in politics, but for the satisfaction of doing what I consider my political duty." He has no affiliation with any third-party movement, holding the Republican party as the most reliable medium for reform, and constantly endeavoring, through it, to accomplish the reforms so imperatively demanded by the interests of society; but he has often been severely censured by its leaders for ignoring party lines. He says, "I do not care for parties, but only for the principles which govern them; and I have been free in the past to condemn the action of the party to which I am allied, and to bolt nominations, and defeat its candidates, when the good of the people demanded it. I am content to stand between the two great political parties, with my prohibition club, and, in case of an emergency, knock the life out of one or both, unless they accept the issue."

Mr. Faxon has used his wealth without stint in aiding the temperance cause, and this has sustained the Reform Clubs in various parts of Massachusetts. During the year when the Reform Club movement was at its height his gifts averaged fifty dollars per day. In Quincy, his home, he has done a noble work. Faxon Hall, a permanent memorial to his name, was erected in 1876, for the Reform Club of Quincy. This, with its furniture, cost eleven thousand dollars, of which he paid more than four-fifths. His zeal and independent political ability have placed him at the head of the prohibitory forces of Massachusetts, and made him a prominent factor in State politics. A State Republican Convention without him and his prohibitory resolutions would be a grateful surprise to politicians. He keeps a keen eye on the legislative proceedings, and is personally in attendance at nearly every day's session, working with unremitting zeal to advance temperance legislation. He is the bête noire of the politicians of both political parties, who have pretty well settled it that Mr. Faxon is a disturber of the peace, often upsetting the calculations of machine politicians. Probably the most effective bombshell ever dropped in their ranks was the tabulated position of each member of the State Senate and House of Representatives on the temperance question, which was published by him first in 1880, in the Boston Herald, and in numberless pamphlets, as a guide for temperance voters. This was a keen stroke of policy, and resulted so well that it was continued, with the regularity of an almanac, for three years, when, in consequence of the small number of "Yea" and "Nay" votes (which form the basis of the report) taken during the legislative session of 1883, Mr. Faxon was forced to suspend its issue.

Mr. Faxon has formulated his political creed in the following:

"It may appear presumptuous in the writer to dictate, as some express it, to the great party of the State and Nation; but if the Republican party hopes for success in the future, it has got to adopt certain principles, and carry them out without fear or favor.

"1st. The colored voter in the Southern States must be protected. For every negro hung, shot, or deprived of his rights, hang or shoot the white rebel guilty of depriving him of such rights.

"Having given the negroes the right of suffrage, it is the imperative duty of the government to see that they are defended, if it takes a standing army to do it.

"I do not believe that any person, with very rare exceptions, should have the right to wield the ballot until he or she can read it, and understand its importance.

"Thousands of politicians in the country admit this fact, but they dare not express it from the platform or over their signatures, for fear it will hurt their political futures.

"2d. The naturalization laws must be enforced and obeyed, so that the rights of native-born and honest naturalized citizens shall not be trodden upon by foreign-born tramps and criminals, who have cast odium and reproach upon those who are upright.

"If I understand it correctly, there are many foreigners made voters through the instrumentalities of false oaths, and other devices, who have not the requisite qualifications entitling them to the right of citizenship. The laws, if enforced, will protect the honestly-naturalized equally with the native-born citizen. No man can find fault with that doctrine.

"3d. The payment of poll taxes. The power to procure by purchase the votes of a low class of bummers and drunkards, ought to be stopped by legal enactments.

"It is dangerous for the welfare of any community to be controlled by a class of voters who have not ambition enough to pay their own poll taxes. I will venture to make the assertion that nine-tenths of those whose poll taxes are paid by charity spend yearly for rum and tobacco thirty times as much as their taxes amount to.

"4th. The Republican party must adopt the principles of temperance, however heavy the burden may be to bear. There are more than seventy thousand voters in this Commonwealth who are in sympathy with the cause, and are determined to press it, in some form or another, into their political creed; and there is a proportionate number in many other States in the Union.

"5th. Women must have the power to wield the ballot; and that privilege will have to be advanced and obtained through the Republican party. The mothers and daughters of Massachusetts have the undeniable right to a voice in this matter, and it will be an honor to any organization or party that shall aid women in their desire to help control the affairs of government."

Mr. Faxon considers the press a powerful agent in temperance work. In the campaigns of the past three years he has sent out an average, for each working-day, of over one thousand printed documents containing facts, statements, and appeals to temperance voters. He has compiled, and scattered broadcast, many copies of a volume which has cost him much labor, entitled "Extracts from the Public Statutes: containing all legislation relating to the liquor traffic, with a digest of the decisions of the Supreme Court bearing upon these matters, with full table of contents and indexes." This is a most valuable work. He uses the columns of newspapers unsparingly, and often occupies the supplement to the Boston Herald with his "temperance broadsides." His headquarters for "Temperance Republican" work is at No. 36 Bromfield Street, Boston. He receives far more editorial attention than any other temperance reformer,—bitter denunciations, slurs, misrepresentations, as well as commendations and approvals,—and he is probably more hated and feared by professed politicians than any other man in the political arena. Their attacks never disconcert him, however, but are received with perfect good nature and unruffled temper. He keeps a number of scrap-books, in which he methodically and carefully preserves all criticisms pro and con, all sorts of information concerning politics and politicians, proceedings of conventions and legislative bodies, and other articles from which to draw ammunition in the future.

As a speaker, Mr. Faxon is ready, outspoken, and blunt, never falling in line with any "cut-and-dried" policy or plan, but speaking freely, and directly to the point, under all circumstances, even when silence would seem to others the more advantageous. It has been said frequently by his political enemies, as well as friends, "If Faxon only knew better when to talk and when to hold his tongue, with his ability as a campaigner, backed by his wealth, he might easily ask and receive from the Republican party of Massachusetts any office in its gift—even that of Governor." Mr. Faxon, however, prefers his independence. He says, "I don't care a straw for any office; I won't take one. It would tie my hands to be an officeholder, and I want to be left free. As for talking, I propose to speak my mind when and where I please, and if any one doesn't like it, he needn't stop to listen."

As a writer, Mr. Faxon has an earnest, direct style. He keeps his object well in view, and never digresses except to add precept to precept, and to more completely and forcibly round out his argument. Many of his expressions are epigrammatic combinations of strength, terseness, and philosophy. We extract a few, at random, from various published articles: "A man cannot override instinct." "Human nature will stick out strongest wherever the dollars are the thickest." "Prayers avail but little in converting rum-sellers, but the law-gun, fully charged, put in the hands of honest officials, will do effective business." "In turning the thumb-screw of political sentiment, great care should be exercised in applying the power." "Place very little faith in the thief who steals your watch, and says he has repented, unless he returns the watch." "Out of the grog-shops come misery, woe, poverty, and death." "The power that commands votes is the power which politicians respect." "Laws are never enforced by those who break them." "If you want political purity to prevail, prayers and teaching must be the rifles, and unremitting work the ammunition, handled by men of unflinching integrity, who will fire into political sin at short range." "The grog-shops make bad voters, as surely as the churches make good ones." "Catering to a mob never advanced the interests of any class or institution inaugurated to benefit the community."

Mr. Faxon's benefactions are by no means confined to the State Temperance Alliance, Reform Clubs, and other temperance organizations.

A few words must be said about the much-talked-of "Quincy system" of dealing with liquor selling, and Mr. Faxon's connection therewith, as its author and "policeman" under it. In March, 1881, Mr. Faxon caused this article to be inserted in the warrant calling the annual town-meeting: "To see if the town will appoint, or instruct the selectmen to appoint, special police officers to enforce all laws bearing upon the sale of intoxicating liquors, and appropriate money therefor." This was adopted by the town, and we continue in Mr. Faxon's language:

"In 1881 there were forty-two licenses granted, while several dispensers of the ardent were selling in defiance of the law. By a nearly unanimous vote at the adjourned meeting, held in April, the selectmen were instructed to appoint the writer, as a policeman, to enforce all laws pertaining to the sale of intoxicating liquors. The appointment was made after some delay, and the arduous duties of the 'rural policeman' commenced. I was appointed, as I supposed, to do my duty; but soon found that the honorable board which made the appointment thought I was doing too much duty, and I was accordingly displaced. At the next March election the board of selectmen was voted out of office, and an entire new board elected. In May, 1882, I was reappointed by the newly-elected selectmen, and commenced my duties at once. I knew that it would be an arduous task; but having 'put my hand to the plow,' I had no intention of 'looking back.'"

The obstacles thrown in his way by his opponents were numberless. Everything was done to evade the law. False swearing was resorted to in the courts, and Mr. Faxon was arrested for assault and battery; but, with his great personal courage and untiring energy, these actions only infused greater zeal into his operations. He made a vigorous fight, employed detectives, spared neither pains nor money, made midnight raids on suspected places, fearlessly discharging his sworn, and to him sacred, duty, and pursued all illegal dealers with a rod of iron. The results were eminently satisfactory. Many violators of law have been complained of and prosecuted, each case being carefully worked up by having the testimony of witnesses taken at the trial in the lower court, and recorded, with all attendant circumstances, for use in the upper court in case of need. Owing to the perfect system adopted in their management, Mr. Faxon is very successful in securing convictions. Quincy is not now a wholesome place for rum-sellers, and shows, by its vastly improved condition, the value of Mr. Faxon's services as a police officer, in which position he is still continued. It is generally admitted that very little intoxicating liquor is now being sold in the town, while the traffic is surrounded with great dangers and difficulties. During the time that Mr. Henry H. Faxon has served the town of Quincy as a special police officer to enforce the liquor laws, there have been many inquiries made as to whether he was intending at any time to charge the town for his services. To set the matter at rest Mr. Faxon has sent the following letter to the selectmen :

"TO THE HONORABLE BOARD OF SELECTMEN :

"Gentlemen,—For several years I have served the town as policeman, specially appointed to enforce the laws relating to the sale of intoxicating liquors. Appropriations have been made each year to pay for such duties. In order to relieve the town of any embarrassment as regards my compensation, I will state that I have made no charge whatever. I did not accept the position, with its many perplexities, for a money consideration, but for a higher reward—that of benefiting the citizens in their business and social relations. I have also derived the satisfaction of knowing that the laws of prohibition can be carried out if officials are honest and earnest. Confident that my fellow-townsmen have fully realized the blessings resulting from the enforcement of the law, I trust that in the coming campaign they will not be indifferent in advancing every principle which pertains to good government. Yours truly,

"HENRY H. FAXON.

"QUINCY, Jan. 28, 1884."

Mr. Faxon has contributed to the cause of prosecuting illegal liquor selling in Quincy about five thousand dollars in money, in addition to unremitting toil and attention to the prosecution of cases. He has paid all his own counsel fees, and, whenever he has been assisted by brother officers, has invariably compensated them for special duties performed.

Mr. Faxon is never idle. He keeps his own books, looks after his large real-estate holdings, has a very extensive correspondence, and drafts, and often entirely prepares, his temperance articles; yet such is his system and method that there is no delay, but everything receives prompt attention. Not of a very strong physique, by his care in avoiding excesses he keeps in good health, and will doubtless continue to be a potent factor in the temperance politics of Massachusetts for many years. With his positive nature, he has strong friends as well as bitter enemies. The Boston Herald editorially says this of him :

"There is no denying that Mr. Faxon is a very live man. We have frequently had occasion to class him with the political humorists; for when he is not stirring up the wicked Democrats he is pretty likely to be making himself troublesome to the Republican machine politicians. As an independent political campaigner, the gentleman from Quincy is a success. He has a party of his own, is hampered by no committee, and when in need of the sinews of war he can draw on a bank which had not failed up to latest advices. We have had occasion to approve Mr. Faxon's persistency in urging upon citizens of every party the need of diligently attending the primary meetings, if they wish to defeat incompetent and corrupt candidates for office. In one respect the Bromfield Street campaigner is phenomenal among politicians: he wants no office, and seems actuated by no hope of reward except that satisfaction which comes from a conscientious endeavor to make the world a little better than one has found it. Mr. Faxon backs up his talk by his money, and is liberal where many of the extreme prohibitionists are penurious. . . . Mr. Faxon makes a very keen point when he says that 'a good record never sends a man into oblivion, but hundreds have been buried beyond hope for want of one;' and, further, 'the obituaries of dishonest men need a liberal amount of whitewash.' There is a pithiness about a genuine Faxonian sentence that appeals to the 'plain people' to whom the sagacious campaigner addresses his many circulars and documents. He never loses an opportunity to fire into the 'wicked Democrats,' and the readiness with which he goes for an opponent's scalp is in refreshing contrast to the timidity of most politicians. A few more such independent, aggressive, caucus-attending politicians scattered through the State would do much to break up the rule of the machines. Faxon is right in continually reminding the voters that they have a duty to perform, as citizens of a self-governing community, in attending the primary meetings, where selfish but practical politicians are always to be found. That is where he is a genuine civil service reformer. Campaigner Faxon's documents are compiled with remarkable accuracy. His sincerity is shown by the fact that, although doing much for the political advancement of other men, he never asks of his beneficiaries offices for himself or 'soft' places for his friends. To politicians who have weak spots in their records which they wish to conceal, Faxon is as annoying as an electric light is to a burglar. Taken altogether, Faxon is an independent, energetic, go-it-alone politician, who will leave no successor to carry on his peculiarly successful methods of campaigning. There is but one Massachusetts and but one Faxon."

AMOS CHURCHILL.

Amos Churchill was born at West Bolton, Canada, Dec. 31, 1816, of American parents temporarily residing there. His father, Amos Churchill, was born in Connecticut, Oct. 19, 1770. He came of an old family of high repute across the Atlantic, the English Churchills, who have often stood high in the councils of royalty, and various members of which have been knighted for deeds of valor. He was a tanner by trade, married Deborah Thornton, a native of Rhode Island, and settled first in Fairfax, Vt., afterwards in Canada, where he resided some years engaged in farming and shoe manufacturing. He returned to Fairfax, where he died at the age of eighty-six. He had ten children, of whom Amos was the youngest. He was a hard-working man, honest, industrious, and a worthy member of society. Amos, his son, had but limited educational advantages, such as were given to farmers' sons in the early part of the century, but faithfully and dutifully he remained at home working on the farm until he was of age. He then went to Medford, Mass., and learned the trade of stone-cutting, pursuing it as a journeyman for three years in Medford. He married Sept. 27, 1842, Lucretia, daughter of Alexander and Sally (Bean) Rowe, of Camptown, N. H. (Alexander Rowe was born in Moultonborough, N. H., Feb. 17, 1780, and attained the age of eighty years. His wife, Sally Bean, was born in Sandwich, April 9, 1787, married Mr. Rowe in 1805, and died at Camptown, July 28, 1840. Lucretia was born Jan. 4, 1824, being their youngest daughter and seventh child.) The young couple commenced housekeeping in Westford, Vt., where they resided for two years engaged in farming. About 1845 they came to Quincy, Mass., and for twenty years consecutively Mr. Churchill worked at his trade of stone-cutting in the employ of others, being for the last few of these years in charge of Williams & Spellman's Granite-Works. He was industrious and prudent, and saved money. About 1865 he formed a partnership with Charles R. Mitchell, to quarry and manufacture granite, under the firm-title of "Mitchell Granite-Works." This partnership continued four years, when Mr. Churchill purchased the whole interest of the firm in the quarrying, cutting, and polishing departments, which he has continued to carry on, either alone or in partnership with others, until the present. His productions, whether in the rough or finished work, stand high in the esteem of dealers, and are to be found in all sections of the country; but they principally go to New York, some shipments, however, having been made to England. In the gradual advance from hand labor to the diversified and expensive machinery now used, Mr. Churchill has been prompt to avail himself of every mechanical and other appliance as auxiliaries to improve the quality or expedite the labor, and steam-engines, hoisting-engines, lifting-jacks, polishing machines, bush-hammers, etc., have been purchased, together with all kinds of machinery required in his trade. By diligence and steady devotion to business, applying himself to labor from early morning to long after the close of the day, through a succession of years, Mr. Churchill has been the architect of his own fortune. He has loved his chosen field of labor, and he still may be found attending to all details of his extensive business, which has far outgrown the expectations if not the ambitions of his early manhood. He stands high in public esteem; his word is unquestioned in all business transactions; he owes nothing of his wealth, position, or business standing to extraneous causes or hereditary possessions. It has been the work of his own hands, of his industry, energy, and frugality, and his life is an example to the rising generation of what may be accomplished by them if they give the same determination, energy, and labor to accomplish success.

Amos Churchil

Mr. Churchill is a social companion, does his part in all matters of public improvement, is Republican in politics, is a member of Rural Lodge, F. and A. M., of Quincy, and of South Shore Commandery, of East Weymouth, and is to-day one of Quincy's highly valued and representative citizens. He has one child, Ellen B. (Mrs. J. H. Emery), who resides in Quincy and has two children, Alice J. and Florence R.

WILLIAM FIELD.

William Field, son of Guilford and Nancy (Howard) Field, was born on Common Street, Quincy, Mass., July 11, 1807. The Field family is an early colonial one of well-established standing in old New England days. The various branches of this family are occupying positions of responsibility, trust, and honor in many localities at the present day. Guilford Field, born probably in Quincy, died suddenly in August, 1819, when William was but twelve years old. He married Nancy Howard, of Braintree, whose parents died when she was young, leaving her to be brought up by her grandparents. On her mother's side she was descended from Nathaniel Wales, who settled in Dorchester in 1635 (see biography of Hon. Nathaniel Wales, Stoughton). Her grandfather once offered her a bag of gold if she would lift it, which she could not do. She died, at the advanced age of eighty-two, Nov. 3, 1853. William was early inured to labor, his parents being poor, and used to work at a very early age, "doing chores" at different places. After his father's death he lived with Jonathan Beals, on Adams Street, for one year; then in 1821 he began to work in the granite quarries, then commencing to attract attention, and has from that time until the present been identified with every step of the development and growth of this truly gigantic industry. For over sixty years has Mr. Field been connected with the ledges, the men, the machinery, the labors, and the successes of the granite industry. He has seen the associates of his early toil fall one by one into the long sleep of death, and is to-day, hale and vigorous despite his years, the oldest granite man in Quincy, the sole survivor of the pioneer quarrymen. He learned stone-cutting, which he followed for eight years, working during this period on stone for the Bunker Hill Monument, New York Exchange (from "Wigwam quarry"), and for various other places and works of note. The last seven years of this time he was engaged as foreman in the cutting and quarry departments for William Packard, and was also his paymaster. Having a thorough familiarity with all departments of the granite business and having accumulated some property, in 1839 he, with others, formed the "Franklin Granite Company," he to superintend the work which was done in Quincy and send it to their yard, which was in New York City. After eighteen months Mr. Field formed a partnership with Eleazer Frederick (the company ceasing to do business), and purchased its Quincy works, and has ever since conducted business on his own account. He did a large amount of building in Boston for fifteen or twenty years, and afterward made a specialty of monumental work. This partnership continued until the death of Mr. Frederick in 1879. The firm has always been and now is "Frederick & Field," the present members being William Field, Mrs. Frederick, E. Frederick Carr, and William A. Field. They employ from seventy-five to one hundred workmen, and from small beginnings and work done by hand the business has now attained large proportions, amounting to from seventy-five thousand to one hundred thousand dollars per annum, and using labor-saving machinery, run by steam-engines of expensive character, for hoisting, polishing, cutting, drilling, etc. We mention as worthy of special note that they furnished material for the New Orleans Custom-House, the foundation of Plymouth memorial monument, the canopy over Plymouth Rock, basement of Custom-House, San Francisco, Cal., which was freighted around Cape Horn, soldiers' monuments at Holyoke, Mass., monument for the great wine merchant, Nicholas Longworth, Cincinnati, Ohio, and are now constructing the monument on the site of the battle of Monmouth, Freehold, N. J., soldiers' monuments in Manchester, N. H., Lawrence, Mass., vault for late John Anderson, the great tobaccoist, of New York (said vault is in Greenwood Cemetery), and many other large family monuments and vaults.

Mr. Field's business career has been very successful, and justly so. He has spared no pains to preserve the reputation, so long ago acquired by him, of furnishing honest material and excellent and artistic workmanship. He has been president of the Quincy Contractors' Association since its organization. Mr. Field married (Feb. 15, 1829) Louisa, daughter of Daniel T. and Rebecca (Smith) Dickerman. She was born in Easton, Mass., Oct. 27, 1811. For more than half a century have they walked life's pathway hand in hand, and lived to see generation after generation of descendants rise up to do them honor, and reflecting credit upon the instructions and pleasant life of Mr. Field's home. Their children were William Q., died in infancy. Louisa R., married, first, William Carver, who became sergeant in Company K, Eighteenth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, and was shot through the body, living ten weeks after being wounded, in November, 1862, while crossing the Potomac River; they had two children, William Oscar and Maria L. (Mrs. William Ross, of Braintree); second, Charles A. French, and resides in Brockton. William H. died, aged two years. William Augustus, now in business with his father, married Electa E. Burnham, and has two children, Ida Bell and Maria Louise Field. Elizabeth Ann, married Daniel Vining, of North Weymouth, and has one son, Elmer E. Vining. Harriet Amanda, married Henry Arnold; has one child, Harry Field Arnold. Daniel Howard, deceased. Emma Helen, died unmarried. Charles Henry, married Mary J. Emerson; resides in Quincy, and has one child, Edgar Howard Field. Arthur Kingsbury, deceased.

Mr. Field is Republican in politics, but is content to remain outside of official honors and preferment. He is of sanguine temperament, and is honored by the esteem of those who know him best. Having amassed sufficient wealth for his old age, he is passing on towards the "twilight" in a home cheered by an intelligent and agreeable wife and the ministration of devoted children.

ELEAZER FREDERICK.

Eleazer Frederick was born in Tyngsborough, Mass., April 9, 1806, the tenth child of George and Rhoda (Reed) Frederick, the parents of twelve children. Their early training was rigid and puritanic, and educational advantages those of a district school, the boys working on the farm between school terms. His father was a man of sterling integrity and great perseverance, whose life was passed quietly on the farm, with the exception of enlisting in the war of 1812, when he walked from Tyngsborough to Boston.

E. Frederick

The subject of this memoir learned his trade of stone-cutting in his native town, which he left at his majority, walking to Charlestown to work on Bunker Hill Monument, and paying the requisite sum to become a member of that association. He afterwards worked in Boston and Quincy. Having mastered his calling of journeyman, he began to look for a broader field in which to work, taking charge of stone-yards in Norfolk, Va., Baltimore, Md., South Boston, Mass., and other places.

He settled in Quincy, Feb. 1, 1838, and with Horace Beals, William Field, and others formed the Franklin Granite Company, Mr. Frederick investing one thousand dollars, part of what he had saved by the exercise of the most rigid economy.

This company had two yards, one in New York, and one in Quincy. Horace Beals managed the New York, and Mr. Frederick the Quincy business. Owing to various causes the business did not prove a success, and the company dissolved in eighteen months, Mr. Frederick and the others losing the capital invested.

Undaunted by this reverse, in 1839 he started business again, taking William Field as partner, he being a superior quarryman and having charge of that part of the work. The first quarry was hired of Mr. Thomas Greenleaf, which was worked a number of years. The second (being the present quarry owned and worked by the firm) was hired of Capt. Josiah Bass, and purchased from his heirs in 1854. The partnership thus formed, under the name of Frederick & Field, continued nearly forty years. Mr. Frederick brought to bear on the business the qualities which, sooner or later, command success, namely, a clear mind, indomitable courage, and practical knowledge of all departments of his business. His contracts, financial management, and personal supervision formed much of the basis on which the firm built its prosperity. His early training and strong constitution stood him in good stead in the arduous duties to which he was called, as press of business in the daytime and frequent absences from home, traveling for the firm, compelled him often to work far into the night writing and estimating. He supplied his early lack of advantages by making himself educated in his special calling. Ably seconded by Mr. Field, Frederick & Field's small business of 1839 grew in size and importance. Machinery of all kinds was added to facilitate the working and handling of stone, abler artists and artisans employed, the granite of other States purchased and worked, Scotch granite, marble, and bronze figures furnished when required by contracts, till at the time of Mr. Frederick's death, Sept. 12, 1878, their work had found its way into most of the States of the Union.

Mr. Frederick always kept in the van of the march of improvement in tools and machinery used in the business, and was always among the first to adopt any such, though not prone to waste time and money on useless inventions. He always kept abreast of the times in which he lived, and though in the course of his long career the methods of doing business, tools, machinery, etc., used changed greatly, he never allowed himself to cling to old methods and appliances which he had become accustomed to when his judgment showed him that the new methods and appliances of to-day were better.

His death was not only a great blow to his family, but a heavy loss to the firm and business, which owed so much of its financial success and high reputation to his persevering industry and ability.

The business, consisting at first of building work only, gradually changed its character, till now monumental work forms a chief part of it.

Among the buildings now standing we mention C. F. Hovey & Co.'s store, part of State Street Block, Boston, part of stone for San Francisco Custom-House, and basement of Tribune Building, New York. Many granite fronts furnished by the firm went down in the Boston fire, and many more are now standing we have not space to mention. Among the monumental and other work furnished by the firm we may remark the entrance posts, etc., and curbing around the pond, Public Garden, Boston, soldiers' monuments at Leominster and Holyoke, Mass., Springfield, Ohio, and Manchester, N. H. (which latter was the last contract of note entered into in Mr. Frederick's lifetime, and which he did not live to see completed), and private and public vaults and monuments in great number. The Lovejoy monument is worthy of note as being the largest all-polished monument ever furnished in Quincy.

Since the death of Mr. Frederick the business has been continued by William Field, E. F. Carr, W. A. Field, and Mrs. E. Frederick, under the old firm-name of Frederick & Field.

Eleazer Frederick married, Oct. 25, 1825, Mary Gould, of Tyngsborough, Mass., and had two daughters,—Mary Maria, born Jan. 15, 1827, and Sarah Jane, born Oct. 26, 1828.

Mary Maria Frederick married Horace Baxter

Spear, the present cashier of the National Mount Wollaston Bank of Quincy, and has three children,—Horace Frederick, born Jan. 20, 1863; Lucy Maria, born Sept. 7, 1864; Joseph Gould, born March 8, 1867.

Sarah Jane Frederick married Joseph Carr, dry-goods merchant, and has had four children,—Mary Jane, born Dec. 22, 1850; Alice Maria, born Jan. 26, 1853; Eleazer Frederick, born Aug. 8, 1855 (now a member of the firm of Frederick & Field); Joseph Gould, born July 26, 1860, died March 7, 1861.

Mary Jane Carr married John Lyman Faxon, architect, Nov. 9, 1882, and has one child.

E. Frederick Carr married Alice Maria Taylor, Oct. 22, 1879, and has had three children, two now living.

In politics, Mr. Frederick was a Democrat. He was a public-spirited citizen; every enterprise for the public good found in him an earnest and liberal support. In 1860 he was one of three who applied to the Legislature for an act of incorporation for the introduction of gas into Quincy, to be known as the Citizens' Gas-Light Company, of which he acted as president and treasurer for several years. Soon after the Mount Wollaston Bank was established, Mr. Frederick was chosen one of the directors, and continued a member of that board till his death. He was a Mason of high standing, belonging to Rural Lodge, Quincy, and Boston Commandery, Knights Templar. He also belonged to the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company, the National Lancers, and Mechanics' Association, and was at one time a member of the Odd-Fellows.

He was of a genial, social temperament, and retained the happy faculty of entering into the spirit of the young, with whom he always delighted to mingle even to his last illness. His scope of interest was large, allowing him keen enjoyment with the merrymakings of young and old. He always took great interest in his employés, some of whom were with him over thirty years.

He was an indulgent, affectionate husband and father, and his loving devotion to his grandchildren was remarkable.

The most fitting memorials to his worth and ability are the respect and affection with which his memory is cherished by those he left behind him, and the business which his efforts did so much to raise from obscurity to prosperity and success.

PATRICK McDONNELL.

It is surely well to record for the encouragement of others a brief synopsis of the life of one who, a foreigner, far from the land of his nativity, constantly surrounded by more than ordinary temptations, has resisted them successfully, accumulated wealth, a firm position in society, and who may be justly considered one of the best representatives of the land of his birth.

Patrick McDonnell, son of Thomas and Mary (Cunniff) McDonnell, was born at Loobanroe, County Roscommon, Ireland, June 10, 1817. His father, a farmer in comfortable circumstances, died when Patrick was six years old, and Patrick remained with his mother until he was eighteen. Then, after a year's visit to a sister in Birmingham, England, he was apprenticed by his mother to her brother, Patrick Cunniff, to learn the carpenter's trade, she paying seven pounds for five years' service. This service was not given, however, for in a few months Mr. Cunniff concluded to emigrate to America, and Patrick told him, "Give me the money my mother gave you and I will go with you." Mr. Cunniff did this, and June 10, 1835, they landed at Perth Amboy, and came to New York City. Seeing a kindly looking old gentleman on the street, young Patrick asked him, "What part of the country could a poor emigrant boy, 'an exile from Erin,' do the best in?" The old man answered, "If he was industrious, and careful, and temperate, there was no doubt that Massachusetts presented one of the best places for success." Patrick started for Massachusetts, taking packet for Albany, where he arrived with one pound in gold in his possession. While walking along he met a gentleman who said, "Halloo! young man, do you want to work?" "Yes, sir." Patrick was soon engaged at ten dollars per month. He worked one month, became lonesome and started for Boston, where some of his native townsmen were resident. After crossing the ferry he walked to Hartford, looking steadily for work on the way in vain. From Hartford he reached Worcester by walking and short rides on the stages. There was a railroad from Worcester to Boston, and he availed himself of it, and on reaching Boston was welcomed heartily by a friend. For nine days he made his stopping-place with this friend, while he diligently canvassed the adjacent towns for employment. He went on the first day to Dorchester, and was told by Capt. William Clapp, a large tanner and farmer, that if a young lad who had been at work for him and had gone away did not return in ten days, he would employ him. When the nine days' search in Roxbury, Quincy, etc., was of no avail, he returned to Capt. Clapp, who said he would take him on trial, and pay him what he was worth. At the expiration of the month, Capt. Clapp engaged him for five years at twelve dollars per month. At the end of his first year's service Capt. Clapp invited him to his parlor, and presented him with a Bible, which Mr. McDonnell still preserves with care, and at various times thereafter he received tokens of his regard. The five years passed in this good Christian family, which gave him truly a home, impressed the teachings of morality and temperance indelibly on the young man's mind. He attended faithfully to his religious duties at St. Patrick's Church at Roxbury, and was during these five years a teacher in the Sunday-school.

In 1841, Mr. McDonnell came to Quincy, where he has since made his residence, and worked two years for John Mulford in his tan-yard; then he learned the stone-cutter's trade, working for various persons. After finishing his trade he began work for Newcomb & Chapin, Quincy Point, cutting stone, receiving a dollar and a quarter per day for four months, and ten shillings sixpence per day for eight months (the highest price then paid). He was industrious and temperate, did his work well, remained with them eleven years, walking three miles every day to and from work, carrying his dinner, and saved about five thousand dollars which he, as it accumulated, invested in village lots and erected tenements thereon. He then went to work for Thomas Drake, with whom he had finished his trade, but in three months entered into partnership with him. This partnership continued about a year, when, in 1857, Mr. McDonnell went into business in a small way, with only one apprentice, in a little shed on the common near where his sons are now established. Here he remained six years, when he leased the ground now occupied by his sons for twenty years from the town of Quincy and increased his business rapidly, so that when he retired in 1881 he employed seventy hands and probably did a more profitable business than any other man in his line in Quincy. His economy, incessant devotion to business, and strict business habits have secured him a handsome property. He owns and rents twenty tenements in Quincy and Milton. He married, June 1, 1843, Mary Hughes, who attended school with him in Ireland. Their children are Emily E. (Mrs. Wm. Garbarino), Thomas, John Q., Mary A., James S., Ellen G., and Margaret F.

Mr. McDonnell has taken great pains in the education of his children. John Q. attended Quincy high school for three years, and his father wished him to go to college, but as he had not that inclination, Mr. McDonnell took him into his yard and instructed him thoroughly in stone-cutting. Thomas H. and James S. are graduates of Commercial College, Boston. Ellen G. attended the normal school at Bridgewater for two years, became quite proficient in music, attending the Boston Conservatory of Music, and for the past three or four years has been organist in St. John's Church, Quincy. She is a young lady of superior talent and ability, and has decided to enter upon a religious life. She is to take the veil in Europe. Margaret F. attended Notre Dame Academy, Boston, for two years. When Thomas and John Q. were of age they were admitted partners with their father, and the firm became McDonnell & Sons, in 1871. In December, 1883, they established a branch of their business in Buffalo, N. Y. They are enterprising men, and are doing well. As an illustration, we quote from the New York Scientific Times and Mercantile Register of May, 1883: "Quincy leads any town or city in the country in the quarrying and working of granite, and produces an article of a nature that is unequaled by any in the world. There are many large concerns in this town engaged in quarrying, but none are more worthy of selection as a representative house than McDonnell & Sons. This house was established in 1857, and its present members are T. H. McDonnell and J. Q. McDonnell. They own and work one of the largest quarries in the place, and are wholesale dealers in Quincy granite. Their operations include every branch of the granite-working trade, including the manufacture of monuments, curb-lots, posts, etc. Polishing is also an important part of their business, and their work of this character is very fine. In all, they give employment to a hundred men and over, many of whom are as well-skilled workmen as money can procure. The work done by this house bears the highest reputation everywhere, and in many quarters gives them the preference over all others. Their cemetery work is of unusual excellence, and your correspondent was shown a specimen of it in the lot of the McDonnell family, at the St. Mary's Catholic Cemetery, that would not be out of place in the best art museum in the land. This is a monument of dark blue Quincy granite, surmounted by a statue of the Virgin Mary, of Westerly granite. The whole is in the purest Corinthian style, and about forty feet in height. The bas-relief of the statue is a full Corinthian cap of intricate design, and elegantly carved, while the statue itself is beautiful in expression, execution, and design. The attitude is a peculiarly graceful and devotional one, and would excite admiration anywhere. The entire monument is without blemish, and its finish and polish of a most artistic nature. It is acknowledged by all to be the best piece of work ever done in Quincy, and were it located in Mount Auburn or Greenwood it would attract universal attention." This monument was designed and executed by Mr. McDonnell before his connection with the firm ceased, and is well worthy of the praise bestowed upon it. We mention some other especially fine works of this firm. During 1857, his first year in business, they furnished one front of State Street Block, Long Wharf, Boston. In 1858, the coping for the cemetery lot of Dr. Bigelow (president of Mount Auburn Cemetery Corporation); since then they have furnished the monument for Mr. Jared Sparks, at Mount Auburn; the Birchard monument, erected by ex-President Hayes, Fremont, Ohio; monument and coping for T. W. Parks, Greenwood Cemetery, Brooklyn, N. Y.; coping for Marshall O. Roberts, Woodlawn Cemetery, New York; monument for the Seventy-seventh New York Regiment, in square opposite Congress Park, Saratoga Springs; vault for J. C. Buckman, Mount Auburn; Bates monument, Spring Grove Cemetery, Cincinnati; and the largest monumental cross ever made in the United States (weight twenty-five tons), for R. M. Shoemaker, also in Spring Grove Cemetery, Cincinnati.

Mr. McDonnell began housekeeping in Quincy in a small house, for which he paid six hundred dollars out of the savings of his Dorchester life. Some years since he purchased the lot and dwelling where he now resides, and has expended several thousand dollars in reconstructing it, and to-day has one of Quincy's most attractive residences, with spacious surroundings and costly appurtenances, which affords him a pleasant home.

Mr. McDonnell was a Democrat in politics until six or eight years ago, when his devotion to temperance drove him from that party, and he is now an independent voter. Through his frank and affable manners, Mr. McDonnell is popular with all classes. A true son of Ireland, he has never forgotten the fact, as is manifested in the attachment felt for him by his fellow-countrymen, to many of whom he is adviser and friend. Yet he is an American, and thoroughly identified in sympathy and principle with the land of his adoption. While tolerant in his views, his sincerity of character is exhibited in his support of the religious principles of his fathers and his strict adherence to the Roman Catholic Church. He attributes his success to the good lessons and moral training received at Capt. Clapp's, his strictly temperance habits (never allowing himself to go to a rum shop, or to keep liquor in the house), and the influence of his religion.

He has been quite a traveler, visiting his old home in Ireland in 1870, and since then California, Canada, and other parts of America. Everywhere and in all places he has put himself on the strong temperance platform, and by voice, example, and published newspaper articles he has warned his countrymen against the use of liquor as their most terrible enemy.

While in Europe Mr. McDonnell made a three months' tour through England, Ireland, and Scotland. His townsman, Charles Francis Adams, gave him a personal letter to Mr. Motley, then minister to England, which caused him to take much interest in Mr. McDonnell, to whom he extended many courtesies, but would not allow him to go to Rome or Paris on account of the war then raging in France.

Mr. McDonnell ascribes his success in life largely to the fact that he never incurred debt of any kind, being always prepared to cancel all liabilities.

WILLIAM ALLEN HODGES.

William Allen Hodges is of good Puritan stock, both parents descending from old Plymouth Colony families, his paternal ancestor, William Hodges, settling in what is now Taunton about 1640, and enrolled among the inhabitants subject to military duty there in 1643. He was a land proprietor and prominent in local affairs. He died April 2, 1654, leaving two sons, John² and Henry. Both of them are mentioned as proprietors of land in Taunton in 1675 (see history of Hodges family elsewhere in this volume). This John² married Elizabeth Macy, May 15, 1672. Of their numerous children, John³, the oldest, was born April 5, 1673. He married and became a resident of Norton. His son Edmund⁴ married and had thirteen children. He always resided in Norton, where his wife, Mary, who survived him, died April 30, 1800. Their son, Tisdale⁵, was born in Norton, Mass., Dec. 7, 1753. He was a man of well-to-do circumstances, was a captain of "Troopers," and during his latter years moved to Petersham, Worcester Co., where he died. He married Naomi, daughter of Capt. Jos. Hodges, of Norton (who was killed in an Indian fight near Fort Schuyler, in the old French war). Capt. Tisdale Hodges was a man of advanced opinions and liberal ideas. He had seven sons, to whom he gave a better education than was usual in those days, sending some to college. Jerry⁶, son of Capt. Tisdale and Naomi Hodges, was born in Norton in 1787. He received a good education, both literary and medical; held a commission as surgeon's mate in the United States army, and was a man of marked ability. He married Mary Tucker. (Her grandfather, Samuel Tucker, was one of the first settlers of Milton, an energetic man, of great courage, quiet and unostentatious in his ways, and who served his day and generation well.) They had eleven children. Dr. Hodges died in March, 1858. His widow, born in 1793, resides in Petersham, being now over ninety years old.

William A. Hodges⁷, son of Dr. Jerry and Mary (Tucker) Hodges, was tenth in a family of eleven children, and born at Petersham, Mass., May 15, 1834. His youth, until fourteen, was passed with his parents, with common-school advantages. In February, 1848, he commenced life for himself, going first to Boston, and afterwards to Milton, where he served an apprenticeship of three years at the trade he has always followed, that of a baker. After his apprenticeship he worked as journeyman at Milton, Roxbury, and elsewhere until 1858. In that year he went to California, where he remained two years, engaged in mining and baking. Returning to Massachusetts, he again engaged with his former employers at Roxbury, continuing with them until 1862, when he took a trip to the West in search of a location wherein to establish himself. He remained in McGregor, Iowa, five months, then returned to Roxbury and his former employers. In May, 1866, he came to Quincy, and purchased an interest in the business of a baker, which was carried on in the shop which he now occupies. After eighteen months he became sole proprietor, and by energy, attention to business, and care in producing good articles he has much increased it, enlarged the buildings and capacity of production, and made money. As a citizen, Mr. Hodges is enterprising and public-spirited; as a friend, strong, warm, and faithful; as a man, he is held in the highest esteem. Believing in the principles of his fathers, and which were given by Thomas Jefferson and enunciated in the Constitution of the United States, Mr. Hodges has been a Democrat of the most unswerving order. His devotion to principle, coupled with his personal popularity, has brought him into prominence in local politics. In this field he is a sharp fighter, "takes off his gloves," and gives as hard blows as he receives. In every year since 1872 he has been nominated for some official position, and has nearly always obtained an election. In 1872 he was elected selectman of Quincy. In 1873 he was chairman of the board. In 1874 again elected selectman (without opposition). He resigned his office six weeks after his election, with the full determination of devoting himself entirely to business, but in the fall (1874) he was placed in nomination by the Democrats to represent Quincy in the State Legislature, and was elected. The next spring (1875) he was elected selectman. In 1876 he was "alternate" to the Democratic National Convention at St. Louis which nominated Tilden for President. In the fall of 1876 he was nominated by the Democratic Senatorial Convention of the First Norfolk District as its candidate for senator, and was the first candidate placed in the field after the State had been redistricted. The district was so strongly Republican that the nomination was merely complimentary, no Democrat having a possible chance of an election. In 1877 he was elected selectman by a very large majority, and became chairman. In 1878 he was again elected selectman, and was chairman. The death of Mr. Barker, senator elect, caused a new election for senator. In this contest Mr. Hodges was the Democratic nominee, and was elected (April, 1878) to fill the vacancy. In 1879 he was not in candidacy for selectman, but in the fall of that year was nominated by the Democrats of the Second District as their candidate for councilor. This was also a complimentary nomination. In the spring of 1880 he was again elected selectman and chairman. In the fall of 1880 he received the complimentary nomination of county commissioner from his party. In the spring of 1881 he was again re-elected selectman, and was chairman. In the fall of 1881 the Democratic State Convention made him its candidate for State treasurer. In 1882 he was again nominated for State treasurer. In 1883, under the bright outlook for Democracy, Democratic political managers were looking for a man strong enough by force of character, experience in office, and personal popularity to make a successful campaign in this senatorial district, and Mr. Hodges was the one declared to be the most advisable to select, and he was placed in nomination by the Senatorial Convention and elected.

Mr. Hodges married, Sept. 15, 1868, Annie M., daughter of George F. and Maria (Stetson) Wilson, of Quincy. They have three surviving children,—Francis Mason, Mabel Stetson, and Edward Tisdale Quincy.

Mr. Hodges is a member of Rural Lodge, F. and A. M., of Quincy, St. Stephen's Lodge of Royal Arch Masons, and a life member of the Boston Commandery. In all official relations he has discharged his duties fearlessly and to the best interests of his constituents according to his best judgment.

DANIEL BAXTER.

Daniel Baxter, son of William and Abigail (Newcomb) Baxter, was born in Quincy, Mass., Jan. 24, 1803, and on his eighty-first birthday slept within twenty feet of the spot where he was born. The place where he now lives was formerly owned by his father, a native of Quincy, who was a butcher, storekeeper, etc. William Baxter moved from Quincy to Paddock's Island, Boston Harbor, about the 1st of May, 1809, and remained there until the fall of 1812, when he removed to Quincy, and continued his business as a butcher. While on the island Mr. Baxter engaged in butchering, ran a sloop in the coasting trade, and was an active, energetic man. He died in Quincy, June 8, 1829, at the age of sixty-one years. Mrs. Abigail Baxter died July 4, 1819, aged forty-seven years. Daniel's education was confined to very limited attendance at the schools of that early period, boarding at Hull for three winters and attending school, and he tells interesting stories of the dangers he and his sister experienced in crossing from and to the island in the inclement winter weather. When he was sixteen he carried the meat which his father had butchered to Weymouth, Hingham, Cohasset, and Scituate to sell. He remained with his father until he was twenty-one, when he commenced business for himself, going to Brighton market, purchasing cattle and butchering them, and for nearly forty years continued this and the sale of the meat on the same route in Weymouth, Hingham, etc., that he had sold for his father. Mr. Baxter has been economical, prudent, and a hard worker. He laid up money which he carefully invested in land and other good investments, and to-day is one of the large real-estate owners in Quincy, and the only capital he has ever inherited was seven hundred and fourteen dollars left him by his father. He early in life showed his aptitude for trade, when but a lad of twelve years, by buying a quart of molasses, making candy and peddling it, making a profit of seventeen cents, which was not ill spent. He married, Jan. 22, 1829, Abigail, daughter of Noah Curtis, and has had fourteen children, the following now living: Abigail (Mrs. John Chamberlain, resides in Quincy), Daniel W., Ann W. (Mrs. John Wood, lives in Quincy), Caroline (Mrs. George H. Tobey, lives in Chicago), Elizabeth (Mrs. Charles A. Follet, resides with her father), Wm. Henry, Mary F. (Mrs. Parker Hayward, lives in Braintree), Adeline W. (Mrs. Frank C. Waterhouse, lives in Wollaston). Mrs. Abigail C. Baxter died July 3, 1879.

Mr. Baxter commenced housekeeping at Quincy Point, and lived there six years, when his desire to occupy the old home of his father in Quincy induced him to remove thither, and he built the house where he now resides in 1858. Mr. Baxter has filled many positions of public trust; was for fourteen years selectman, and chairman over half of the time; has served on school committees, as assessor, surveyor of highways, and overseer of the poor. When the Quincy Stone Bank was organized he was the youngest one of the incorporators and directors. He was a director for over forty years, and is now the only surviving member of the original board. He has been connected with the Quincy Savings Bank as director for more than a quarter of a century, and is a stockholder in various corporations. He has always been conservative, believing in conducting public affairs as he would his own business, owing no man anything; in all positions he has been careful, prudent, and saving, and has so managed his means that in his old age he has a handsome competency, and the satisfaction of having discharged all duties, public and private, to the best of his ability and with honest intent. He has been a busy man all his life. He is an example of what industry, common sense, and care will do for any one in the battle of life. He has just passed his eighty-first birthday, and it is well to note in connection therewith, that his youngest sister and her husband, Mr. and Mrs. Paul Wild, celebrated the sixty-first anniversary of their marriage in 1883.

STOUGHTON.

Stoughton—Named in Honor of Governor William Stoughton—Territory allotted to Dorchester in 1637—Known as the "New Grant"—Dorchester South Precinct—A Part set off to Wrentham in 1724—Incorporation of Stoughton—Original Territory—Second Precinct set off in 1740—Incorporation of Third Precinct in 1743—The First Town-Meeting—Incorporation of Stoughtonham—The Revolution—Votes of the Town in 1723, 1724, 1725, 1726—Committee of Correspondence—Revolutionary Bounties, etc.

AMIDST the pealing of bells, the roll of drums, the thunder of cannon, and the inspiring strains of martial music the one hundredth anniversary of American independence is ushered in, the most memorable day of the nineteenth century. A whole country from the rugged shores of Maine to the golden sands of California, multitudinous cities born since the event they to-day celebrate, prosperous towns created with astonishing celerity, small villages remote from the whirl and excitement of business, all join in celebrating the occasion. The anthem of liberty wakes echoes in the hut of the squatter in Western wilds not less than in the luxurious homes of crowded cities.

This universal commemoration is not solely because the Revolutionary fathers by their immortal declaration just one hundred years ago trampled the British yoke beneath their feet, not alone because the heroic struggle they carried on against fearful and almost hopeless odds was finally crowned with success, but for the reason that the Union has survived until all its founders have mingled their dust with the soil many of them had stained with their blood; because the country has grown and prospered year after year as no other country has ever grown and prospered; because it has withstood and risen triumphantly from that supreme shock and trial of nations, a desperate civil war, in which the sons of those sires who, then united, hurled the British invader from our shores, now, arrayed against each other, fought the one side to destroy, the other to uphold the old flag with ancestral valor, for when Greek meets Greek then comes the tug of war.

Fifty years before the birth of the nation the Great and General Court of the Colony of Massachusetts Bay enacted a law for the incorporation of the town of Stoughton. It is, therefore, felicitous that on the day we celebrate the centennial of the Republic you can also pause midway between the first and second centennial of your town to commemorate its history and dwell upon its associations. Taking its name from Governor William Stoughton, it included originally a much larger section than it at present comprises. The territory embraced at the time of incorporation, together with a part of Wrentham, had in the year 1637 been allotted to Dorchester, and was known as the "New Grant" from that time until Dec. 15, 1715.

From that date until December, 1726, it was called the Dorchester South Precinct, a part having been set off to Wrentham in the year 1724. The town of Stoughton was incorporated on the 22d day of December, 1726. At that time Samuel Adams, the pioneer of the Revolution, was four years old, and John Adams was not born till nine years later. It included the present towns of Canton, Sharon, and Stoughton, and nearly if not quite all of Foxborough and about one-quarter of Dedham. In those days the law of subtraction rather than annexation prevailed. The act of incorporation is entitled an "Act for dividing the towns of Dorchester and erecting a new town there by the name of Stoughton." The preamble sets forth that "The town of Dorchester within the county of Suffolk is of great extent in length, and lies commodious for two townships, and the South Precinct within the bounds of Dorchester is competently filled with inhabitants who have made their application to the said town and also addressed this Court that the said lands may be made a distinct and separate township." Then follows the act of incorporation, to which is attached a condition, making it incumbent upon the inhabitants to procure within the space of twelve months from the publication of the act a learned orthodox minister of good conversation, and make provision for his comfortable and honorable support, and likewise to provide a schoolmaster to instruct their youth in writing and reading. And it is further enacted that they shall pay such taxes as are assessed to Dorchester which properly belong to the new town. The Second Precinct, constituting what is now Sharon and Foxborough, was incorporated July 2, 1740, leaving what is now Canton and Stoughton, the Old Dorchester South Precinct, or First Parish.

The Third Precinct, or Parish, represents what is now Stoughton, and was incorporated Nov. 9, 1743. The chief reason set forth in the petition for an act of incorporation is the remoteness of a place of worship, it being nearly seven miles. The first town-meeting was held in Stoughton, Jan. 2, 1727, to choose town officers, and I notice that George Talbot was chosen one of the selectmen and assessors. On the 20th of June, 1765, the present towns of Sharon and Foxborough were incorporated under the name of Stoughtonham. The town of Canton was incorporated by an act passed Feb. 23, 1797, which contained among other provisions that, whereas in consequence of the division only one selectman will remain in said Stoughton, "Be it enacted that Jabez Talbot, the selectman remaining within said town be, and he is thereby invested with all the powers which a majority of said selectmen would have had so far as relates to certain purposes specified." I doubt not the trusts confided to Jabez Talbot were well administered, as a thorough knowledge of administration affairs has been conspicuous in this family.

A classified list of the persons taxed in the ancient town of Stoughton for the year 1776 shows that one hundred and forty-two lived in what is now called* Stoughton. Samuel Capen, Samuel Paul, Robert Swan, and Nathaniel Wales are familiar names in the list.

In the year 1773 the dawning of the spirit of independence became manifest. The custom prevailed of having the wishes of the people expressed at the town-meetings recorded by the town clerks and transmitted to the General Court or Continental Congress. At a town-meeting March 1, 1773, a letter from the Boston Committee of Correspondence sent to the town was received and read, and the town sent in reply a lengthy communication, setting forth that in their judgment their rights as men, as Christians, and as British subjects have been greatly infringed upon and violated by arbitrary will and power, and they are apprehensive that in future time this may prove fatal to them and their posterity, and to all that is dear to them, reducing them not only to poverty but slavery. They remonstrate against it, and propose to unite in all constitutional methods to regain the rights that have been ravished from them. They further instruct their representative to exert himself for these ends, and that a petition be presented to the king for redress, at the same time expressing unswerving loyalty to him and invoking the Divine blessing upon him.

At a town-meeting on the 26th of September, 1774, choice was made of Thomas Crane for representative to the Great and General Court to be holden at Salem. He was instructed by vote to adhere firmly to the charter of the province as granted by their Majesties William and Mary, and to do no act acknowledging the validity of the act of the British Parliament for altering the government of Massachusetts Bay. They then state that, as they have reason to believe a conscientious discharge of his duty will produce a dissolution of the House of Representatives, they therefore instruct him to meet with other members in a General Provincial Congress, to act upon such matters as come before them in a manner most conducive to the true interests of the town and province, and most likely to preserve the liberties of all North America.

At a town-meeting, Jan. 9, 1775, the town made choice of Thomas Crane to represent them in a Provincial Congress to be held at Cambridge the 1st of the February following. At the same meeting the town voted not to lend their town moneys to Henry Gardner, of Stowe; but at an adjourned meeting, Jan. 16th, same year, their patriotism increased to such a degree that they reconsidered their former vote and voted to lend all their province money to Henry Gardner, of Stowe, as is recommended by the Provincial Congress. Among other votes passed at this meeting was one to the effect that they approved of the resolves of the Continental Congress and their association; another to appoint a committee of inspection of nineteen persons, and that this committee use their interest that the resolves and the association of the Continental Congress be closely adhered to. At town-meeting, May 25, 1775, the town voted that Messrs. Peter Talbot, Christopher Wadsworth, and Benjamin Gill be a committee of correspondence, to correspond with the several towns in this province, the six following months.

It is evident by the frequency of the meetings and the vigor of the proceedings during the years 1775-76 that they fully believed the "price of liberty was eternal vigilance." They even foreshadowed the Declaration of Independence and promised in advance their co-operation, for at a meeting on the 22d of May, 1776, forty-two days before the Declaration of Independence was proclaimed, they voted "that if the Honorable Continental Congress should for the safety of this Colony declare us independent of the Kingdom of Great Britain, we, the said inhabitants, will solemnly engage with our lives and fortunes to support them in the measure;" and believing that faith should be accompanied by works, they voted on the 8th of July following to raise a sum of money to be levied upon polls and estates to give to each man, to the number of thirty-eight, that shall enlist in the service of the northern department against Quebec, "the sum of six pounds, six shillings, eightpence, as an addition to their bounty," or what we called in the late war a town bounty. Col. Gill, Capt. Endicott, Samuel Tucker, Ezekiel Fisher, Capt. Billings, Aaron Wentworth, Esquire Crane, Dr. Holmes, John Hartwell, John Withington, Capt. Swan, William Shaller, Wm. Capen, and Lieut. Johnson each offered to pay the poll-tax for two men that would enter the service as aforesaid. July 22, 1776, it was voted to assess six pounds, six shillings, eightpence for each non-commissioned officer and soldier that shall enlist and march to join the army against Canada; but if they render service at or near Boston, then they are not to have said sum or any part thereof.

On the 30th of September, 1778, action was taken relating to the formation of a new Constitution of the State. A resolution was passed sturdily declining to empower the House of Representatives to enact a plan of government, alleging as reasons that they were totally unacquainted with the capacities and patriotism and character of the members that compose the said House and Council, excepting our own member; also because they were not elected for that purpose, and the present embarrassed state of public affairs calls for the steady attention of every member of said House. They resolved to choose one or more members to unite with representatives from other towns for the sole purpose of adopting a plan of government. They further resolved that it appeared to them absolutely necessary for the liberty and safety of this State that the plan of government, when formed and published, should not be established till the people of this State have time and opportunity to thoroughly examine the same, and shall consent that it be established by the said State Convention.

On the 18th of February, 1777, it was voted to give fourteen pounds to each soldier enlisting for three years or the war. Numerous meetings were held during this and the following year. On the 28th of May, 1778, most elaborate instructions were given to Thomas Crane, their representative, but as the cry among the ancient Romans was that Carthage must be destroyed, so the central purpose in all their instructions was a vigorous prosecution of the war. Esquire Crane was also directed to oppose the Constitution then offered, because it had no bill of rights for its foundation, and was therefore inconsistent with the happiness and safety of the public. The citations I have made give but a very imperfect idea of the spirit of patriotism and of self-sacrifice that is so conspicuous in your town records of the Revolutionary period. The intelligent comprehension of the principle of government, the jealous guardianship of liberty, their self-reliance, the stern determination to resist oppression on the one hand and to secure and enforce all proper restraints on the other, are remarkable. Steadfast purpose and unflinching will breathe forth upon every page.

The history of nations shows that republics are a short-lived family. The republics of Greece and Rome, of Holland and France, of South America and Mexico, have chiefly been conspicuous in their failure. Our country is so large that, whatever superiority of race on the part of early Anglo-Saxon settlers there may be, the rapid immigration invited from all parts of the world would largely neutralize it. In the face of the long list of failures, so unvarying that they seemed inevitable, what gave the founders of this republic courage to make another experiment? Liberty is seductive; but liberty without law is merely license; the result is chaos; and any attempt at self-government ignobly fails when laws are not strictly enforced. A small population in a compact territory affords the most favorable chance for self-government; but how difficult to govern in the same way is a mighty nation, extending over a large territory, pursuits divers, interests conflicting, no intimate interchange of sentiment one section with another. But even the small population in a compact territory has failed to perpetuate a republican form of government; how much less likely to succeed would the large nation be. Granted that the framers of the Constitution were wise, that they gave most careful research and study to the great problem before them; granted that their work was as admirable as human skill could make it, still that would not have insured success. The reason must be found elsewhere, and is this: that the development of the people has kept pace with the foreseeing wisdom of the fathers. This country has existed as a republic largely because of the general diffusion of education, the enlightenment of the masses, and the circulation of the press; so that it is possible for every citizen to become acquainted with current events, and daily watch the progress of national affairs. He is enabled to take a comprehensive view of public questions, and thus overcome tendencies to bigotry and prejudice. In this way the grand consummation has been reached, and in the words of the martyr Lincoln, "a government by the people and for the people" has become possible. It has been demonstrated that it can endure the trying ordeal of success and prosperity. It has successfully encountered the enervating tendencies of wealth and luxury. It has resisted effectually the disintegrating influences of conflicting interests, showing a cohesive power without a parallel; and in our late civil war, a devotion hitherto apparently dormant, and therefore unsuspected, was displayed pre-eminently; bravery and self-sacrifice in the field, courage on the toilsome and weary march, and heroic endurance in rebel prisons. How fully were realized and exemplified the memorable words of Sir Philip Sidney, "glorious is it in a noble cause to bear its suffering and misery." And the bones of Northern men that have whitened on battle-fields along the Mississippi, upon lonely mountain sides on the low lands where the magnolia blooms, "grieving if aught inanimate ever grieves over the unreturning brave," and in the gloom of the wilderness where thousands, like the "Light Brigade at Balaklava," rushed into the very jaws of death, bear testimony to the priceless value of our national life.

One grand element that has contributed to the example of self-government we present is the race to which we belong. I confess the multitudes that have come, and still are coming, from across the ocean through our open gates constitute no small part of the forty-four millions that to-day live under the national flag. Yet Plymouth Rock receives homage from every State, and the nucleus there formed has assimilated in no small degree to itself the foreign elements that have clustered around it. The Puritans, of whom so many of you are lineal descendants, had ingrafted upon their robust natures and strong wills a love of liberty, and what they esteemed a pure religion, that no danger could appall nor sufferings lessen. With rare fortitude they endured hardships cheerfully that lay in the pathway of achievement. I have too much respect for their judgment to suppose that they courted hardships. I do not for a moment presume they voluntarily chose the sterile lands of Cape Cod for agricultural purposes. They showed the good sense to elect the fertile valleys of the Hudson; but a chance breeze and a bribed captain landed them on the icy shore of Plymouth. Grim winter extended its cold arms to receive them; thirty savage tribes and an unbroken wilderness offered an impassable barrier to any overland route to their place of destination; but their courage never faltered, for

"Amid the storms they rang,
And the stars heard, and the sea;
And the sounding aisles of the dim woods rang
To the anthem of the free."

And their religious enthusiasm inspired them in dangers, in disease and death. How marvelous was the courage of the early reformers!

When Martin Luther was summoned before the Diet of Worms, and friends told him—what he well knew—that if he went, it would be at the peril of his life, he answered, "Were there as many devils as tiles upon the housetops, I would go." And when Catholicism combined to crush out Protestantism from the Netherlands, William of Orange gave utterance to the immortal words that rather than suffer it they would tear up the dikes and give Holland back to the ocean. Theodore Parker will not be suspected of fondness for Calvinism; yet he declared that out of the rugged doctrine of John Calvin had developed the grandest virtue of the human race. And what soldiers its disciples made! I claim that the army of Oliver Cromwell was the finest the world ever saw; an army that was always successful, so that upon sight of the enemy they raised a shout of joy, for battle to them meant victory. Uniting perfect discipline with religious zeal, they fought under a firm conviction of duty. Marshal Turenne expressed the delight of a true soldier when he learned that it was the fashion of Cromwell's pikemen to rejoice greatly when they beheld the enemy; and the banished cavaliers could not repress an emotion of national pride when they saw a brigade of their roundhead countrymen, outnumbered by foes and abandoned by allies, drive before it in headlong rout the finest infantry of Spain, and force a passage into fortifications pronounced impregnable by the ablest marshal of France,—snatching victory from the very jaws of defeat. To such men liberty to act according to their own conscience was dearer than life; and the qualities that made them eminent in war also made them conspicuous in peace. According to Macaulay, when they were disbanded, the royalists confessed that in every department of honest industry these warriors prospered beyond other men; that none was charged with theft, that none was heard to ask an alms, and that if a baker, a mason, or a wagoner attracted notice by his diligence and sobriety, he was in all probability one of Cromwell's old soldiers.

War is demoralizing, and in no respect more strikingly than in its effect upon the soldiers engaged. Moral firmness alone can transform the inmates of camps and the veterans of battle-fields into the peaceful and industrious citizen, and our own soldiers, both in the Revolution and the late war, clearly betrayed their ancestral traits in their return to the vocations of daily life.

The Puritans and their descendants, by virtue of this quality of courage, of fortitude, of intelligent industry, prospered in spite of sterility of soil. Their thrift prevailed over natural disadvantages. They grappled with the forests, and with brawny arms overthrew them, and such was their persuasive energy that they converted sand and rock into fertility. And when the West disclosed its vast superiority of soil, instead of deserting the homes of their fathers for the fairer promise towards the setting sun, they supplemented the sinewy arm by the active and inventive brain, and manufactories sprang up filled with cunning machinery, so that the hum of industry filled the land. "Where once the rank thistle nodded in the wind and the wild fox dug his hole unscared," evidences of civilization appear on every side.

While race has contributed to the permanence of our institutions, education, as I have before indicated, in the broadest sense is the great bulwark. Like the primeval rocks to the sea, it underlies and overtops them. By it the experience of the past has been fully utilized and an approximation to the true standard of self-government been reached, for, as it means a government by the people, therefore whatever broadens their knowledge increases their capacity for statesmanship. By education all things that come to us in life take deeper root; they widen their significance. We learn to use that which otherwise would be valueless, as the best appliances in tools and machinery are valueless without the skill to detect and employ them. Instances are recorded of self-taught men who have, unaided, forced their way into the laboratory of nature, who read the unwritten language of things, who discover truths in the melody of birds, in the sighing winds, who read it in the beauty that trails along the tall grass, and is radiant in leaf and flower; men who go beyond the surface of things, beyond the defined limits of human knowledge into untrodden space, and, as has been said, sharpen their eyes until they see into the earth and lengthen their arms until they reach the stars. But these exceptions are rare; few of us have time or inclination to investigate. We act upon what is told us, what we read, what we learn. The tables of education must be spread for us, or we are likely to lose our intellectual nourishment. Our fathers recognized its importance. After providing for their spiritual welfare by securing a good orthodox minister, they gave next their attention to the schoolmaster, and the modest school-house found place wherever the early settlers dwelt.

The third element that secures to us a republican form of government is a love of liberty, freedom to manage our national affairs whether they relate to civil or religious questions, and by common consent, since our fathers recovered from the mania of hanging Quakers and drowning witches, religious toleration has prevailed. Love of liberty is to the republic what the spirit is to the body, animating and inspiring it. Not stronger among Americans than among other races. We cannot forget the frantic struggle of Poland and Hungary to be free. We cannot forget how France in her ill-fated but heroic efforts has floated again and again upon a sea of blood. We remember with sorrow the misfortunes of Lafayette, Kosciusko, and Kossuth; we admire individual gallantry like that of Arnold von Winkelreid, of glorious memory, who threw himself on the spears of his country's enemies,—

"'Make way for liberty!' he cried;
'Make way for liberty!' and died."

And we are inspired by the burning words of Roger De Lisle,—

"Oh, liberty, can man resign thee,
Once having felt thy glorious flame;
Can tyrants' laws or bolts confine thee,
And thus thy noble spirit tame?"

words which not only kindled the torch of freedom in France, but wherever the spirit of independence dwelt. But while Americans may not either in deeds or literature have created the sensation that other races have, yet they have been eminently practical; their success has been due to the fact that they have never lost their head in their struggles for liberty. Victories did not unreasonably elate nor defeat unduly depress.

I am mindful that your anniversary and the nation's anniversary occur at a season of depression and want; that while commercial gloom settles over our large cities, in the country villages the wheels of manufactories are stopped and labor begs in vain for employment, but we realize to-day how much greater trials our fathers endured and how bravely they endured them, and we know that they received their reward in blessings that crowned their days. We know that behind the black cloud that overhangs us the imperial sun walks in splendor, and we know that we dwell in a country that has all the elements of success and prosperity, and therefore the future must be secure. And over your past it is fitting that you should rejoice; that you should have accomplished so much; that such energy has been displayed; that religion and education should have received such generous support from your hands. Splendid promise so often results in splendid failure, that when a great work or a good work is fairly accomplished congratulation is in order, and not till then. And it is said the ancients wisely praised not that ship that started with flying colors from port, but only that brave sailor that came back with torn sheets and battered sides, stripped of her banners, but having outridden the storm. Doubt not that in days of disaster relief is at hand. Judge the future by the past. Distrust not humanity because man is false and shouts for reform while he practices knavery, for if the heart of the people was not right and honest, professions of virtue would not be necessary and successful in securing trusts only to betray them.

The season is auspicious for your festivities. The benediction of a summer sky bends above our heads, and the perfection of midsummer splendor lies at our feet. All nature is in harmony with the occasion. Her deep green and rich bloom lend us the choicest decorations. Though one hundred years have gone, we believe that our national life is but just begun; that the republic shall endure when the very stones over our graves have crumbled to dust; that the flag that waves above us to-day shall float as long as the earth bears a plant or the sea rolls a wave; and when a century hence the people of this ancient town meet to celebrate their own anniversary, the second centennial of the republic, while they proclaim the valor and the patriotism of the fathers of freedom in this land, they will also remember with pride this generation, and your children's children will be cheered and inspired by your deeds and your memories "as after sunset the dew revives the world."

Ecclesiastical History—Universalist Church—Congregational Church—Methodist Episcopal Church—Roman Catholic Church—Methodist Episcopal Church, North Stoughton—Baptist Church, East Stoughton.

Universalist Church.¹—There are tablets in the church belonging to the parish in Stoughton, one on either side of the pulpit, which present its history in brief. Perhaps these tablets may be a sufficient history for some; they at least suggest all that need be said in a more extended account as may properly be presented at the beginning of this article. The one on the right of the pulpit reads as follows:

"First Parish.

Remodeled and enlarged A.D. 1870."

On the left of the pulpit appears the ministerial succession of the church:

The history of the parish antedates that of the church. It begins Nov. 9, 1743, with a petition to "his Excellency, William Shirley, Esq., Captⁿ-General and Governour-in-Chief in and over his Majesty's Province, to the Honorables, his Majesty's Council and Representatives, in General Court assembled," for a division of the First Precinct of the town of Stoughton. This petition was urged by George Talbot, Simon Stearns, and Ralf Pope, the reason for it being, as set forth by the petitioners, "the vast difficulties both with regard to the public worship of God and the management of the affairs of the Precinct to which we belong, on account of the great distance many of us live from the place of public worship, it being almost seven miles." The "place of public worship" here referred to was what is now the Unitarian Church at Canton Corner. The prayer of the petitioners was granted on the day on which it was preferred, and thus—what is now Canton being the first, and what is now Sharon being the second—was the Third Precinct in Stoughton incorporated. The first meeting of the new precinct was held Dec. 12, 1843, at the house of Capt. George Talbot. Capt. George Talbot was elected clerk, and he, with Simon Stearns and Ralf Pope, constituted the first prudential committee. At this meeting a vote was passed to raise forty pounds for preaching "the present year and the year ensuing as far as it will go." At a meeting held December 26th it was voted to build a meeting-house, forty-five by thirty-five, on land given for the purpose by Daniel Talbot. The church was incorporated Aug. 10, 1744. About a month later a call was extended to Mr. Thomas Jones to become pastor. The precinct seems to have concurred with the church only so far as to hire Mr. Jones for three months. When the church was completed does not appear, but it was ready for a service of baptism May 23, 1745. On the 6th day of September following it was unanimously voted to call Mr. Jedediah Adams, of Braintree (now Quincy), to the pastorate of the church, three hundred pounds old tenor being allowed "for his settling with us, as also for a salary, yearly, of one hundred and eighty pounds." Later twenty cords of wood per year were added to the salary, and it was voted that the pay should vary with variances in the price of corn and meat in the Boston market. Mr. Adams' pastorate began Jan. 5, 1746, though the ordination did not take place until February 19th.

There is not very much to be noted during the pastorate of Mr. Adams except the general and very even prosperity of the precinct. In 1765 the Third Precinct became the Second, the Second having become a separate town—Sharon. At a meeting held April 10, 1782, move was made for another division of the town, and Thomas Crane, Maj. Robert Sevan, Capt. Jedediah Southworth, Capt. Peter Talbot, and Capt. James Pope were appointed a committee to consult as to the necessary measures to be taken. By their recommendations petitions were presented to the town and to the General Court, but were refused. At the same meeting a committee was appointed to "inspect y^e conduct of y^e people on y^e Lord's days, and call those by name in time of divine service, that profane the Lord's day." If the precinct could manage the Court it could manage its own members. The money with which the people now had to deal was perplexing to them; one treasurer's report they were not able to understand until it was translated into silver currency. Then a balance of over twenty-four hundred pounds became only thirty-two pounds, one silver dollar being worth seventy-five of those in circulation. In 1785 the precinct received a bequest of land, enlarging the church lot from Christopher Wadsworth. At about this time a committee, consisting of Samuel Talbot, Jedediah Southworth, and Joshua Morse, recommended that for the future the town raise all the money for the purpose of schooling and that none be raised by the precinct. It seems that in 1792 Mr. Adams' health began to fail, for it was voted at the March meeting of the precinct "to be in a way to settle a minister." On May 28th it was voted to give

Mr. Edward Richmond a call to the work of the gospel ministry. Mr. Richmond's letter of acceptance shows him to have been a man of pious sentiments and feeble health. He invokes the blessing of God upon himself and people, and the indulgence of frequent exchanges in his ministry. The ordination was appointed to take place on the 28th of November. Thanksgiving being appointed on the next day, the ordination was postponed until December 5th, when Rev. Edward Richmond became the colleague of the aged Mr. Adams. Final settlement was not made with Mr. Adams until 1795, when forty pounds were offered him for a discharge in full for his services as a minister. Though the amount due him was much more than this, yet, "consulting ye best interest of ye parish, and wishing to have them in peace and harmony," he satisfied himself with the offer. Mr. Adams lived, and was practically senior pastor of the parish, until Feb. 25, 1799. Then, in his eighty-ninth year, and the fifty-third of his pastorate, occurred his death. Having received the honors of Harvard University in 1733, and having constantly added by "natural inquisitiveness" to his store, he must have served his charge with a large knowledge, as well as with a pure character. His colleague wrote of him at the time of his death, "Constitutionally mild and benevolent, he was easily formed to a candid and liberal mode of thinking. His manners soft, modest, and unassuming, received the finishing touch of genuine politeness. It may be truly said of him that he was learned without pedantry, polite without affectation, moral without austerity, pious without superstition, and devout without enthusiasm."

It is a pity that during the pastorate of Mr. Adams no church record was kept so as to be now available; only the incorporation of the church, and the first church covenant, the covenant of the Congregational Churches in general, with the names of twenty-four signers, are in the old church book. The church record, as preserved, really begins with the call of Rev. Mr. Richmond, dated May 28, 1792. In 1795 Lieut. Roger Sumner and Lieut. John Holmes were chosen deacons of the church. In 1799, probably on the incorporation of Canton, the second precinct became the parish in Stoughton. In 1797 the treasurer's report is for the first time in dollars and cents. The church is looking after absentees, and clothing those unable suitably to clothe themselves for attendance upon divine service. Now denominational difficulties begin to arise, the Methodists claiming the money of some taxables in the regular precinct church. A movement is made for the protection of the ancient buttonwood-trees still standing on the church green.

Thus early the spirit of the "Improvement Society" appears. A church member, Jeremiah Vose, is dealt with mercifully for intoxication and profanity. At the parish meeting a man is chosen "to see that the women stow clost in the seats in the meeting-house on Sunday."

In 1798 and 1799 resort was had to law by other denominations, Methodists and Baptists, to secure the money of some taxes in the parish church. Dr. Peter Adams, Capt. Samuel Talbot, Capt. John Pope, Mr. Samuel Shephard, and Lieut. John Atherton were chosen to defend the parish. Their defense seems to have been successful, only as much being allowed these other denominations as the committee on public worship was willing to allow. In 1800, Mr. Richmond, reminding the parish of the depreciation in the value of money since his settlement, asks with manliness and modesty for an increase in his salary. In spite of this request the salary was not permanently advanced until 1816, though from year to year money was voted him in addition to it. In 1801 a new meeting-house began to be talked about. It was difficult for the parish to agree as to the house, and before 1805, when the job was given into the hands of Mr. Richmond, builder, of Middleborough, the pews were sold three times. The fourth sale stood, and plans were made for a house fifty-eight by fifty-eight feet, to be built at a cost of seven thousand five hundred dollars. A quarter of an acre of land was now given the parish by Mrs. Abigail, widow of Lemuel Drake. Upon this the main body of the church now stands, the most of the former bequest by Lieut. Daniel Talbot being included in the yard in front of the church. The church lot, containing one acre and twenty-three rods, was now complete. In 1802 the singing of the psalm or hymn, "in separate parts," by the deacon at the service of communion was discontinued, and the regular singers—the present musical society—were invited to assist at such service. In 1803 the church stopped after sacramental lecture, and received from Mr. Ephraim Copeland, of Boston, "an elegant quarto Bible for the use of the sanctuary. It was then voted that in future a portion of sacred Scripture be read as a book of public worship." In 1805 the parish received a farm, the bequest of Lemuel Drake. This property is still held by the society, and is known as the Chemung lot. In 1806, July 2d, 3d, and 4th, the meeting-house was raised. In 1807 the bell and clock were placed, and it was voted that the bell should be rung, as now, at nine o'clock Sunday mornings for regular church services, and tolled on the death of members of the parish. In 1808, Rev. Nehemiah Coye (Methodist) demanded the taxes of members of the parish. It was finally voted that the taxes of Stephen Briggs and Jacob Monk be paid over to said Coye, and that the taxes of these gentlemen be remitted, and they be left out of the parish bills in the future so long as they remain steady members of the Methodist society, and help support a regular Methodist minister. In this year the church passed a vote inviting the sisters to stop when any business was to be transacted after divine service. This courtesy seems almost to have been induced by service rendered. The ladies had made a generous contribution toward furnishing and trimming the new pulpit. The church was formally accepted by the parish May 23d, and dedicated June 2d. Before the dedication it was desirable that the green should receive attention. It was voted that the people be notified when to work, that the work be done gratis, and "that the parish be at the cost of their grog." About this time it was voted "to give up the pews over the westerly stairs to the blacks or people of color until March." For several years, now, things go on pleasantly and prosperously. In 1813 a sermon of Mr. Richmond's was asked for publication, and a committee was appointed to ask him not to preach politics in the pulpit either on Sundays or days of thanksgiving or fasting. In 1815 Watts' Hymn-Book was displaced by Belknap's. In 1816 the society seems, for the first time, to have a stove for the church,—a present from William Austin. In December, 1816, difficulties growing beyond hope of adjustment, Mr. Richmond sent in his letter of resignation. The reason for this action was, he said, that it had "long been evident that the labors of others were more acceptable." It is doubtless true that some of his parishioners desired a change in the pastorate, yet this desire cannot have been as general as he imagined. But a short time before twenty pounds had been permanently added to his salary, and now his resignation was accepted reluctantly,—at the first vote it was not accepted. Finally a committee, appointed to consult with Mr. Richmond, "with great reluctance" advised the acceptance of his resignation, and he was dismissed. The council which was called to ratify his dismissal, expressions of the society recorded and traditionary, together with such works of his as are now available, bear testimony that he was a man of character and ability. Whatever dissatisfaction existed was not on account of these things. Neither was it on account of Mr. Richmond's theology, though in the unsettled condition of opinion in those times there may have been some who objected to him on this score. The opposition was chiefly political, without doubt, and had been growing since the time when he was asked not to preach politics. January 15th Mr. Richmond's pastorate came to an end. In September of the same year, Mr. Ebenezer Gay, of Walpole, was called; after some discussion and variation of the conditions of the case, Mr. Gay accepted it, and was ordained Jan. 7, 1818. The church voted that strangers of regular standing in any denomination be invited to stay to communion. In May, 1819, the church voted it "inexpedient any longer to require of candidates for admission a particular confession of antecedent immoralities." There was an article in the warrant this year to "see if it is the will of the parish that Mr. Thaddeus Pomroy be debarred from preaching again in the meeting-house in Stoughton until he makes acknowledgment for once and again insulting and disturbing the society in said house."

In 1820 dissatisfaction with Rev. Mr. Gay begins to appear. Repeated endeavors were made to have him dismissed until 1822, when conditions were made with him and his pastorate immediately terminated. The reason for dissatisfaction was his strict Calvinism. Opposition to liberal views was carried so far under him that formal complaints were made against those who revealed sympathies for Methodism, and a Universalist, Mr. Samuel Bird, was excommunicated. The church was not used to such severe interpretations and applications of theology. According to those whose opinion is of worth in the matter, it had inherited no such theology from the mother church, now the Unitarian in Canton. The first pastor, a member of the liberal Adams family in Quincy, and predisposed, as Dr. Richmond has shown us from his very make up, "to a candid and liberal mode of thinking," did not certainly cultivate in the church any such views. And Dr. Richmond himself was liberal, becoming afterwards, if he was not now, a professed Unitarian. The church had not been used to such theology as that presented by Mr. Gay. That was the reason, doubtless, why he was dropped so quickly. And that he was thus dropped is another evidence that the church had not been schooled to such views. In 1821 seventy-eight members were reported as in good and regular standing in the church. On July 3, 1822, nine of these were present at a meeting at which a majority of seven voted to separate themselves "and hold public worship in such places as Providence may from time to time direct." These, with others who were gathered to them, and led by Rev. Mr. Gay, first held their services in a hall over what is now Swan's store, corner of Washington and Wyman Streets, and were the beginning of the present Congregationalist society in this town. Mr. Gay carried the church records with him to his new movement. They were recovered some years afterwards by the First Church. It was some time after the separation before the parish settled upon a pastor. There seems to have been a short pastorate, beginning in 1824 and continuing a little past the annual parish meeting, in 1825, which has found no mention on our tablet. The minister was Mr. Ephraim Randall. During this time some who had gone away showed a disposition to return, and a committee was chosen to confer with them. A vote was passed in 1825 to raise three hundred dollars for the ensuing year, three-fourths to be for Unitarian and one-fourth for Universalist preaching. In 1826 it was voted to have eight months Unitarian and four months Universalist preaching. In 1827 it was voted to inform the Unitarian association of "the penniless condition of the church," and ask for help. October 8th, Mr. Wm. L. Stearns was invited to settle over the parish for five years, at four hundred and fifty dollars per year. Mr. Stearns accepted the call, and was ordained November 21st. The next year the parish received help to the amount of one hundred and fifty dollars from the Evangelical Missionary Society. For the first time apparently the church was insured this year,—amount, three thousand dollars. On Dec. 13, 1830, a vote was passed to dismiss Rev. Mr. Stearns from the pastorate, "his religious sentiments not agreeing with the majority of the society." Mr. Stearns was Unitarian, the prevailing sentiment was Universalist, and Rev. Massena B. Ballou, who still lives in town, and who had been invited to the pastorate before Mr. Stearns' settlement, was again called, and immediately became pastor. The Unitarians now separated themselves from the parish, and started a society of their own. It was not long, however, before they were back in the old church. The history of the parish under Mr. Ballou's administration shows steady prosperity. In 1832 a new bell was purchased, Lemuel Gay, Jonathan Linfield, and Wm. S. Belcher being the committee to obtain it. In 1834, voted that the inhabitants of East Stoughton have their proportion of the preaching. April 23, 1835, a new and distinctively Universalist covenant, or "church agreement," was adopted, and shortly after a constitution for the government of the church. Brother Robert Porter, Jr., and Brother Albert Johnson were elected deacons.

In 1830 the church devotes the interest of its funds to the purchase of a Sunday-school library. At this time fifty-three members had joined the church and signed the covenant. In 1840 the church gave its fund of two hundred and forty-four dollars to help pay a little parish debt. In 1841 Deacon Johnson requested dismissal from the deaconate, and Thomas Capen was elected in his place. In the next year, on motion of Amasa Southworth, a vote was passed opening the house to temperance meetings when it should be sought for them. In 1843 candidates were elected to General Convention, and the church began to feel the strength of membership in a larger organization. In 1848 the parish found itself strong enough to remodel the church, at an expense of fifteen hundred dollars. The upper part was finished off to hold meetings in, and the vestry, called from that time Chemung Hall, was created. This year the pews began to be let at auction. In 1853, as he writes at the time, "after an agreeable and happy connection of twenty-two years," Mr. Ballou closed his pastorate with the parish. The reason for his withdrawal was poor health. The committee appointed to draw up resolutions in view of Mr. Ballou's resignation bore unqualified testimony to his usefulness in the ministry, and his manly, Christian conduct everywhere. In their loss of a pastor, they had the best comfort possible to them, in the fact that the friend would remain with them,—their neighbor still and fellow-worker. Eighty-four years old, Mr. Ballou is still a valued member of the parish, interested as ever in its work, and comforted by its faith. In 1854, Rev. J. W. Dennis was called to the pastorate. Brother Albert Johnson was chosen deacon, and it was voted to celebrate communion the first Sunday in each month. In 1855, Mr. Dennis seems to have been kept from his pulpit by sickness. A record in the parish book is something of an index to the feeling which existed toward him at the time. An article was in the warrant "to see if the parish will authorize their treasurer to pay Rev. J. W. Dennis his salary for the quarter ending June 30th. Voted 'yes' unanimously." In 1856 movement was first made for an organ. On the committee appointed over this business were Jesse Holmes, James Hill, Jr., Alanson Belcher, James Atherton, Luther Leach, James Swan, Albert Dickerman, S. W. Hayden, and Wm. S. Belcher. The organ was not procured until the next year, and the final report of the committee, rejoicing in the liberality of the parish and exulting chiefly in the fact "that now the organ speaks for itself," was not made until 1858. Steadily gaining, spiritually and materially, nothing of particular note took place until 1863, when Mr. Dennis, on account of sickness, handed in his resignation. Though willing to grant all necessary time for the treatment of his troubles, the parish was not willing to accept his resignation. They did not accept it. Even though they buried him before the end of the year, they never accepted his resignation. They hold him among them now, and he works for them, making them better when they think of him. In 1864 Rev. A. St. John Chambré became pastor. In 1865 the afternoon service was dropped and the Sunday-school was held at the hour devoted to it. The success of Mr. Chambré's pastorate at this stage appears in the improved state of the finances of the parish. From twelve hundred dollars the first year the minister's salary was easily advanced to two thousand the third, and in the sixth (1870) the parish was able to remodel its church at a cost of over eleven thousand dollars. This amount was paid within a little over two thousand dollars when the work was done, and the parish found itself in possession of a most comfortable, appropriate, and beautiful temple of worship. The committee who had this work in charge were composed of the following gentlemen: Luther S. Leach, Horace N. Tucker, Robert Porter, Jr., James Atherton, J. F. Ellis, Henry Ward, Rev. Mr. Chambré. In 1872, by the death of the clerk, the parish lost its organization, and appeal had to be made to a justice before a meeting could be called. Mr. Chambré resigned his pastorate April 1st of this year, after nine years of able and successful service. In highly eulogistic resolutions the parish has put on record its appreciation of him and his service. In 1873 Joseph K. Masson, while yet a student, was called to the pastorate. No event of particular moment marks the period of his stay. Young, inexperienced as the new minister was, his ability was yet equal to holding the society up to the high standard to which it had been raised, until, in 1875, he was reluctantly surrendered to a persistent society in Connecticut. In April following Rev. H. B. Smith was unanimously invited to the pastorate. With good ability and the hearty co-operation of the people, the promise of Mr. Smith's success seemed bright. By his efforts, apparently, the parish membership was considerably increased. He rendered the society good service in raising the debt of about three thousand dollars in 1879. On account of domestic trouble, however, he was obliged to resign in November of this year. The troubles of the minister were the misfortune of the society as well, and this, with two years of candidating and the loss of a few strong men by death, materially depleted its strength. With good congregations and a large Sunday-school, it is yet strong, however, and hopes for further growth. The pastor is Rev. C. R. Tenney, settled Sept. 1, 1882.

Among names prominent through all the history of the society, and still connected with it, are Atherton, Monk, and Talbot. The first clerk of church and parish was a Talbot. The present clerk of the parish, who has held the office with one short break since 1845, is Jabez Talbot, of the same family. Very early other names appear, among which are Capen, Southworth, Gay, Bird, Drake, Swan, Johnson, Wales, Belcher, Holmes, Crane, and Paul. These names have given the parish its prosperity. It surely shall not want prosperity while they remain.

The records of the parish are the main source of this sketch. These records have been remarkably well kept by the following list of clerks: George Talbot, succeeded in 1746 by Capt. Preserved Capen; succeeded in 1758 by David Capen; succeeded in 1769 by Benjamin Bird; succeeded in 1770 by Robert Capen; succeeded in 1771 by David Capen; succeeded in 1790 by Andrew Capen; succeeded in 1793 by Peter Adams; succeeded in 1797 by Seth Morton; succeeded in 1800 by Abram Capen; succeeded in 1805 by Jedediah Atherton; succeeded the same year by Seth Morton; succeeded in 1807 by George Monk; succeeded in 1808 by Richard Talbot; succeeded in 1810 by Jonathan Battles; succeeded in 1812 by Solomon Talbot; succeeded in 1814 by John Toy; succeeded in 1816 by Elijah Atherton; succeeded in 1818 by Abner Drake; succeeded in 1821 by Jeremiah Capen; succeeded in 1822 by Israel Guild; succeeded in 1823 by Elijah Atherton; succeeded in 1826 by James Swan; succeeded in 1830 by Ahira Porter; succeeded in 1831 by Enos Talbot; succeeded in 1845 by Jabez Talbot, Jr.; succeeded in 1867 by F. B. Upham; succeeded in 1871 by Luther Leach; succeeded in 1875 by Jabez Talbot, Jr.

Congregational Church.¹—The present church organization is the result of a division in the old church, which occurred in 1822. At this time a majority of the society and a minority of the church became interested in Unitarian and Universalist doctrines. The majority of the church holding to the orthodox faith withdrew, and thus left the property in the possession of the other party. We find the early records filled with the account of this separation and the controversies that grew out of it. This, however, is now only a matter of historical interest to either society, and they exist side by side with the utmost good feeling.

The following is a list of pastors of the old church before the separation in 1822:

Rev. Thomas Jones, of Dorchester, was called to the pastorate Sept. 1, 1744. His stay could not have been over one year, and it does not appear that he was ever installed.

Rev. Jedediah Adams was called to the pastorate Sept. 6, 1745, and installed Jan. 31, 1746.

Rev. Edward Richmond was called to the pastorate May 28, 1792, installed Dec. 5, 1792, and was dismissed, at his request, Jan. 5, 1817.

Rev. Ebenezer Gay was called to the pastorate Sept. 21, 1817, installed Jan. 7, 1818, continued in office until the separation, in 1822, when he was regularly dismissed, and then ministered to the orthodox party for some time.

There were seventy-eight members of the church in 1821, one year before the separation, twenty-seven males and fifty-one females.

Nathan Drake and Samuel Tolman were deacons of the church, and remained with the orthodox party after the separation.

The church met July 1, 1822, and appointed a day of "fasting, humiliation, and prayer" on account of the difficulties of their situation. It was also voted at this time to call a council to advise in regard to the dismissal of the pastor and the settlement of the difficulties which threatened such evil to the church. At the close of the public religious services of this day of fasting, a meeting of the church was called at the house of the pastor, at which the following motion, brought forward by Deacon Drake and laid upon the table at a former meeting, was passed, seven voting in the affirmative and two in the negative:

"In consequence of the exertions which have been made of late, by certain persons in this place, to deprive us of the enjoyment of gospel privileges and the dispensation of those doctrines which are according to our belief and profession, in separating from us our present pastor; and this with the proposed design to substitute in the room thereof a more liberal and loose kind of preaching! Be it voted by this church that it is expedient for us to associate and form ourselves into a religious society, with certain other persons in this place who may be disposed to unite with us for the purpose of maintaining the gospel according to the principles and practices of our forefathers, who came to this country for the sake of establishing a church founded upon Christ and Him crucified; and of maintaining and defending the doctrine of grace, and that we henceforth hold public worship in such places as Providence may from time to time direct." A council was called which approved the action of the church, while regretting that difficulties had arisen rendering the division necessary. We find at this time that Dr. "Watts' Psalm and Hymns" were reintroduced.

The church first met for worship at the house of Mr. Daniel Hayward, now Mr. Swan's store. "There in an upper room the church held their first communion after the separation, and there their beloved pastor preached to them his farewell sermon from Acts xx. 25." After a few months they met for worship in "a commodious hall" in the store belonging to Mr. William Holbrook. Here they continued until their new church was built and dedicated June 1, 1825. The dedicatory sermon was preached by Rev. Ebenezer Gay, the church never having been in a condition to settle a new pastor. The church record their gratitude to the neighboring ministers and churches, and also to the Domestic Missionary Society for financial aid. They were blessed with the labors of a number of devoted ministers. Among these was Mr. Job Cushman, during whose labors the church was blessed with "a small revival, but however small, a greater one than was ever known in the town before."

Rev. Calvin Park, D.D., was invited to supply the pulpit in May, 1825, and in October of the same year was called to the pastorate, which invitation he accepted. A council was called for his installation, and convened Dec. 13, 1826. This was an exceedingly large and able council, consisting of eighteen churches. In this installation Rev. John Ferguson, of East Attleboro', made the introductory prayer; Rev. Dr. Emmond, of Franklin, preached the sermon; Rev. Richard S. Storrs, of Braintree, made the installing prayer; Rev. Elisha Fish, of Wrentham, gave the charge to the pastor; Rev. Ebenezer Burgess, of Dedham, gave the right hand of fellowship, and Rev. William Cogswell made the address to the people.

The weekly prayer-meeting, to be held in different parts of the society, was instituted by vote of the church March 25, 1827. On May 13th of the same year the Sabbath-school was opened and Mr. Samuel Tolman chosen as the first superintendent. He having declined to serve, the pastor was elected Oct. 15, 1829. The church adopted the articles of faith and covenant of the church of Dedham instead of that under which they were originally organized.

The church voted, Nov. 20, 1831, to hold a protracted meeting. Those meetings were well attended, and resulted in great good. Thirty persons seem to have united with the church as the result of those meetings. The church took the following action on temperance July 19, 1832: "As the friends of God are at the present time making great efforts to prevent the use of distilled liquors, and believing the use of them as a drink is a sin against God and essentially hurtful to the best interests of man, both temporal and spiritual, we do as a church hereby solemnly resolve that we will abstain wholly from the use of them, except as a medicine; that we will not provide them either for company, or for those who may be engaged in our employment, and that we will make exertions to suppress both the use and the traffic of them throughout the community."

Dr. Park resigned the pastoral office May 24, 1840, but at the request of the church he continued with them until his successor was chosen.

At a council held Nov. 4, 1840, Dr. Park was dismissed, and Rev. Henry Eddy, who had been called by the church, was installed. Seven churches united in this council. In the installing services, Rev. Paul Couch, of North Bridgewater, made the introductory prayer. Rev. R. S. Storrs, D.D., of Braintree, preached the sermon. Rev. Calvin Hitchcock, D.D., of Randolph, made the installing prayer. Rev. Ebenezer Burgess, D.D., of Dedham, gave the charge to the pastor. Rev. Edward Cleveland, of Stoneham, gave the right hand of fellowship, and Rev. D. A. Grosvener made a concluding prayer. Friday, Jan. 1, 1841, was observed as a day of fasting, on account of the low state of religion. These days of fasting were often appointed by the church.

Some difficulty having arisen in regard to Rev. Henry Eddy's dismission, he requested the church to unite with him in calling a mutual council. These matters were afterwards satisfactorily adjusted, and he was regularly dismissed by a council held Aug. 13, 1844.

At a meeting of the church held June 11, 1846, Rev. Wm. W. Cornwell was called to minister to them as acting pastor, and he seems to have served the church for at least one year.

The Monthly Foreign Missionary Concert was instituted June 11, 1846.

The church met Sept. 26, 1850, and voted unanimously to call the Rev. Albert Perry, of New Ipswich, to become their pastor.

The council called for the installation of the Rev. Albert Perry, consisting of eleven churches, met Jan. 8, 1851.

The following persons participated: Invocation and reading of the Scriptures by Rev. L. R. Phillips, of Sharon; introductory prayer by Rev. Paul Couch, of North Bridgewater; sermon by Professor Edwards A. Park, D.D., of Andover Theological Seminary; charge to the pastor by Rev. Samuel Lee, of New Ipswich; right hand of fellowship by Rev. Horace James Wrentham; charge to the people by Rev. D. Huntington, of North Bridgewater. Concluding prayer by Rev. Luther Sheldon, of Easton.

The new church was dedicated Wednesday, June 28, 1852, a large number being present. The following were the principal participants in the services: Invocation and reading of Scriptures by Rev. L. R. Phillips, of Sharon, Mass.; introductory prayer by Rev. S. R. Eastman, Berkley, Mass.; sermon by Rev. Albert Perry, pastor, text 1 Thess. v. 21; dedicatory prayer by Rev. Luther Sheldon, D.D., of Easton; closing prayer by Rev. D. Huntington, of North Bridgewater.

The church, fifty-eight by seventy-five feet, will seat five hundred people, and cost about twelve thousand dollars.

At a meeting of the church, held on fast day, April 8, 1852, it was voted to hold the annual meetings on such day as the pastor might designate. Their custom had been heretofore to hold such meetings on the day of public fast.

By a motion and discussion in a meeting held Oct. 12, 1854, it seems that the church was then using unfermented wine at the communion.

On account of failing health the Rev. Albert Perry resigned his pastorate June 21, 1856. The church, with much regret, felt compelled to accept his resignation. The following is found among the resolutions passed at the time:

"Resolved, That an acquaintance of five years has added to our respect for his superior intellectual endowments, a strong love for the peculiar sympathy, kindness, and Christian charity of his heart, and that as it is our earnest wish, so it shall be our fervent prayer, that a gracious Providence may yet restore him to health, and spare him for much useful service to the church."

At a meeting of the church, held Feb. 17, 1856, Rev. Thomas Wilson was called to the pastorate of the church. He having accepted the invitation of the church, a council was called which should act in the dismissal of Rev. Albert Perry and in the installation of his successor. The council, which met March 13, 1856, represented eleven churches.

The installation services were as follows: Invocation and Scriptural reading, Rev. Lyman White, of Easton; sermon by Rev. Leonard Swain; installing prayer by Rev. L. R. Phillips, of Sharon; charge to the pastor by Rev. Amos Blanchard, D.D., of Lowell; right hand of fellowship by Rev. James H. Means, of Dorchester; address to the people by Rev. Charles L. Mills, of North Bridgewater; concluding prayer by Rev. Paul Couch, of North Bridgewater.

At the annual meeting of the church, held April 10, 1856, the "prudential committee of the church" was first instituted. It was also voted that all members received from other churches shall publicly assent to the covenant of this church. The "penny contribution" in the Sabbath-school was inaugurated at the annual meeting April 16, 1857. By vote of the annual meeting, April 15, 1858, the time of such meeting was fixed at the close of the preparatory lecture before the January communion.

A communication was received from the Methodist Episcopal Church at Stoughton, at the annual meeting in 1866, returning thanks for providing them with a place of worship for some months while they were "houseless," and praying that the blessing of God might rest upon both societies in their individual labors and common sympathies and interests.

The week of prayer was first observed by the church in 1868 by vote of the annual meeting. By vote of the church, at a meeting held after communion service, March 7, 1869, it was voted to introduce "Songs of the Sanctuary" instead of the "Church Psalmody," that congregational singing might be cultivated thereby. By a vote of the church, May 26, 1870, the use of the church was granted to the Universalist society while they were remodeling their house.

It was voted by the church that fellowship meeting be held at the close of preparatory lectures as recommended by the Norfolk Conference of churches, Nov. 13, 1870. The church received a communication from the Universalist society, returning thanks for the use of the church during the previous six months. This letter was most kindly written.

At the annual meeting held Dec. 30, 1870, it was voted that the officers of the church be chosen by ballot. At a meeting held after the communion, Jan. 1, 1871, it was voted to substitute, on trial for six months, a "Bible Service," instead of the afternoon preaching,—yeas 23, nays 6. At this time the pastor was chosen superintendent of the Sabbath-school upon the resignation of A. H. Drake. The church voted April 30, 1871, to observe the communion at the close of the morning service. It was voted May 5, 1872, to continue permanently the "Bible Service." By vote of the annual meeting, Jan. 9, 1873, the pastor was authorized to issue a pastoral letter to each member of the church as recommended by the several conferences.

Feb. 15, 1874, the church voted Monday, the 16th inst., as a day of fasting and prayer for the presence of the Holy Spirit in His converting and sanctifying power. A petition was also drawn up, and signed by all persons present, requesting Rev. A. B. Earle to come and hold a series of meetings in union with the Methodist Episcopal Church.

July 3, 1874, the church voted that the pastor and deacons take what measures they may think advisable towards obtaining unfermented "fruit of the vine" for use at the communion. Oct. 31, 1875, Rev. Thomas Wilson resigned his pastoral relation over the church, to take effect March 13, 1876, the completion of the twentieth year of his ministry to the church.

Nov. 11, 1875, the church invited the B. B. M. C. Association to hold a series of meetings in connection with the church.

On Feb. 11, 1876, the church accepted the resignation of their pastor. We find this among the resolutions passed at the time: "Resolved, That we recognize in him a faithful disciple of the Master whose gospel he has so long preached among us; a man zealous in the discharge of the duties of his sacred office, firm in his convictions of right, quick and constant in his sympathies with those who suffer in body or in mind; a safe counselor and a true friend, an open and decided enemy of wickedness in places high as well as low; and while preaching in all purity the doctrine of salvation through repentance and faith in God and our Saviour Jesus Christ, exemplifying the power and excellence of that faith in his own daily walk and godly conversations before men."

A council met by call of the church March 7, 1876, and in a regular manner approved of the action of the church in accepting the resignation of their pastor and most cordially recommended him to the churches.

The church received, June 1, 1876, the revision of their committee on revision of constitution, articles of faith, etc.; this report was finally completed and accepted June 22d of the same year. It was voted at a meeting of the church, held June 22, 1876, to call Mr. John Herbert, of Peacham, Vt., to become their minister,—this was unanimous.

At a meeting of the church, Feb. 14, 1877, it was voted to receive members from other churches upon vote of the church.

At a meeting held March 14, 1877, a new creed and covenant, reported from a committee previously appointed, were adopted, and with slight alterations have been used by the church since.

At the annual meeting, 1878, committees were chosen for the following purposes: Visiting the sick, on charity, and on spiritual condition of the people. At a meeting held soon after this a committee on singing was appointed. They reported a diversity of opinion. It was finally voted to have congregational singing, led by a choir of young people. A committee on calling was raised at a meeting held March 27, 1878.

At a meeting held Jan. 9, 1879, L. M. Flint was made a committee to invite the B. B. M. C. Association to labor with the church, and Deacon Clapp a committee to invite the Methodist Episcopal Church to unite in this work.

The pastor resigned on account of trouble with his throat. At a council called to advise in regard to Rev. Z. Herbert's dismissal, the action of the church was approved, and the following resolution was passed: "We find Brother Herbert to be a wise counselor, a faithful and efficient pastor, and a sincere and earnest Christian."

At a meeting of the church held Dec. 18, 1879, it was unanimously voted to extend a call to Rev. D. O. Clark, who had supplied the pulpit for three months. This call was not accepted, but Rev. D. O. Clark continued to act as pastor for two years longer. At a meeting held Jan. 8, 1880, the deacons and prudential committee were instructed to meet with the pastor the first Monday of each month, to attend to any business which may come before them.

At the annual meeting, 1881, it was voted to increase the number of deacons to three, and that they should be so elected that one should retire each year. The church renewed their call to Rev. D. O. Clark to become their pastor; but he was still unwilling to accept. Jan. 19, 1882, the church, by unanimous vote, extended a call to Rev. P. B. Wing to become their pastor.

At a meeting of the church held April 27, 1882, it was voted to call Rev. C. L. Rotch, of New Sharon, Me., to become their pastor. This call was accepted, and he has continued in office since, being installed by council the following October.

The following is a list of deacons, and when elected, so far as appears on the records: Nathan Drake, Samuel Tolman, in office at the time of separation, 1822; Ebenezer Drake, Dec. 25, 1832; Fisher Gay, Jan. 4, 1833; Benjamin Clapp, Feb. 1, 1854; Ezekiel Dickerman, Sept. 1, 1865; Nathaniel Gay, 1873; Samuel Clapp, 1878; E. M. Norton, Jan. 19, 1881; Nathaniel Gay, Jan. 19, 1882, re-election; Samuel Clapp, Jan. 19, 1883, re-election.

Park, 1828; Mr. Stilman Drake, 1829; Mr. Joseph Gates, 1829; Mr. Fisher Gay, 1830; Mr. Francis Sumner, 1832; Mr. D. Hayward; Deacon Ebenezer Drake, 1839; Dr. Cyrus S. Mann, 1852; Mr. S. Methodist Episcopal Church.¹—Methodism in Stoughton dates back to 1810. Occasional services were held about that time by Rev. John Tinkham, a local preacher, resident in Easton. Mr. Tinkham made frequent visits to the sick in this vicinity, and his labors in this direction were so appreciated that he was invited to hold regular preaching services at the house of Mr. Hezekiah Gay.

The first Methodist class was formed Jan. 30, 1812, by Rev. Artemas Stebbins, preacher in charge of the Mansfield and Easton Circuit. The class consisted of five members, viz.: Atherton Belcher, James Smith, Rebecca Gay, Deborah Leonard, and William Smith. With the organization of this class, Stoughton (Factory Village) was added to the list of appointments on the Mansfield and Easton Circuit. In 1818 the membership had increased to forty, and a church building was erected at Factory Village (now West Stoughton) at a cost of about seven hundred dollars.

In 1827 another class was formed at North Stoughton. In 1834, Stoughton became a station by itself, but was united to North Stoughton in the list of appointments, and one preacher supplied both places. The preaching services at North Stoughton were usually held at the house of Mr. Elijah Gill.

In 1835 it was decided to build a new church at the centre of the town. Some of the North Stoughton society did not concur, and the result was the erection of a new church building in each place. The church at the centre cost about two thousand two hundred dollars, and was dedicated Sept. 16, 1835. The North Stoughton society failed to receive a preacher from Conference the following year, and became a Protestant Methodist Church.

In 1866 the present church-edifice was erected. It is finely located on one of the principal streets, and is every way suited to the uses of the society. A parsonage is also owned by the church, subject to a small annuity during the lifetime of the donor, and otherwise both church and parsonage are free from debt.

There is also a Roman Catholic Church in Stoughton, a Methodist Church at North Stoughton, and a Baptist Church at East Stoughton, but we have been unable to secure any information concerning them.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

STOUGHTON—(Continued).

The Press—The Stoughton Sentinel—Masonic—Rising Star Lodge, F. and A. M.—Mount Zion Royal Arch Chapter—Stoughton Lodge, No. 72, I. O. O. F.—The Boot and Shoe Interest—Civil History—Representatives and Town Clerks from 1731 to 1884—Military Record—Number of Men Furnished—Amount of Money Expended for War Purposes.

SATURDAY morning, Nov. 10, 1860, there appeared the initial number of a newspaper, published and edited by William H. Jewell, and called The Stoughton Sentinel. This issue was printed in the neighboring town of Canton. It was quite an ambitious start, and its first numbers indicated interest and enterprise. Born in times of great national troubles, their echo is seen in its columns. The editor believed in the right of secession, and this fact doubtless had much to do with the early demise of the enterprise. Saturday morning, Nov. 7, 1863, Messrs. William W. and C. A. Wood, again taking the name of Sentinel, issued a bright, entertaining sheet, its object "to entertain, to instruct and improve." This enterprise continued until the 15th of October, 1864, when the paper appeared as a half sheet, with the following notice at the editorial head: "Both of the editors of the Stoughton Sentinel having gone to war for 100 days, the paper will be published in its present shape during their absence." The paper appeared until Sept. 9, 1865, when it yielded to death's call, not being sufficiently supported to pay. Messrs. Pratt & Hasty, of Randolph, again took up the broken thread in 1870, and printed it in Randolph. Mr. H. E. Wilkins was identified with this movement and lent it substantial aid. Soon Mr. Hasty, becoming alarmed for his precedence with outsiders, removed to Stoughton. Mr. Hasty continued the paper until 1877, when he died. Mr. A. P. Smith then became editor and proprietor, and continued until August, 1883. In September, 1882, Mr. L. W. Standish, a Stoughton boy, came from Wakefield, where he had served apprenticeship as a printer, and where he had evinced ability as a writer, and took charge of the editorial work of the paper. Under his well-directed efforts the circulation of the paper was doubled in a few months, and it soon became well known and quoted in these parts. In August, 1883, Mr. Standish purchased the paper and office of Mr. Smith, and is now at its head. The paper has about one thousand circulation weekly and a large advertising patronage. The Sentinel is now known as having an opinion on all matters relating to Stoughton's welfare, and its position carries weight. It occupies a high place among the list of country papers, and is widely quoted.

Rising Star Lodge¹ was instituted Dec. 10, 1799, with the following charter members: Peter Adams, Benjamin Capen, Joseph Richards, Nathan Gill, Abraham Capen, David Wadsworth, William Capen, Amos Upham, John Atherton, Jr., and Consider Southworth.

The first regular meeting after the charter was obtained was held at the house of Lemuel Drake, in Stoughton, on the eve of the 9th of January, 1800, and the following officers were chosen: Peter Adams, M.; Benjamin Capen, S. W.; Joseph Richards, J. W.; Nathan Gill, Treas.; Abraham Capen, Sec.; David Wadsworth, Sr. D.; William Capen, Jr. D.; Amos Upham, First Steward; John Atherton, Jr., Second Steward.

Permission was given by the Grand Lodge to remove the lodge to Canton, March 15, 1810. It was thence removed from Canton to Sharon, June 13, 1814, and then back to Stoughton Dec. 27, 1817.

The first time the lodge appeared in public was on the 22d of February, 1800, on which occasion they joined a procession composed of militia, visitors, and school-boys, "to pay funeral honors to their late brother, George Washington, late general of the armies of America." The procession moved to the burying-place in this town, then back to the meeting-house, where an oration was delivered by the Rev. Edward Richmond, D.D., suitable to the occasion.

It has always been said with pride by the old members that while many lodges surrendered their charters during the Anti-Masonic excitement of 1831, this lodge never missed a meeting, as the records will show.

The Masters of Rising Star Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons from its organization to the present time have been as follows: Peter Adams, 1800-5; Benjamin Capen, 1805-6; Amos Upham, 1807-8; Elijah Crane, 1809-11; Thomas Kollock, 1812-13; Consider Southworth, 1814-15; William Dunbar, 1816; Elijah Atherton, 1817-20; Willard Gould, 1821; Joel Talbot, 1822; Thomas Crane, 1823; Lemuel Gay, 1824-25, 1852; Jonathan Reynolds, 1826-27; Nathaniel Blake, 1828-29; James Swan, 1830-31, 1851; Azel Capen, 1832-34, 1850; Ansel Capen, 1835-36; Samuel Chandler, 1837-39; Consider A. Richardson, Tyler. Present membership, eighty-two.

Mount Zion Royal Arch Chapter, F. and A. M.²—The membership of Rising Star Lodge of Freemasons in Stoughton comprised very many of the leading men in the vicinity, and its reputation for good Masonic work was well known. Many of its leading members had become Royal Arch Masons, and their love of the craft culminated in a meeting at the Masonic Hall in Stoughton on Oct. 12, 1820. The meeting was opened, as all great and good undertakings should be, by first invoking the divine blessing. This was done by Rev. Thomas Rich. The petition for the charter was then read, and it was decided to present the same to the Grand Chapter in December. The following were selected as officers: H. P., John Edson; K., Elijah Atherton; S., Thomas Tolman; C. of H., David Manley; P. S., Timothy Dorman; R. A. C., Jonathan Reynolds; Treas., Royal Turner; Sec., Artemas Kennedy; M. 3d Veil, Joel Talbot; M. 2d Veil, Consider Southworth; M. 1st Veil, Luther M. Harris; 1st Steward, Leonard Kinsley; 2d Steward, Leonard Alden; Chap., Rev. Thomas Rich. No Tyler was selected. Among the petitioners were also Abram Capen and Benjamin Capen, of Stoughton, and Wm. Dunbar, of Canton. Consider Southworth was chosen a committee to get the approbation of Adoniram Chapter, and Thomas Tolman to obtain the approbation of St. Andrew's and St. Paul's Chapters, and John Edson, Elijah Atherton, and Thomas Tolman were appointed to present the petition to the Grand Chapter, and the same were appointed to call the first meeting, if the petition was granted.

The dispensation was issued Dec. 13, 1820, and was signed by Jonathan Gage, Grand High Priest, John J. Loring, Grand Secretary. The chapter immediately went to work with the officers as named above, and its first candidate was Maj. Lemuel Gay, for many years postmaster, and a leading citizen of the town; closely followed by Nathaniel Blake, the leading owner in the stage line from Taunton (through Stoughton) to Boston; Richard Talbot and Mather Holmes, whose names frequently occur on the town records; Abel Wentworth, of Canton; Robert L. Killan, of Hanson; and others from Bridgewater, Randolph, and other towns in the vicinity. Among the first officers were John Edson, a man of character; Elijah Atherton, for many years the leading trial justice of the vicinity; Thomas Tolman, a lawyer, for a long period treasurer of the Grand Lodge F. and A. M. of Massachusetts; Timothy Dorman, of Randolph, whose initials, T. D., will be long remembered in connection with the old-fashioned clay tobacco-pipes; Royal Turner, of Randolph, many years president of Randolph Bank; Consider Southworth, the pioneer manufacturer of Southworth sewing-cotton and loom-harness twine; Capt. Jonathan Reynolds; and Joel Talbot, ever to be remembered as good citizens and active townsmen; and Benjamin Capen and his brother Deacon Abram Capen, the owner of the hotel, and who furnished the hall for the Masonic fraternity.

The work of the chapter was continued with "fervency and zeal," so that about twenty were added during the following six months, rendering the success of the chapter beyond question.

On the 22d of August, 1821, a charter having been granted, Mount Zion Royal Arch Chapter was duly consecrated at Stoughton by the officers of the Grand Chapter of Massachusetts. This was a gala day for the craft, and the citizens of the town. The record says, "The officers of the Grand Chapter were received by the committee of the chapter, at the house of Rev. Mr. Gay, resident clergyman, and escorted to the Masonic Hall. A procession, consisting of nearly four hundred members of the order, and a large number of ladies, was formed, and all marched to the meeting-house of Rev. Mr. Gay, where the ceremonies of consecration and installation were performed, agreeably to the ancient forms and usages of Freemasonry. An address was delivered by Rev. Companion Joseph Richardson; prayer was offered by Richard Carraque; music by the Stoughton choir,¹ which was judiciously selected, and well adapted to the occasion. After the close of the services in the meeting-house, the procession was reformed, and they proceeded to the bower, and partook of a dinner prepared by Companion Abram Capen. The total expenses of the occasion, except the dinner, were twenty-eight dollars and fifty-five cents.

The first death of a member was that of Leonard Alden, of Randolph, in August, 1822, and Royal Turner, of Randolph, was elected to prepare and deliver the eulogy. This was subsequently carried out at the meeting-house. Prayer was offered by Rev. Benjamin Hunton, of Canton, and the singing was by the Stoughton choir, who were thanked for their services.

On the 24th of June, 1825, the chapter participated in the ceremonies of laying the corner-stone of the new court-house in Dedham. Nov. 8, 1824, the chapter gave its consent to the formation of a new chapter in Medway; Nov. 17, 1828, for a new chapter in Dedham; May 4, 1860, for a new chapter at Foxboro'; Oct. 18, 1861, for a new chapter in Bridgewater; Feb. 25, 1870, for a new chapter in Hyde Park. The charter members of the above new chapters were largely from Mount Zion Chapter.

One episode of the old Anti-Masonic political times may be recorded. During the great excitement, in 1831, feeling ran high in Stoughton, and Anti-Masonry was triumphant. At a town-meeting held in Stoughton April 4, 1831, the selectmen presented a list of persons to act as jurors. This list was referred back to them for revision. A second list was disposed of in the same way, when the third revise was presented to the town. They voted to accept it after striking off the names of Leonard Hodges, Elijah Atherton, Jonathan Reynolds, and Benjamin Capen, and substituting therefor Ruel Packard, Thomas Capen, Daniel Hayward, and Eliphalet Gay. Although nothing is said in the record of the question of Masonry, the people of the town and the Masons understood that these names were stricken off because they were Masons, and the substitutes were elected because they were Anti-Masons. In the light and intelligence of the present age it seems impossible that such a thing could have occurred. At the next meeting of the chapter, held April 25, 1831, three applications for the degrees conferred by the chapter were received.

June 21, 1831, the chapter voted a donation to the Seamen's Friend Society of Boston. This is but Society," which drew membership from the surrounding towns as well. These two are supposed to be the oldest musical societies in this country. (See page 4 of this work.)

¹ This Stoughton choir was the "Musical Society in Stoughton," organized about 1762 to furnish music for church service, in which they were remarkably successful. The society is in existence to-day, and in a very flourishing condition. It was and is confined to citizens of Stoughton. In about 1786 another society was formed out of this, called the "Stoughton Musical one of a series of donations to charitable objects by the chapter, they having cheerfully accepted and honestly carried out the benevolent instructions of Masonry.

Mount Zion Chapter has, during more than sixty years of life, contained within its membership some of the brightest lights of Freemasonry, and its own star has never been dimmed during any of the years of the crusade against the craft. Its roll of membership contains the names of those who have been the most active in their localities in all good works, and its own large charities have been administered without ostentation. No stain has marred the purity of the banner it threw to the breeze at its birth, and no doubt its future life will be a repetition of its past, with the good even more abundant.

The Boot and Shoe Interest.²—The principal industry of Stoughton, for the past fifty years or more, has been the manufacture of boots and shoes.

The business was begun by John Linfield in 1816, who started the manufacture of shoes in the building afterwards owned and occupied by Robert Porter, and which was removed, in 1880, to make room for the erection of the town-house. A somewhat remarkable incident in connection with this fact is, that Jesse Holmes, the present postmaster of this village, worked at stitching shoes for Mr. Linfield more than sixty years ago, on the same site where he now daily distributes the mails.

In 1821, Isaac Beals moved from the east part of the town to the centre, and commenced the manufacture of boots. The building in which he began was afterwards occupied as a dwelling by Luther and Robert Swan, and was destroyed by the fire of 1880, which consumed nearly half of the business centre of the village. Mr. Beals remained but a few years in the business, during which time there was associated with him Simeon Drake, who afterwards became a prominent manufacturer.

The apparent success of this firm encouraged many of the young and enterprising men of that day to embark in the same enterprise, nearly all of whom became successful business men. Among the most prominent of these were Nathaniel Morton, Martin Wales, L. & W. Belcher, Beals & Holmes, Hill & Drake, George R. Monk, and James Littlefield & Co.

To these men is due not only the credit of establishing the business as a permanent industry, and the building up of the town, but also the acquiring of that reputation for the superior quality of boots and shoes which Stoughton has for so many years justly enjoyed.

Up to 1860 the largest demand for fine goods was from the South, consequently the manufacturers of Stoughton bent their energies principally towards the Southern trade. It was owing to this fact that the late civil war was peculiarly disastrous to the greater number of these manufacturers, some of them never recovering from the effects of their heavy losses.

The men doing the largest amount of business at the beginning of the war were Atherton, Stetson & Co., James Hill, G. & S. Wales, S. Pettee & Son, N. Morton, Bradford Kinsley, Monk & Reynolds, L. & W. Belcher, Samuel Savels, J. W. Jones & Co., J. Swan & Co., J. & D. French, J. E. Drake, F. N. Littlefield, and E. Tucker. The amount of business done in 1860 by the above-named firms was about one million three hundred thousand dollars, and they employed very nearly twelve hundred hands, many of those employed coming from surrounding towns.

Previous to 1860 no shoes of any amount had been made here, but after the loss of the Southern trade, the manufacturers, being obliged to find a new market for their goods, turned their attention more fully to this branch of the industry, in order to supply the local trade, and for some years after the war Stoughton's principal market was the New England States.

In 1872 a corporation was formed, to be known as the Stoughton Boot and Shoe Company, with a capital stock of thirty-five thousand dollars. This corporation for eight years did a large business in the manufacture of boots and shoes, employing about one hundred and fifty hands, and doing a business of two hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars annually during the best years of its existence. They were the first manufacturers to introduce steam into the shoe-factories of the centre of the town.

There are now (December, 1883) engaged in the manufacture of boots and shoes in Stoughton the following firms, doing a business annually of about nine hundred thousand dollars, and employing about seven hundred hands: D. French & Son, J. & H. Fitzpatrick, Henry Tucker, E. Littlefield, Upham, Brothers & Co., Farrell & Marston, Charles Tenney, J. H. May & Co., F. Capen & Co., Reynolds Brothers, Alanson Belcher, Samuel Savels, and H. Folsom & Co. The business is annually increasing, and the most of it is in the hands of young and enterprising men, who are trying to make the annual product more than it was in the palmiest days before the war.

Civil History.—The following is a list of representatives from Stoughton, taken from the town records by Henry C. Kimball, Esq. The omissions in certain years indicate that the town voted "not to send," either from motives of economy,—the pay of the representatives being formerly defrayed by the town,—or from the difficulty of obtaining a majority vote for any candidate, the town having in one instance voted eighteen times unsuccessfully, on successive days:

Military History.—Stoughton furnished five hundred and twenty-two men for the war, fifteen of whom were commissioned officers. The whole amount of money expended by the town, exclusive of State aid, was seventy-nine thousand eight hundred and seventy-two dollars and fifty-five cents. The town also expended thirty-nine thousand six hundred and fifty-two dollars and twelve cents, which was repaid by the State, for aid to soldiers' families.

The selectmen during the war were as follows: 1861-63, Jedediah Adams, Samuel Capen (2), Clifford Keith; 1864, Jedediah Adams, Clifford Keith, William H. Tucker (2); 1865, Jedediah Adams, Clifford Keith, Samuel Capen (2).

The military record of Stoughton during the war of the Rebellion, embracing a list of soldiers' names, etc., was destroyed by fire a few years since.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

THE PIERCE FAMILY.

The name Pierce is variously spelled. The first American ancestor of the Stoughton branch was John Pers, a man of good estate in England, and who came from Norwich, County Norfolk, to America, and settled in Watertown, Mass., about 1637, where his son Anthony had previously become a resident. The heraldic description of the coat of arms borne by this family in England is "Three Ravens rising sable. Fesse, hummette. Motto, Dixit et Fecit. Crest, dove, with olive branch in beak."

Anthony (2) was a large landholder in Watertown in 1630, and is the ancestor of nearly all the families bearing the name of Pierce in Watertown, Waltham, Weston, Lincoln, Lexington, and Concord. His estate inventoried over three hundred pounds. Joseph (3) was also a resident of Watertown, where he was admitted a freeman April 18, 1690. He had numerous children, and left an estate inventoried at three hundred and sixteen pounds, ten shillings. John (4) was also a resident of Waltham; his oldest son, John (5), born Sept. 1, 1703, married Rebecca Fenno, daughter of John Fenno, of Stoughton. He was a weaver. He purchased twenty-seven acres of land in Stoughton for seventy-five pounds, whither he removed about 1731. This land is within the present limits of Canton, and it passed to his son Seth, then to his grandson, Jesse, great-grandson, Col. Jesse, great-great-grandsons, Hon. Edward L. and Hon. Henry L. Seth (6) was always a resident of Stoughton; married Angelette Clark. Their second child, Jesse (7), married Catherine Smith, had twelve children, resided on the old homestead in Stoughton, and died March 5, 1832.

COL. JESSE PIERCE (8),—Jesse (7), Seth (6), John (5), John (4), Joseph (3), Anthony (2), John (1),—born Nov. 7, 1788; married, Sept. 9, 1824, Elizabeth S. Lillie, born July 30, 1786, died Nov. 1, 1871. He died Feb. 3, 1856.

Col. Jesse Pierce was born in Stoughton, Nov. 7, 1788. His birthplace was in that part of the town which a few years later was incorporated as Canton; his father's home being then in what is now South Canton. From the age of seven to twenty-one he lived with his maternal uncle, Lemuel Smith, a Revolutionary soldier, upon a farm on the Bay road, in the western part of Stoughton. In youth he showed an earnest purpose to gain knowledge, and having learned all that could be taught him in the public school of his district, he took in 1807, while yet a minor, the charge of a school, and from that year to 1814 served as the teacher of public schools in Stoughton and South Dedham (now Norwood), teaching during the winter and working on his uncle's farm at other seasons. For the purpose of learning better modes of instruction, he attended for a short time Taunton Academy, then under the charge of Simeon Doggett. From 1814 to 1819 he taught public schools in Milton,—one at Brush Hill, and another at Milton Hill.

He was the first to establish a Sunday-school in Dorchester, which he opened in the winter of 1817-

Sam Pierce

18, at Mattapan, in the school-house (where his brother John was then the teacher) situated near the home of Edmund Tileston. The school was intended particularly for the children of persons working in the factory of Smith Boies. One of the pupils was Newell A. Thompson, afterwards prominent in the business and municipal affairs of Boston. Col. Pierce continued his connection with Sunday-schools after his removal to Stoughton, both in that town and at the Methodist Church at North Easton, where he worshiped for many years.

In 1819 he opened a private school at Milton Hill, which he kept for five years. Some who attended it have become well-known citizens, among whom were Robert B. and John M. Forbes and Fletcher Webster. At this period he took an active part in the militia, serving in the Second Regiment, Second Brigade and First Division, and was commissioned as an ensign in 1810, captain and major in 1813, lieutenant-colonel in 1815, and colonel in 1816. This last commission he resigned in 1818. Traditions of his fidelity and success in the instruction and drill of the officers and men under his command are still preserved. Marrying, in 1824, Eliza S., daughter of Capt. John Lillie, who was the aid of Maj.-Gen. Knox in the Revolutionary war, he returned to Stoughton and became the owner of his uncle's farm, on which he had been brought up.¹ He opened at once at his house a private boarding-school for boys, chiefly of Boston families, and receiving also day scholars from the neighborhood. As a teacher he made a lasting impression on his pupils for his earnestness, thoroughness, and fidelity, and particularly his patience in teaching those who had less than the average gift for acquiring knowledge. He had a genuine sympathy with the young, which he kept fresh through life. In 1829 he gave up the occupation of teacher, which he had followed for twenty years, and from that time was occupied with the care of his farm and miscellaneous work, such as conveyancing, the settlement of estates, the administration of town offices, and the education of his two sons, which he personally directed for some years. His advice was often sought in a community where his good sense and practical knowledge were highly valued. He represented his town in the Legislature for six years, viz., 1832-36 and 1840, serving also the last-named year on the State valuation committee. He was a Democratic candidate for Presidential elector in 1840 and for State senator in 1844, and also a Free-Soil candidate for the latter office in 1848. Governor Morton offered him (in 1843) the appointment of sheriff for Norfolk County, which he declined. In the Legislature he engaged in debates upon important questions, and his remarks were in some instances reported at length in the public journals. He spoke in favor of restricting the sale of spirituous liquors, and upon the appointment of representatives, favoring a reduction in the number, and a town rather than a district system. His most elaborate speech was made Feb. 26, 1840, upon the militia system, which, as then existing, he thought injurious to public morals and of no public advantage. He urged a reduction of the force, a better discipline, and the discontinuance of encampments.² He was, as legislator and citizen, a strenuous supporter of the causes of education and temperance.

Hon. Robert C. Winthrop, who was Speaker in 1840, wrote in 1876: "Col. Jesse Pierce, of Stoughton, comes back vividly to my remembrance as one of the five or six hundred over whom I was privileged to preside nearly forty years ago. He was a most intelligent and estimable person, whom I was glad to count among my friends. At the period of 1835-40 he became much interested in the anti-slavery cause. He voted for James G. Birney in 1844, although sustaining at that election the State nominations of the Democratic party, and joined four years later the Free-Soil party, then first organized. He was in sympathy with the anti-slavery secession from the Methodist Church which took place in 1840. He was an active member of that church for many years, joining it while a teacher in Milton, but during the later years of his life he attended the services of an orthodox Congregational Church. He was a devout person, and his reading was largely in religious books, as Clarke's and Scott's Commentaries. He was often sought to perform the services which peculiarly belong to clergymen at funerals and weddings, and in the chambers of the sick. He took a deep interest in the religious instruction of the young, and while a teacher gathered children for this purpose in his school-house on Sunday."

Col. Pierce was a person of average height, five feet and eight or nine inches. He had no self-assertion, but while gentle in manner was firm in purpose, particularly where a question involved any moral element. In conversation, while very genial, he weighed well his words, and was in a marked degree considerate of the feelings and reputations of others. His tenderness to neighbors who were in grief, his kindness to the young, to domestics of his household, and laborers on his farm, and to all less fortunate in life than himself, are still freshly remembered. He was widely known, and bore through life with all who knew him the character of a thoroughly upright and just man.

Removing in 1849 from Stoughton to the Lower Mills Village, or Dorchester (now Boston), he passed the rest of his life among those who had known him in his youth as a teacher, occupying the house which is now the residence of his eldest son. The newspaper of his county noting his death, which took place Feb. 3, 1856, wrote of him, "He was for many years a distinguished teacher, and numbers among his pupils many men who now occupy prominent positions in public life. He was a man of strict integrity, high-minded and honorable, and universally beloved and respected in all the various relations of life." Children,—Hon. Henry Lillie, born Aug. 23, 1825; George S., born June 20, 1827, died Sept. 28, 1827; Hon. Edward Lillie, born May 29, 1829, married Elizabeth H. Kingsbury.

HON. HENRY LILLIE PIERCE (8) was born in Stoughton, Mass., on Aug. 23, 1825. He received a good English education at the public schools of that town, and at the State Normal School in Bridgewater. Ill health made it necessary for him to leave school much sooner than his inclination would have prompted; but the condition of health which obliged him to cut short his studies, and to abstain for some years from all manual labor, developed in him a taste for reading, and gave to his mind a thoughtful cast which has had a most important influence upon his later life. In 1849 the family removed to a house in Dorchester, near Milton Lower Mills, and there the subject of this sketch has ever since resided. In 1850 he entered the chocolate manufactory of Walter Baker & Co., which was established on the Neponset River, near his home. After serving in a subordinate position for a number of years and seeing no prospect of advancement, he determined to try his fortunes in the new country at the West. He spent some months in traveling through that region, and although he failed to obtain that for which he sought, namely, a more remunerative employment, he returned with greatly improved health, and with enlarged ideas as to the extent and resources of his country. He again entered Mr. Baker's establishment, on an improved footing, and on the death of the owner, in 1854, he took charge of the business, and from that time to this has been the sole manager. At an early age he took a lively interest in public affairs, and while still a school-boy he contributed articles for some of the country papers. His father being a Democrat, and of the Jefferson and Jackson school, he imbibed the same political ideas and continued to hold them until the nomination of Martin Van Buren, in 1848, gave to the Free-Soil party a national candidate and a national platform. He joined with enthusiasm in the new movement for equal rights; and through good report and evil report he stood by the anti-slavery party—aiding it by his voice, his pen, and his money—until the purpose for which it had been organized was triumphantly established.

In 1859, when the general statutes of the State were revised, the action of the General Court in striking out the word "white" wherever it occurred in the laws authorizing the organization of the militia was defeated by the exercise of the veto power by the Governor. Mr. Pierce was elected a member of the House the following year (1860), and was instrumental in getting the two branches of the Legislature to pass another bill striking the word from the militia laws. But the act was again defeated by the Governor's veto; and it was not until the year 1864 that success attended the efforts of those who wished to have this obnoxious discrimination on account of race removed from the statute-book. Being elected to the session for the following year, Mr. Pierce inaugurated the movement, in which he was sustained by a majority of the House, for instructing our senators, and recommending our representatives in Congress, to favor such a change in the national laws as would authorize the enlistment of colored men into the United States army. Re-elected again in 1862, Mr. Pierce was appointed chairman of the committee on finance, and in that capacity reported and carried through the House two measures of great importance, namely, the act providing for the payment of the State bonds in gold (this was after the legal tender act had been passed by Congress), and the act taxing savings-banks and insurance companies. At the end of his third term Mr. Pierce withdrew from the House, but was chosen again in 1866. He does not appear as the special champion of any important measure during that session.

In 1867 he visited Europe, passing several months in traveling through France, Italy, and Germany. On the annexation of Dorchester to the city of Boston, in 1869, he was elected to represent that section of the city in the Board of Aldermen. After serving two years (1870-71) he declined a re-election, and in the following year visited Europe again, partly for business and partly for purposes of recreation. In the latter part of that year he was nominated as a non-partisan candidate for the office of mayor. The lack of efficiency which had been exhibited by the executive departments of the government during the great fire of the 9th of November, and the neglect to take any effective measures for the suppression of the smallpox, which was then spreading through the city with alarming rapidity, caused great dissatisfaction, especially among business men. On the other hand, the personal honesty and good intentions of the mayor then in office, his high standing in the Democratic party, and his earnest desire to secure an indorsement, gave him a large if not an enthusiastic support, and the contest, although conducted with great courtesy on both sides, was unusually close and exciting. It resulted in the election of Mr. Pierce by a very small majority. His address at the organization of the new government was calculated to inspire confidence in his abilities as an executive officer. To improve the efficiency of the government radical changes were needed in some of the departments, and such changes he not only recommended, but proceeded resolutely to carry out. He reorganized the health department by appointing a new Board of Health, and took measures for the suppression of the smallpox, which were immediately attended with the most gratifying results. He also succeeded, against strong opposition, in securing the reorganization of the fire department by removing it from the personal and partisan influences to which it had long been subjected, and placing it upon a business basis. In October of that year he received the Republican nomination for representative in Congress from the Third Massachusetts District, to fill the vacancy in the Forty-third Congress occasioned by the death of Hon. William Whiting. The success of his municipal administration is shown in the fact that the Democrats failed to nominate any candidate to oppose him, and his election was substantially unanimous. In order to take his seat at the beginning of the session, in December, he retired from the mayor's office a month before the expiration of his term. Having been for many years on terms of personal friendship with Charles Sumner, and having a large acquaintance with the public men of the day, he was from the start in a position to exert a powerful influence upon the councils of the government. Imbued with the same spirit which led Sumner and Andrew Wilson to favor a conciliatory policy towards the South in the legislation which followed the war, he threw his influence against the harsh and unconstitutional measures by which a portion of the leaders of the party to which he belonged sought to perpetuate their political ascendancy over the States lately in rebellion. He was thus placed in the unpleasant position of being obliged to oppose many of the measures which were openly or secretly favored by President Grant's administration. But it is evident that his course was in accordance with the sentiments of the people of Massachusetts, from the fact that in the elections to the Forty-fourth Congress, which occurred in the autumn of 1874, he was re-elected by a handsome majority, while in six out of the ten other districts in the State the regular Republican candidates were defeated for the first time since the beginning of the war. Near the close of the second session of the Forty-third Congress (February, 1875) the "force bill," so called, giving the President extraordinary powers to interfere in the internal affairs of the States, and in his discretion to suspend the privileges of the writ of habeas corpus, was introduced into the House, and an attempt made by the administration leaders to force it through without giving sufficient opportunity for discussion. The Republicans had control of the House by a large majority, and as a political measure intended, as many of them avowed, to give their party an advantage in the Presidential election to occur in the following year, they were substantially unanimous in its support.

On the 27th of February, Mr. Pierce made a short speech in opposition to the bill, which was highly commended by all the leading newspapers throughout the country. The conclusion is worthy of being transcribed here. "In opposing this bill," he said, "I am in strict accordance with all my past political action. Local self-government and the equality of all men before the law are the cardinal principles of my political faith. By these principles I stand or fall. I resisted the fugitive slave bill because it trampled upon the principles of civil liberty and the rights of human nature. The bill now under consideration is permeated with the spirit which gave life and vigor to that odious measure. Of the supporters of the fugitive slave bill the most conspicuous were Jefferson Davis and John C. Breckinridge. 'The whirligig of time' presents to us to-day a most remarkable spectacle. Some of the most blatant and pretentious supporters of Jefferson Davis and John C. Breckinridge in conventions and before the people are here to-day the especial champions of this bill. I shall be the last man in the world to question their consistency or dispute their motives. Mr. Speaker, I know Massachusetts, and I have spoken her sentiments here to-day. She has always interposed a firm resistance to the approach of arbitrary power. She resisted unto blood the stamp act, writs of assistance, and all the force bills which were enacted by Parliament to compel her submission to the British crown. She will be true to her traditions and to her history, and will resist by all constitutional means every attempt, by whomsoever made, to impose similar measures upon any portion of the people of our common country." At the close of the Forty-third Congress (March, 1875), Mr. Pierce visited Europe for the third time, spending some six months in traveling with friends through England, Scotland, and on the continent.

During the session of the Forty-fourth Congress Mr. Pierce was at the head of the Republican members of the Committee on Commerce. He made an elaborate report on the subject of relieving vessels engaged in the coasting trade from the unjust and discriminating legislation of some of the States with regard to pilotage fees, and he made speeches on the proposition to amend the Constitution so as to limit the term of office of the President, on reciprocity with Canada, and on counting the electoral vote of Louisiana. On the last question Mr. Pierce and President Seelye (then representative from the Tenth Massachusetts District) stood alone among the Republicans in opposing the counting of the electoral vote of Louisiana for either candidate, on the ground of fraud in making up the returns. The London Times published Mr. Pierce's speech at length, and referred to it as a "very able" one.

Some time previous to the elections for the Forty-fifth Congress, Mr. Pierce announced to the electors of the Third District, through the public press, his determination to retire from public life at the expiration of the term for which he then held office. This decision was made after due deliberation, and with the firm determination of adhering to it. It was with extreme reluctance, therefore, that he consented, in the autumn of 1877, to allow his name to be used as a citizens' candidate for the office of mayor of Boston. The call for his services was signed by some two thousand five hundred tax-paying citizens, representing all classes and all parties. The charges made against the administration then in power was its partisanship in the interest of the Democratic party and its inefficiency. The contest which followed was the most remarkable in the annals of the city. The number of votes cast largely exceeded those at any previous election, municipal, State, or national, and resulted in the election of Mr. Pierce by about two thousand three hundred majority. In his inaugural address, Mr. Pierce dwelt at some length upon the powers and purposes of municipal corporations, taking the ground that "they are created and exist for the public advantage and not for the benefit of their officers or of particular individuals or classes." He also considered some of the schemes which had been devised for improving our local governments, and denied the propriety or expediency of attempting to raise the standard of municipal government by a limitation of the suffrage, or by giving up to the State powers which from time immemorial have been exercised by the cities and towns. His clear and business-like exposition of the true theory upon which local governments are founded and maintained in this country was referred to in high commendation by the leading newspapers of the day.

The most important act of his second administration was the reorganization of the police department, which had become ill-disciplined and inefficient under the old system of appointment and management by the mayor and aldermen. Through his efforts an act was passed by the General Court, authorizing the appointment of commissioners, for a term of years, to take charge of the department, and also to execute the laws concerning the sale of intoxicating liquors. During the year a reduction of nearly nine hundred thousand dollars was made in the tax levy, and a more rigid system of accountability was established in the several departments of the city government.

At the conclusion of his term, Mr. Pierce declined a re-election, and has since given his attention mainly to the management of his large manufacturing business. During his absence in Europe, in the summer of 1883, there was a very general demand from those opposed to Butlerism for the use of his name as candidate for Governor, and a large majority of the delegates elected to the Republican convention were undoubtedly in favor of his nomination. But, adhering to a determination formed some time before, he declined the use of his name, and strongly urged the nomination of Mr. Robinson as the candidate upon whom the opponents of the then administration could best unite,—with what result is too well known to need comment here.

HON. NATHANIEL WALES.

Among the families that for generations have given the impress of strong, steady character to this section must be mentioned the Wales family. Nathaniel (1), the immigrant, came from England with Rev. Richard Mather, in the ship "James," from Bristol, in 1635, and settled in Dorchester, where he was made a freeman Nov. 2, 1637. His wife, Isabel, daughter of Humphrey Atherton and Mary Wales,¹ outlived him but two weeks. He had children,—Timothy, John, and Nathaniel (2),—and died at Boston Dec. 4, 1661, having removed thither in 1654. Nathaniel (2), born in England, was a ship-carpenter, settled in Boston, where he died May 20, 1662, leaving Nathaniel (3), Samuel, Mary, and Jonathan. Nathaniel (3), born 1659, settled in Braintree with his wife, Joanna, about 1675, and had fifteen children, of whom Thomas was one. Mr. Wales was a deacon in the church at Braintree, and ordained ruling elder Feb. 27, 1700. He died March 23, 1718. His wife died May 11, 1704. Thomas Wales (4th gen.), born April 19, 1695, was a deacon in the church, a man of good repute, married Mary Belcher, Jan. 13, 1719, and lived in the South Precinct of Braintree (now Randolph), where he died in 1775. They had twelve children, Nathaniel being seventh. Mrs. Wales died Jan. 30, 1741. Mr. Wales married, second, Sarah (widow of Samuel) Belcher, Dec. 7, 1742. By her he had three children. Nathaniel Wales (5th gen.), born Oct. 26, 1729, married Sarah —, settled in Stoughton, and, like his father, was a deacon in the church. He was a farmer, and had eleven children. He lived a quiet and useful life, and died, esteemed, at a good old age. His son, Joshua (6th gen.), was born Feb. 21, 1752, in Stoughton, where he always resided. He was a marketman and farmer, was three times married, was an active, energetic man, marked for his sound sense and sterling honesty, and closed a long life in the fullness of years, leaving a large family of children. By his first wife (a Porter) he had five children, the oldest being Nathaniel (7th gen.).

This Nathaniel, born Sept. 11, 1788, in Stoughton, married, Jan. 1, 1815, Phebe, daughter of Capt. William French and Mary Perkins, his wife. (Capt. French was a descendant in direct line from John French, the emigrant, who came from England to Dorchester, where he was admitted freeman in 1639. He was a well-to-do farmer of East Stoughton, and died about 1820, leaving one son, Alpha, and several daughters.) She was born Jan. 30, 1789. Mr. Wales was a manufacturer of shoes and lasts, and, in connection with that business, kept a grocery. Active in militia service, immediately after the war of 1812 he served in the various grades to captain with acceptability and credit, and resigned his commission as captain April 28, 1820. He was one of the first in this section to adopt the religious doctrines of Emanuel Swedenborg and enter the "New Church." He moved from Stoughton to North Bridgewater in 1817, where he died of consumption Feb. 8, 1826. He left two children who attained maturity,—Harriet G. and Nathaniel (8th gen.),—and a business fairly successful. His wife was a woman of great strength of character, quiet dignity, and practical judgment, and added to the property left by her husband, and brought up her young children (Nathaniel being but six years old at his father's death) with great credit to herself. She died Dec. 25, 1855. From the elegant "Souvenir" of "The Government of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts," published in 1880, we extract this graphic sketch of Nathaniel (8th gen.):

"Hon. Nathaniel Wales, of Stoughton, represents the First Norfolk Senatorial District. He was born in North Bridgewater (now Brockton) Nov. 25, 1819, and received his education at the public academic and normal schools of that town and Bridgewater. When quite a young man he engaged successfully in teaching in his native town and in other towns in that vicinity. He afterwards taught as principal in the high school in Pawtucket, R. I. As a young man he showed great enterprise and energy. Being the only son of a widow, he was in early life solely dependent on his own efforts for advancement. In 1843 he engaged in trade in Stoughton, resigning his position in Pawtucket for this purpose, and continued in mercantile business, with others or by himself, for a period of twenty-eight years. During this time he was postmaster at Stoughton from 1860 to 1867, when he resigned, being then appointed United States Assessor of Second District of Internal Revenue, the duties of which office he discharged acceptably till its discontinuance. He also held commissions of more or less importance under Governors Banks, Andrew, Washburn, and Bullock. He was appointed commissioner to superintend the drafting of militia for Norfolk County by Governor Andrew in 1862, and afterwards was appointed by President Lincoln United States commissioner of the Board of Enrollment for the Second District of Massachusetts from 1863 to 1865. Since 1872 he has been associated with the Stoughton Boot and Shoe Company as treasurer, and has held several other positions of public and private trust."

He was a member of the Massachusetts Senate of 1879, and served on the Committees on Towns, Labor, and Prisons; also in 1880, when he was chairman of the Committee on Roads and Bridges, and also a member of Committee on Military Affairs and State-House.

Always interested and active in politics, he has been a member of the Republican party from its commencement, and it is not too much to say that during the entire period the party has had, in his section of the State, no more zealous and efficient supporter than he. The natural bias of his mind has always kept him familiar with the legal questions and decisions of the day, and developed in him habits of thought and judgment that would not disgrace the legal profession, and caused his opinion and advice to be much sought after in those controversies and knotty questions usually referred to members of the bar. His religious views are those of the "New Church."

In 1881, Mr. Wales was elected member of the Executive Council from the Second District of Massachusetts, which position he now holds. He has been twice married, first to J. Montgomery, daughter of Newton and Jane (Montgomery) Shaw, of North Bridgewater, June 4, 1848. They had one son, Nathaniel S. Wales, now a resident of Des Moines, Iowa. Mrs. Wales died May 3, 1849. Mr. Wales married, second, in 1851, Susan Kingsbury Reed, daughter of Timothy and Susan P. (Kingsbury) Reed, of Barnstable. (He was a lawyer, and for a long time register of deeds and clerk of the court for Barnstable County. He held both offices at the time of his death. This Reed family is not only an old New England family, but can be traced back to Saxon England over a century before the Norman conquest. Every generation in England has held responsible and prominent official positions.)

The children of this truly fortunate union were Susan R. (born in 1853, married W. O. Faxon, M.D., resides in Stoughton, and has one child, Nathaniel Wales) and Timothy Reed (born 1856). He was an active and promising youth, but met an untimely death by drowning while striving to rescue some companions who were capsized with him in a sailboat at Martha's Vineyard, in 1870.

Mrs. Wales died Jan. 31, 1882. She was an intellectual and highly educated woman, of rare accomplishments and culture. An indefatigable and accurate genealogist, she expended months in tracing the Reed, Wales, and other families in which she was interested, and her work is a marvel of neatness, system, and convenience. She gave freely of her time and means to relieve suffering, was beloved by all, and left to her family the recollections of a model wife and mother.

Mr. Wales is a genial companion, a kind neighbor, and a strong friend. Casting his lot with those who advocate the higher education and progress of humanity, he has never swerved from action in accordance with his belief. A good citizen, he is justly popular, ranks among the representative men of this section of Massachusetts, and enjoys a handsome property, the result of his financial ability and business acumen.

MARTIN WALES.

Among the men of strong character, who stood high in the esteem of the people of Stoughton, and was by virtue of his originality and the wishes of the people a truly representative man in many ways, must not fail to mention Martin Wales, son of Joshua Wales. He was born in East Stoughton, Feb. 22, 1802, and died March 6, 1874, aged seventy-two years. His childhood was passed on his father's farm. He had the opportunities for education given by the public schools of that period, and at an early age began to show the independence and industry so marked in his whole life by learning to make shoes. After a time he was hired by his father to butcher animals for the Boston market, receiving for his labor one dollar per day. He was about eighteen, and after two years' service here, he engaged with Oliver Belcher, of Stoughton, as butchers of beef cattle. From this time (1822) he was connected with Stoughton. After a few months passed in working for others, he engaged in the same business for himself. Continuing this a few years, he found much of his capital absorbed in debts due him, and he began to manufacture shoes in the upper part of Holbrook's (now Swan's) store. This was in a small way, and intended only to help him out in collecting his meat bills, but the business proving profitable, and there being a good demand for his goods, he entered into co-partnership with Ira Linfield, and added bootmaking to that of shoes. This partnership did not last long, each continuing to manufacture. Mr. Wales' business increased, and became very large for those days, reaching to the Southern and Middle and Western States. For many years he continued manufacturing alone, and, in company with others, accumulated wealth. In connection therewith he conducted a mercantile business from about 1840 to 1852, when he disposed of his stock to his nephew, Nathaniel Wales, whose biography is on another page. In financial matters Mr. Wales was shrewd, cautious, and conservative, and was a valuable counselor, whose advice was often sought. He was president of the Stoughton Boot and Shoe Company during its existence, and director and president of the North Bridgewater Bank from its organization until it ceased to do business. One of the strong characteristics of Mr. Wales was his marked love of justice. A prominent business man of Stoughton, who knew him well, says, "When he promised to do anything he would do it. His word was as good as his bond." He never sued a man during his long business life, and never wanted any trouble with any one. He was a strong Anti-Mason in the days when Masonry was a political issue, and as the leader of that principle, was elected twice representative from Stoughton in the General Court, and to all the prominent public offices of the town. At one time he held nearly every office of importance in the town. He was chairman of selectmen many years, town clerk many years, treasurer several years, to say nothing of minor trusts. With all this, he was a modest, unpretentious man, caring nothing for official honors and only accepting them as the representative of a principle. He was a kind and accommodating neighbor, a good citizen, a loving husband and father, and had a large circle of acquaintances in surrounding towns and in Boston, who enjoyed his quaint and original conversation. He married Rebekah Parker, daughter of Elisha and Jerusha (Wentworth) Parker, who was born Sept. 18, 1807. Their children were Mary R. (Mrs. Caleb H. Packard), Martin (deceased), Lucy M. (Mrs. Fisher Copeland), George, Seth, and Adelaide F., a young lady of great amiability, who married William Neale, and died Dec. 31, 1882. Her death was deeply felt by the entire community. Mr. Wales was an earnest and liberal Christian. He was in full harmony with the doctrines of the "New Church," and a large contributor to its enterprises. He gave two thousand dollars towards the erection of the church of that society in Brockton, where he held a membership, and left a legacy in its behalf of five thousand dollars. He was always ready to do his part in all matters of public interest, and was sincerely mourned by a large circle of friends.

Martin Miles

Mrs. Wales was a worthy companion for Mr. Wales, and in advanced years, holds much of the vivacity of early life, enjoys the esteem of the best portion of the community, is endeavoring to carry out the wishes of her husband in all things, and is passing on to the twilight of life with a sincere trust in rejoining her companion of so many years on the "other side."

JAMES ATHERTON.

One of the wealthiest portions of Lancashire is confined in the area bounded thus: Beginning at Liverpool, the southwest boundary of Lancashire, and following the coast line of the Irish Sea twenty miles north, we reach the river Ribble; from there going eastward fifteen miles, thence south to Manchester and down the river to Liverpool. This section is rich in coal-mines, quarries of useful stones, iron-works, and is the wealthiest cotton-manufacturing district in the world. Through the centre of this territory the Athertons for nearly one thousand years have had immense possessions, which were increased by marrying heiresses, until it became one of the richest families of the great commoners of England. In their manorial estate the town of Atherton lies ten miles northwest of Manchester; here the family originated, and Robert de Atherton (1) lived (1199-1216) as the shreve (high sheriff) of the county under King John, and held the manor of Atherton of the barons of Warrington. William de Atherton, his son, held the manors of Atherton and Pennington (1251). (By intermarriage with the Derby family the title is now vested in that line.) William Atherton (3), of Atherton (1312), had wife Agnes (1339), whose son Henry Atherton (4), of Atherton (1316-30), married Agnes (1387), and had for second son Sir William Atherton (5), of Atherton (1351), knight. He married, first, Jane, daughter of William and sister of Sir Ralph, Woberly, knight; married, second, Margerie, a widow (1396). In the private chapel of the Athertons, in the parish church of Leigh, is a family vault, and the arms of the family hang there. As entered in the Visitation of Sir William Dugdale Norrey, King of Arms (1664-65), they are: Gules, three sparrowhawks, argent crest; a swan, argent, another crest; on a perch a hawk billed, proper. By first wife, William (5) had Sir William Atherton (6), knight; born 1381; died 1416; his wife was Agnes, sole daughter and heiress of Ralph Vernon, Baron of Shipbroke. Their third child, Sir William Atherton (7), knight, married, first, Elizabeth, daughter of Sir John Pilkinton, knight; by her had Margaret and Sir William Atherton (8), who married Margaret, daughter of Sir John Byron, knight, and died in 1441. Among their children was John Atherton (9), whose son George (10), born 1487, by first wife, Anne Ashton, had Sir John Atherton (11), knight, born 1514; died 1513; married, first, Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Alexander Ratcliffe, knight. This marriage was recorded in the Visitation of 1533, where the arms were also entered; he married, second, Margaret, daughter of Thomas Caterall. He was high sheriff under three sovereigns, in 1551, 1555, and 1561, and commander of the Military Hundred in 1553. Among his children was John (12), Esq., born 1556; high sheriff 1583, who was twice married; first, to Elizabeth, daughter of Sir John Byron, knight; second, to Katherine, daughter and co-heiress of John, Lord Conyers, of Hornby Castle. By each wife he had a son John; the first John Atherton (13), of Atherton, who had John (14), died in 1646; married Eleanor, daughter of Sir Thomas Ireland, of Beansey, knight. They had numerous children; one John (15), high sheriff, died in 1655; the second,

John Atherton, of Skelton, was heir to his mother's large estate and title. We have thus far followed the line of heirship, the scions, all worthy representatives of the name, being found in different parts of the country. As the American branch deflected at this period, we have no need of further tracing the English family.

In 1613, Edmund Atherton did in Wigan, Lancashire, his son and next heir, Humphrey, being at this time four years old, thus giving his birth in 1608. This Humphrey is referred to by Mr. Brown in an article on "the Atherton family in England," "New England Historical and Genealogical Register," January, 1881, as perhaps being the identical Humphrey Atherton, major-general of Dorchester, progenitor of the American line. That they are different persons is clearly shown by the fact that Gen. Atherton was killed in 1661, when only thirty-six years old. The other Humphrey would have been fifty-three years old at this time. Humphrey Atherton, born in Lancashire, perhaps son of above, married Mary Wales, probably daughter of John Wales, of Idle, England, and, with three children, Jonathan, Isabel (married Nathaniel Wales, Jr.), and Elizabeth came in the ship "James" from Bristol to America in 1635. Rev. Richard Mather, in his journal of the voyage, names but few of the one hundred passengers, among them Nathaniel Wales, whose will was witnessed by Humphrey Atherton, who was styled in it "loving brother-in-law." They settled in Dorchester. Humphrey was married when an infant. His first child was born when he was fourteen years old, and his wife thirteen. They had twelve children, those mentioned above and the following nine born in Dorchester: Consider, Mary, Margaret, Rest, Increase, Thankful, Hope, Watching, and Patience. Appleton's "American Encyclopædia" says this of him, "Atherton, Humphrey, a military officer whose name is mentioned with much honor in the early annals of Massachusetts. He came from England about 1636, when he signed the covenant of the church of Dorchester. He was admitted as a freeman in 1638, and was deputy in the General Court from Dorchester for that year, and also in 1639-41, and in 1853, from Springfield, when he was chosen Speaker. The next year he was chosen assistant and soon after Major-General. He was much employed in negotiations with the Indians, and made use of his influence with them in a great purchase in the colony of Rhode Island. He died by a fall from his house, at Boston, Sept. 17, 1661. The manner of his death is made matter of comment by Hubbard as one of the judgments of God." His wife died in 1672. In the old Dorchester cemetery is this epitaph:

"Here lies our Captain & Major of Suffolk was withall;
A godly magistrate was he, and Major General;
Two troop horse with him here comes, such worth his love did crave.
Ten companies of foot also mourning march to his grave,
Let all that read be sure to keep the faith as he has done
With Christ he lives now around his name was Humphrey Atherton."

Consider (2 American gen.), son of Humphrey, married Anne Annably, Dec. 14, 1671. His son Humphrey (3), had a son John (4), who became "deacon," and whose son John (5), married Mary, daughter of Rev. Jediah Adams, the first settled pastor of Stoughton, where he ministered with great acceptability for many years (see "History of First Parish," on another page). They had nine children, John, Jediah, Humphrey, Mary, Rachel, Elijah, Samuel, Mary, and Nathan. Samuel (6), born Sept. 19, 1784, was a man much esteemed, possessing good sterling qualities. He was a farmer, owning about eighty acres of the homestead of his father near Stoughton Centre, on which he was born and lived his long life of over ninety-two years. He married Feb. 28, 1811, Abigail, daughter of Ralph and Abigail (Soran) Pope, of Stoughton. She came of an old New England family of repute, the first American ancestor, John Pope, coming about 1633 from the neighborhood of London, England, and settling in 1640 in "Dorchester New Grant," now Stoughton, the line being John (1), John (2), Ralph (3), Ralph (4) (a physician of great kindness and benevolence), Col. Frederick (5) (he was a justice, colonel, serving in 1756 with his regiment on the Canada frontier in the French and Indian war; was State representative from Stoughton. In the Revolution, when the summons came to take the field he was plowing. Taking the harness from his horse he at once made ready, and with his two eldest sons, Ralph and Samuel Ward, joined the army. He served in several campaigns, his sons acting as his aids. His third son, Alexander, then but sixteen, fulfilled faithfully the task of carrying on the farm and supporting the family), Ralph (6) (he was born in Stoughton, 1759, and died 1797. He served through the Revolution; married Abigail, daughter of Maj. Robert and Rachel (Draper) Swan, born 1761, died 1852, aged ninety-one. Their daughter, Abigail (7), who married Samuel Atherton, was born in Stoughton, Mass., Dec. 5, 1785, dying March 19, 1868, aged eighty-two years, three and a half months). Samuel Atherton was of energetic temperament, cheerful disposition, eminently social, enjoying humor, and always ready with some bright remark, pointed with fun. He was honest, straightforward, prudent, saving, and perfectly just in all the relations of life. He had musical tastes, was a great singer, and when prevented sometimes from talking by an impediment (stammering) which afflicted him, he would sing clearly the words he wished to speak. He and his brother Nathan were among the originators of the "Stoughton Musical Society." He was selectman in his younger days, and held other positions of trust. Although a great sufferer from rheumatism in his later years, he continued cheerful even to the time of his death. He was very fond of his brother, Nathan, four years his junior; they lived all their lives a few rods apart; both attained great age, and died within three months of each other; Nathan's death occurring Nov. 13, 1876, at eighty-eight. A short time previous to his death, Nathan walked to and from church for morning service, a distance of two and a quarter miles.

Samuel was a successful farmer, and at one time the largest land-holder in town. He voted at every election from 1805 till 1876, when his last vote was cast for the Hayes electoral ticket. The children of Samuel and Abigail Atherton were six,—Mary (Mrs. William Belcher), Vashti (Mrs. James Swan), Samuel, Abigail (Mrs. Joseph Swan), James, and William. James Atherton (7)—(Humphrey (1), Consider (2), Humphrey (3), John (4), John (5), Samuel (6))—was born on the homestead mentioned above May 6, 1819. He had common-school and academic education; remained with his father on the farm until he was of age, teaching, however, several terms of winter schools. He married, first, May 5, 1853, Phebe, daughter of John and Phebe Reed, born in Boston, Feb. 9, 1831, died March 11, 1868. Her father was a civil officer of Boston for many years, and was strong, fearless, and uncompromising in the discharge of duty. His ancestors trace their origin through early New England to one of England's most honored families, dating from a period anteceding the Norman conquest by over a century, and which has, in each successive generation, held places high in the counsels of royalty. After marriage, Mr. Atherton continued on the old place, and there began the manufacture of boots with his brother William, under the firm-title of J. & W. Atherton. This firm continued in business some years, and was prosperous. It was finally merged with the firm of Atherton, Stetson & Co., a solid Boston house, the Athertons being Samuel, James, and William. James' health not being robust, after his business energies had been rewarded with a sufficient competency, he retired from active labor. This was in 1867, his connection with Atherton, Stetson & Co. ceasing in 1861. About 1838 he removed to the house now occupied by his sons. His children, all by his first wife, are James (8), born July 26, 1854; William (8), April 30, 1859; and Walter (8), March 18, 1863. Mr. Atherton married, second, Mary B. Marshall, of Boston, June 1, 1869. She died Feb. 5, 1880. Always in delicate health, Mr. Atherton was a man of energy, and accomplished much. In early life he was fond of discussions, and took an active part in debating societies. He was a quick and ready speaker, a clear logician, and there showed the sound judgment which distinguished him in later life. He was a great reader, and kept abreast of the current of the world's affairs, and always liked to discuss matters of thought and moment. He engaged but little in public life, devoted himself wholly to his business, which rewarded his attention with a liberal competency. This was not obtained by any of the fraudulent devices so common in business life, but the motto, dated 1855, which, worn by long use, was found in his pocket-book after his death, furnishes the motive which actuated him through all life's changes, and is a better delineation of his character than any words of ours: "Do unto others as you would that others should do to you under like circumstances." He sympathized with the Universalist creed, attended its services, and was active and liberal in all church matters. He was systematic and orderly in all things. A good citizen, aiding much in building up the interests of Stoughton, his counsel was often sought in critical and important affairs. He was Whig and Republican in politics.

SAMUEL ATHERTON.

Samuel Atherton (7), son of Samuel and Abigail Atherton, was born Jan. 26, 1815, in Stoughton; was educated at the common schools; passed the early part of his life (until twenty years of age) on the homestead farm. He then went to Boston (1835) as clerk for William Capen, shoe and leather dealer, and remained with him about two years. Then taking a position as book-keeper with the firm of Prouty & Co., Commercial Street, wholesale hardware, he stayed with them for one year. He next established himself in business, as a retail boot and shoe dealer, on Washington Street, in company with Edwin Battles, under the firm-name of Battles & Atherton. After one year the connection with Mr. Battles was dissolved, and Mr. Atherton was employed by Caleb Stetson, wholesale shoe and leather dealer, corner of Broad and Central Streets, whom he served as clerk until Jan. 1, 1842, when he became partner, the new firm being C. Stetson & Co.

This partnership lasted about three years. Then Mr. Stetson retired from active business, remaining, however, special partner, but the business was conducted as "Samuel Atherton." This relation continued three years, when Mr. Stetson again resumed active connection, and the firm-name became S. Atherton & Co., to be changed two years later to Atherton, Stetson & Co., on the admission as member of A. W. Stetson, now president of the State Bank. From that time to 1861 the firm-name was unchanged. On the retirement of Caleb Stetson, in 1852, James and William Atherton were admitted as partners, and they continued the Stoughton manufactory as their portion of the firm work. In 1861, Samuel and James Atherton withdrew from the firm, it, however, retaining the old name of Atherton, Stetson & Co. Soon after George E. Atherton, son of Samuel, was admitted as partner. This business was one of the most successful in this department of trade in Boston, five or six of the partners retiring in succession with wealth.

Mr. Atherton married, Sept. 16, 1841, Tempie H., daughter of Col. Joseph and Mary (Rich) Holbrook, of Boston. Their children were George Edward, Charles Francis, and Sarah Ann, who married George P. Sewal, of Boston. The children of this marriage were Atherton and Mabel A. Mrs. Tempie Atherton died Feb. 24, 1849. Mr. Atherton married, July 3, 1856, Susan B., daughter of Capt. Richard and Jerusha (Rich) Baker. Their children were Helen L. (married Edward H. Hawes, of Boston) and Susan M. (married W. Morton Robinson, of Lynn). Mrs. Susan Atherton died May 18, 1858. Mr. Atherton married, Oct. 6, 1869, Mrs. Susan M. Holton, daughter of Joseph Bassett and Margaret Richardson. Mr. Atherton passed some years of his married life in Charlestown. He purchased the beautiful place in Dorchester where he now resides in May, 1856, and has made his home there ever since. Mr. Atherton is a director in the New England Bank, Prescott Insurance Company, Massachusetts Loan and Trust Company, president of the Dorchester Gas-Light Company, and connected with various other corporations. He is a man of great executive ability, clear intellect, sound practical sense, and force of character. By his enterprise, sagacity, and integrity he won the confidence and esteem of the leading business men of Boston, and has a high rank in financial circles. Whig and Republican in political belief, he took hold of politics with the same enthusiasm and energy which characterized him in business life, and has always taken an active part in the "primaries." He could have won political honors, and worn them gracefully and with distinction, but, aside from representing Dorchester in the State Legislatures of 1867, 1870, and 1877, he has not accepted political position. In private life Mr. Atherton is marked for his eminently social qualities, his courtesy to all, his warm and strong friendships, kindness, and liberality to the unfortunate and to charitable objects. He is Unitarian in religious belief.

LEONARD HODGES.

Leonard Hodges, for so many years one of Stoughton's leading manufacturers, was born in Taunton, Mass., July 8, 1794. His father, Samuel Hodges, was a man of solidity and good repute, and for many years an "innkeeper" (a position of consequence in those days) in Taunton and Easton. He married Lucinda Austin, of Dighton, and had several children, among whom were Samuel, Lucinda, and Leonard. Samuel was one of the incorporators of the Gay Cotton Manufacturing Company, established in Stoughton in 1813, on the site where afterward stood Leonard Hodges' Satinet Mills. In the war of 1812 he rendered distinguished services as an officer in the army, and in 1819 was appointed United States consul at the Cape Verde Islands, where he died about 1825, aged thirty-four. Lucinda married Rev. Calvin Park, a Congregational clergyman of reputation, who was at that time pastor of the church in Stoughton.

Leonard Hodges lived in Taunton till 1820, when he removed to Stoughton, and established himself as a working jeweler and merchant of jewelry. About 1822 he began the manufacture of satinets in a small way, the weaving being done by hand. This business, conducted with care, diligence, and unswerving industry, grew steadily in importance, and after a few years, with new and improved machinery, he began to make hosiery-yarn, employing at first about twenty-five hands. Under his shrewd management the business assumed large proportions, and in 1851, after accumulating a large property, he retired from active labor, letting his mills to his nephew, Samuel W. Hodges, who, with Calvin Tuck, founded the firm of Tuck & Hodges. After five years Mr. Tuck retired, and in 1857, Mr. L. Hodges sold the mill to Charles H. French, of Canton, thus closing his connection with manufacturing.

Mr. Hodges married, Jan. 12, 1848, Jane, daughter of Elijah and Ruth (Tisdale) Atherton, of Stoughton. Their children are Anna A., born Aug. 20, 1855, married Claude Wilson, M.D., of Waterville, N. Y.;

Leonard Hodges
— 1850 —

Benjamin Smith

and William L., born July 13, 1858, inherited the old homestead in Stoughton, and married May 10, 1883, Lillie Gray, daughter of David M. and Lydia A. Simmonds, of Boston.

Mr. Hodges was a diligent, hard-working man, not given to boasting nor display; but by patient industry was truly the architect of his own fortune, attending closely to business and caring not for public honor or office. He was a careful counselor in all practical matters; for many years a director of the Neponset Bank of Canton, and possessed great strength of character and steadfastness of purpose. While quiet and reserved in his intercourse with others, he had a large circle of attached friends, and was considered one of Stoughton's representative men, and when he died, March 1, 1871, in the fullness of nearly seventy-seven years, the community lost a valuable member, and business circles an honest man.

ASAHIEL SOUTHWORTH.

Asahel Southworth—Constant (1), Nathaniel (2), Edward (3), Constant (4), Jedediah (5), Consider (6), Asahel (7)—was born in Stoughton, July 17, 1814; he was the youngest child of his parents, and received the education imparted at the common schools of those days. One of the features of his attending winter schools was to start with a fire-brand in the morning and go to the school-house, a distance of a mile, and with this brand kindle the fire. He, like all his father's family, was early taught the value and necessity of labor. When he was twenty years old (1835) he, with his brother Jedediah, hired the mill of his father, which in 1837 they bought; built a new dam on the site of the present one. The same year they added fourteen feet to the length of the factory and constructed a water-wheel. Their business increased until their water-supply was unable to furnish them with sufficient power. So in August, 1847, they moved to the mill in Canton, since occupied by the Net and Twine Company, where they manufactured for two years. Mr. Jedediah Southworth suddenly dying, Asahel, who while doing business in Canton had suffered extreme ill health from neuralgia, sold all the machinery of the business except that for making cords, with which he returned to Stoughton. In the spring of 1858 a set of woolen machinery was put into the factory by Mr. Southworth and B. L. Morrison, they commencing business under the name of Morrison & Southworth. When this partnership was formed, it was a condition that when Consider Southworth, Asahel's son, should become of age, and understand the business, he should take his father's place. This partnership continued until 1861. Feb. 1, 1861, from some unknown cause, the dam gave way, leaving a hole forty feet wide and fourteen feet deep, and shortly after this firm was dissolved. In the spring of 1861 the dam was rebuilt, a new and larger water-wheel put in, and fifteen feet added to the width of the mill, in which business was resumed by Asahel and Consider Southworth under the firm-name of A. Southworth & Son. The product of the new mill was about seventy-five pounds of yarn per day. In 1866 a brick stack was built, a boiler and engine put in, and the factory enlarged. The building is now two stories in height, with French roof, and thirty-nine by fifty-four feet on the ground; the basement and floors affording about eight thousand five hundred feet of floor surface. In 1868, the old machinery was sold, and new of the most approved kind substituted. In 1867, printed or chinchilla yarns came into use, and the new machinery that is necessary to make this kind of goods was added. In 1872, when chinchilla yarn was most demanded, they manufactured over one hundred and thirty thousand pounds. In 1875, Mr. Asahel Southworth retired from the business. He was thrice married, first, to Harriot, daughter of Ebenezer and Mary (Wild) Kinsley, of Easton; she was born Nov. 27, 1813; died Oct. 9, 1853. Their children were Consider, Mary H. (died young), Mary E. (Mrs. J. D. Taber, of Quincy), and Harriot E. (Mrs. W. R. Blake, of Stoughton). Mr. Southworth married, second, Mrs. Sarah D. Fellows, née Rowe, of Rockport; they had one child, Elmer Kinsley; third, to Mrs. Lydia Swift. Mr. Southworth devoted himself to business, refusing office, only accepting those of school committee and road surveyor. He was a successful and prosperous man. He was energetic, of nervous temperament, active, and cautious, social, yet unassuming, and fond of home. His moral qualities placed him in accord with the highest society, and he was universally esteemed. With the exception of his two years' residence in Canton, he lived all his life on the homestead of his father, in Stoughton. He was a member of the Universalist Society and of the Independent Order of Odd-Fellows. He was the first to build an ice-house and start the ice business in Stoughton. His death occurred Sept. 26, 1880.

CONSIDER SOUTHWORTH (eighth generation), son of Asahel and Harriet (Kinsley) Southworth, born in Stoughton, March 7, 1840. Like many of New England's successful men, he had but common-school advantages of education, yet this was supplemented by a thorough practical knowledge of his father's manufacturing. He married, March 7, 1861, Anne J., daughter of Pelatiah and Myra (Wales) Stevens, of Stoughton. Their surviving children are Harvey K. (born Jan. 16, 1867) and Martin O. (born Nov. 14, 1869). In addition to the firm of A. Southworth & Son, in 1865, Mr. Southworth formed a partnership with George A. Cooper to manufacture bonnet wire, and since 1870 has supplied the inhabitants of Stoughton with ice. From the retirement of his father from the business of A. Southworth & Son, in 1875, Mr. Southworth continued it until Jan. 1, 1880, when his brother, E. Kinsley Southworth, became his partner, and is now associated with him. They built soon after a "picker"-house, thirty by thirty feet, and put in a small steam-engine. They could then make about three hundred and fifty pounds of yarn per day, of which one hundred was printed. In the spring of 1882 a brick addition was made to the mill, an eighty-horse steam-boiler put in, and also an additional engine. A disastrous flood in the fall of 1882 carried away a portion of the dam and injured the foundation of the mill. Owing to the general stagnation of the woolen interest, no improvements have since been made except to repair the damage of the flood. The specialties they manufacture are such yarns as are used for Cardigan jackets and by fancy-goods knitters. In about three months after marriage Mr. and Mrs. Southworth commenced housekeeping in part of the homestead dwelling of his grandfather, Col. Consider Southworth, where they resided until they removed, in 1878, to the pleasant residence now occupied by them. In politics Mr. Southworth is a temperance Republican. He has been elected three years successively selectman and chairman of the board, and during his administration the duties of the office have been extremely responsible and arduous. The elaborate and beautiful town hall has received largely of his time and attention during its construction, and every bill connected therewith was examined and audited by him. As an evidence of the estimation in which he is held by the citizens of Stoughton, and his business ability, we give the language of one of its substantial farmers: "The town hall would have cost ten thousand dollars more had it not been for Mr. Southworth." He has only been identified with town affairs during the last ten years, previously devoting himself to his business, in which he has been fairly successful. He is Universalist in his belief, and was parish treasurer for several years, until increasing cares caused him to decline serving longer. He joined the Sons of Temperance when fourteen years of age, and has never violated his obligations or broken the pledge he then took. He is a man of positive character and convictions, yet unobtrusive and unostentatious. He seeks no public duties, but when called to perform them is faithful to the command,—“Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might.” His manner of life is quiet and simple, and he much prefers the society of his home and family to parties or clubs, and enters with reluctance public gatherings. Enjoying rural life, he takes pleasure in cultivation of the soil and horticulture, and has a fine orchard of five hundred trees. Perhaps no man in Stoughton has been more earnestly devoted to its welfare than he, and surely none holds a higher place in the regards of its people.

COL. CONSIDER SOUTHWORTH (1).

The romantic history of Lady Alice Southworth, who married Governor William Bradford for her second husband in the infant Plymouth Colony, has been told over and over again during the last two hundred and fifty years, and of equally proud and noble descent as any of the English peerage is the Southworth family. Its transatlantic genealogy is thus given in Winsor's "History of Duxbury:" "It was procured by Mr. H. B. Somerby, from the Herald's college, London, for Nathan Southworth, Esq., of Boston. It is not known whether the first named are to be understood as in regular lines of descent, or collateral branches of the family. [It is evidently direct line of descent.] Sir Gilbert Southworth, of Southworth Hall, Lancaster, Knt., married Elizabeth, daughter of Nicholas Dayes, of Salmsbury, in Lancashire. Sir John Southworth, of Southworth Hall, married Jane, daughter of John Booth, of Barton, Esq. Richard Southworth, of Salmsbury, Esq., married Elizabeth, daughter of Edward Molineaux, Esq., of Segton, in Lancashire. Sir Christopher Southworth, of Southworth Hall, married Isabel, daughter of John Dutton, of County Chester. Sir John Southworth, of Salmsbury, Knt., married Ellen, daughter of Richard Langton, of Newton, Walton Lane: children,—Sir Thomas, Christian, and Richard Southworth."

Richard Southworth, of London, merchant, married Jane, daughter of Edward Lloyd, of Shropshire: children,—Henry, of Somersetshire, married Elizabeth, daughter of John Pillsant, of London, merchant; and Thomas, who married Jane, daughter of Nicholas Mynne, of Norfolk. Constant Southworth (if Loubberly's table is understood correctly), who married Alice Carpenter, afterwards Mrs. Governor William Bradford, of Plymouth Colony, New England, was son of Thomas and Jane (Mynne) Southworth. Their children were Thomas M., Elizabeth Rayner, and Constant, who married Elizabeth Collier. According to the "Pilgrim Memorials," Pilgrim Hall, Plymouth, stands on "a part of the extensive estate of Mr. Thomas Southworth, in 1668, and is probably comprised within the four acres given him by his mother, Mrs. Alice Bradford, relict of Gov. Bradford." Thomas Southworth, "a magistrate and good benefactor to both church and commonwealth," died in 1669.

According to old colonial records, "on the 26th day of March, 1670, Mistress Alice Bradford, senior, changed this life for a better, having attained to fourscore years of age, or thereabouts. She was a godly matron, and much loved while she lived, and lamented, though aged, when she died, and was honorably interred, on the 29th of the month aforesaid, at New Plimouth." Alice came over in the ship "Anne," her sons Thomas and Constant some time later, in 1628.

Constant Southworth had by his wife, Elizabeth Collier, Edward, Nathaniel, Mercey (married S. Freeman), Alice (married Col. Benjamin Clark), Mary (married David Alden), Elizabeth (married William Fobes, of Little Compton), Priscilla, and William. Nathaniel, born at Plymouth, 1648, married Desire, daughter of Edward Gray, in 1672; had Constant, born 1674; Mary, born 1676; Ichabod, born 1678; Elizabeth, married James Sproat; Nathaniel, born 1684; and Edward, who settled in Middleborough and married Bridget Bosworth, of Hull, in 1711, and died in 1749, leaving four sons, Constant, Edward, Lemuel, and Benjamin, who, as stated by Judge Michell, all settled in North Bridgewater. Constant married Martha, daughter of Joseph Keith, in 1734; to them were born Betsey, in 1735; Nathaniel, in 1737; Ezekiel, 1739; Martha and Mary, 1741; Desire, 1742; Jedediah, 1745; Constant, 1747; Sarah, 1749, and Isabel, 1751. Jedediah, born in North Bridgewater, married Mary, daughter of Capt. Consider Atherton (see biography of James Atherton). She was born in Stoughton, where they settled and had children,—Jedediah, Consider, Polly, Betsey, and Constant.

Consider Southworth was known as colonel, and married Mary Hixon, Jan. 24, 1799, and had nine children,—Lyman, born June 6, 1800; Jarvis, born Aug. 20, 1801; Lemuel D., born Sept. 7, 1802; Consider A., born May 14, 1805; Amasa; Mira, born Nov. 3, 1810, married Alva Morrison, of Braintree; Jedediah, born April 27, 1812; Asahel, Paul D., born May 27, 1820. Col. Consider Southworth was born April 8, 1775, probably in Stoughton. He was one of the primitive shoe manufacturers of that period, and, it is said, bought the right to peg shoes (then a new invention) in the town of Stoughton. He was prominently connected with the interests of Stoughton. As colonel of the militia, he was called into active service with his regiment in the war of 1812, but was not called into action. He held a high position in the Masonic fraternity; was a member of the First Parish Church; was well developed physically, of strong positive character, lived in the western part of Stoughton, and was especially fond of good horses, always owning one or two fine specimens. He was a valuable citizen, generous and hospitable in all the relations of life, and made a strong impress on the local history of his day. He was a life-long Democrat, a true patriot, and while he deprecated the agitation that led to the Rebellion, had it not been for his fourscore years he would have been found at the front battling for the Union. He had no sympathy for traitors. Up to the time of the free-soil agitation his sons were in political accord with him, when Asahel became an active worker in that cause. He died June 6, 1863, much lamented. His wife was born July 22, 1777, and died Dec. 6, 1856. Col. Southworth commenced in 1823 a cotton-thread factory, which was finished in 1824, and was a wooden building twenty-four by thirty-eight feet, with eight feet posts and a stone basement story. His son, Consider A., who had learned the business in Pawtucket, R. I., took charge of the manufacturing department for some time, being succeeded by his brother Amasa. Work was begun on this mill July 13, 1824, and forty-five pounds of thread were spun by August 1st. In August ninety-eight and a half pounds were spun; in September one hundred and ten pounds. The total product to Jan. 1, 1825, was eight hundred and fifty-three pounds. In 1825 two thousand four hundred and fifty-three and a half pounds were produced. About 1826 Consider A. Southworth built a cord-twister, and he began to make cotton cord of various colors, used at that time to finish the tops of boots and shoes. These colored cords were made in the Southworth family until the advent of the sewing-machine changed the style of finishing, and the manufacturing of cording was given up in 1857, as there was no demand for the goods. "The Southworths made the first cotton cord ever manufactured in Massachusetts by water-power."

Amasa Southworth (2) was born March 4, 1807, in Stoughton; had a meagre, common-school education; was early inured to labor, and for most of his life worked diligently with both head and hands. His youth was passed assisting his father in farming and in the mill. On becoming of age, in 1828, with his brother, Consider A., he formed the manufacturing copartnership of C. A. & A. Southworth. Their mill was built on the site now occupied (1883) by the mill of Consider Southworth & Brother. About 1829 they added a mill on the site of the present mill of A. Southworth & Co., West Stoughton. In 1857, Amasa purchased the interest of his brother in this mill, and took as partners his son, Massena B., and son-in-law, Edwin S. Henry, forming the firm of A. Southworth & Co., under which name business is still conducted, and manufactures Sea Island and fancy cotton, harness twine, line twine, threads, etc. In 1859, Mr. Southworth sold his interest to his son, William S., who then became of age. Mr. Southworth married, March 4, 1829, Abigail, daughter of Asa and Polly (Kent) Sherman, of Marshfield. From Marcia A. Thomas' "Memorials of Marshfield," we copy this: "William Sherman had a garden place at Duxbury, 1637, and lands towards Green Harbor, 1640. He early settled on the north side of the highlands, called on early records, White's Hill, near Peregrine White's. He had John (born 1646), William, and perhaps others." From its location and the family name, this was written of Mrs. Southworth's ancestors, as this describes the old homestead of her birth. Her father, Asa Sherman, born April 12, 1773, was a farmer of Marshfield, and owned and commanded a coasting vessel. He was a militia captain, an active and energetic man, well acquainted with many people, and held in high repute by his townsmen. He married Polly Kent, and had Polly, born Sept. 15, 1799; Asa, born Feb. 28, 1801; Wealthy, born Feb. 22, 1803; Abigail, born Aug. 15, 1806; Alice W., born Feb. 24, 1810; and William, born May 25, 1813. Social, honest, patriotic, and upright, he died April 26, 1870, aged ninety-seven. His wife, born Dec. 28, 1775, died Jan. 10, 1878, aged one hundred and two years and thirteen days. She was a lady of the old school, of sweet disposition and courteous manners, and much beloved. The children of Amasa and Abigail Southworth are A. Malvina, born Dec. 10, 1830, married E. S. Henry, has three living children; Walter E., born July 16, 1864; Alice S., born June 29, 1867; and Ella S., born Jan. 14, 1871. Massena B., born Jan. 7, 1834, married Ellen E., daughter of Albert G. and Hannah Vose (Gay) Eaton, March 12, 1866. Their children are Grace E., born April 2, 1871; Fred. W., born Sept. 25, 1874; and Inez M., born Feb. 26, 1880. William I., born June 9, 1839, married Martha E., daughter of Orin and Polly (Hayden) Belcher, Jan. 6, 1861. Their children are Edith G., born Sept. 26, 1869, and William B., born Nov. 9, 1871. Amasa E., born March 9, 1844, married Abbie M., daughter of Charles and Lydia (Keene) Dorman, of Rockport, Mass., Dec. 25, 1866. Their children are Edwin W., born Sept. 22, 1867; Abbie D., born Feb. 10, 1877; and Chester Dean, born March 5, 1882. Amasa E. resides in East Somerville, and is a member of the firm of Hyde & Southworth, wholesale grocers, Boston, Mass. Mr. and Mrs. Amasa Southworth commenced housekeeping in a small house near the present mill of A. Southworth & Co., and, after several removals, they finally occupied, in 1836, the house which was Mr. Southworth's home till death, and now the residence of his widow. This house was separated by a driveway from one built exactly like it by his brother, Consider A., which has been destroyed by fire.

Amasa Southworth was liberal in all things of a social nature, fond of home and domestic circle, of good judgment, strong character, firm principle, successful in business; in politics a Democrat, and in religion a Universalist. The life of a private business man, whose promises are kept and whose credit is good, is apt to be uneventful, as far as the purposes of a biographical sketch is concerned. Such a life is so because good credit accompanies or follows correct business habits, and such habits mean the smooth running of affairs, when each day, though it brings its work and obligations, leaves its obligations complied with and its labor performed. Such lives are the foundation and superstructure of society, and such a life was Amasa Southworth's. The famous and eventful lives may well be considered the architectural embellishments, but they must have the solid structure to form themselves upon. Life is not a dream is the assertion of more than one experience, and the lives of great events are rendered possible only by just such lives as the one in question. Mrs. Southworth, his companion of many years, with unusual activity of mind and body, surrounded by her children, is "only waiting" for the coming of the "twilight" to join her beloved husband.

HON. ELISHA C. MONK.

Hon. Elisha Capen Monk, son of George R. and Sarah (Capen) Monk, was born in Stoughton, Mass., April 25, 1828. From Hon. Ellis Ames, of Canton, the noted genealogist, we gather the following information: "The ancestor who came to this country was probably Christopher Monk. In past generations there have been several Christopher Monks in Boston, and several of the same name in Stoughton, one of whom was born Jan. 14, 1733, another in 1757. At the 'Massacre' (so called), March 5, 1770, when the British troops fired upon the inhabitants of Boston, one Christopher Monk, of Boston, an apprentice, seventeen years old, stood next to Gen. Joseph Warren, and was shot down by a bullet through one of his lungs. Gen. Warren, who was a skillful physician and surgeon, attended him every day for several years, without fee, until he finally recovered. What relation he was to the Monks, of Stoughton, is not now known. George Monk kept a 'famous tavern' on what is now Park Street, in Boston, in 1686. Another George Monk had his will proven Oct. 10, 1740. He was a shopkeeper in Boston. There were four Elias Monks, one of whom, great-great-grandfather to Elisha C., came to Stoughton about 1720, and since then the family has been quite numerous there. He settled in the southeastern part of Stoughton, was a farmer, and died in 1750. He left at least two sons,—George and William. William was a soldier in both the French and Indian wars of 1756, and the Revolution, and was at the battle of the Plains of Abraham, at the taking of Quebec, under Gen. Wolfe. George was born Feb. 10, 1734, in Stoughton, and died about 1814. I knew him very well. He was a farmer. His son Jacob was a farmer also. He was grandfather to Elisha Capen Monk."

George, father of Jacob, was a volunteer in the Revolution, receiving a bounty from the town, and served through the war. Jacob married Milly Randall, of Easton, whose mother lived to the advanced age of one hundred and four years. Their children were Nathan, George R. Stillman, Jacob, Almira (married Isaac Blanchard), Eliza (died single), and Caroline (married Charles Stone, of North Bridgewater).

The Stoughton home of the family was in the south part of the town, near the "Old Colony" line, and has been held by the family from the first occupant until now. Jacob Monk was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, a large man of fine presence, quiet and unostentatious, and although very modest, was of sterling worth. He lived to be sixty-seven. George Randall Monk, son of Jacob, born about 1799, had the educational advantages of the public schools of his day, became a manufacturer of boots and shoes in Stoughton about 1825, and continued about ten years in that business, when he removed to West Troy, N. Y., and established himself in manufacturing, but after a four-years' stay he gave up business in consequence of a fall which produced paralysis of both legs. He then returned to Stoughton, where he died Oct. 9, 1843, aged forty-four years.

He married Sarah, daughter of Deacon Elisha and Milly (Gay) Capen. (Milly Gay, previous to her marriage, spun and wove cloth from flax raised on her father's farm at Dry Pond, and herself carried it to Boston, and sold it for money to purchase her wedding-dress. Her father, Timothy Gay, was a minute-man in the Révolution, and was called out to aid in the defense of Roxbury. She was a woman of remarkable strength of character and physical endurance, and taught school before her marriage. She lived to be ninety-seven years of age.) They had five children who attained mature years,—George E., Elisha C., Harriet (deceased; married Ephraim W. Littlefield, of East Stoughton, and left three children), Adelia A. (married, first, William H. Curtis, had one child; second, A. A. Lamb; they have had two children, and now live in Stoughton), Eliza F. (married D. S. Tolman, lives in Brockton, and has two children).

Elisha C. Monk was fifteen years old at his father's death. He had a good common-school education, supplemented by the private teaching of Rev. William Cornell (a successful teacher and pastor of the Congregational Church in Stoughton) in Latin, rhetoric, etc. He learned the bootmaker's trade, and could make a good boot when eighteen. He continued at the trade ten years, and alone and with others conducted manufacturing of boots for twelve years, and was fairly successful financially. He became one of the incorporators, in 1872, of the Stoughton Boot and Shoe Company, and was its agent. This continued eight years, doing an annual business of nearly a quarter of a million dollars, and although not a financial success, still it gave much employment to residents of the town, distributing large amounts of money, and benefiting the community by the consequent increase of its business. In 1870, Mr. Monk went West as one of the original corporation ("Union Colony") which established the town of Greeley, Col. He was one of the trustees the first year of the colony, and erected the first building in the new town. This colony was one of the most successful ever undertaken, and will ever be historic from the sagacity and shrewd wisdom of its founders. Mr. Monk has been financially interested in Greeley until the present year. For the last ten years, and until within a few months, he has been the senior member of the firm of Monk & Ingalsbe, transacting a mercantile business in Greeley and at Colorado Springs.

Mr. Monk has ever been in the foremost file of political progress. He was a member of the organization of Sons of Temperance in Stoughton for twenty years, and until the dissolution of the lodge. He early became connected with the Free-Soil movement, and was elected on that issue and ticket to represent Stoughton in the Massachusetts Legislature in 1856. As this movement gathered strength, and the great civil war was forced upon the country, Mr. Monk gave his heartiest efforts to the maintenance of the Union and the success of the Republican party. He gave much of his time in filling the quota of Stoughton in the numerous drafts made upon her for soldiers in the field, and the promptitude with which she responded to them was largely due to his exertions. As a Republican he represented his district in the Senate of Massachusetts in 1866-67, and served with credit on important committees. In religious belief he is a Universalist.

Mr. Monk married, Jan. 13, 1851, Sally B., daughter of Ethan and Sarah (Wentworth) French. She was born in Stoughton, Aug. 23, 1835. Their children are Bertha L., George, and Eunice C. Bertha married Isaac V. Marston, a member of the manufacturing house of Farrell & Marston, Stoughton, and has one child,—Isaac Bertram. Mr. Monk ranks among the successful men of whom Stoughton is worthily proud. Conservative, yet actuated by convictions, he has never been a hindrance to true progress, but one of its most earnest assistants. Pleasant and unrestrained in social intercourse, faithful in all the relations of life, those who have known him longest are his strongest friends.

LUCIUS CLAPP.

Thomas Clapp (1), the first American ancestor of Lucius Clapp, was born in Dorchester, England, in 1597, and came of an old Devonshire family of Danish extraction. He came to this country probably in 1633, as in 1634 his name appears on the town records of Dorchester, in which town he was admitted a freeman in 1638. He afterwards removed to Weymouth, next to Scituate, where he was deacon of the church in 1647. He was an enterprising, energetic, and useful man; was deputy in 1649, and overseer of the poor in 1667, serving the first term of the existence of those offices in the town. He married Abigail —, had nine children, and died April 20, 1684, greatly respected. His third child, Samuel (2), married June 14, 1666, Hannah, daughter of Thomas Gill, of Hingham. He inherited his father's residence; was a distinguished man, and notably so in Scituate, his native town, which speaks well for his ability, as it then contained some of the ablest men in the colony. He was eight years deputy of Plymouth Colony. After the union of Plymouth and Massachusetts Colonies, he was representative to the General Court of Massachusetts fourteen years. In many other and important ways, he served his town and colony with zeal and fidelity, and died at an advanced age. He had ten children, of whom Joseph (3) was second, and was born Dec. 14, 1668. He married and lived all his days in Scituate, where he owned land. He had twelve children. His son Joseph (4), born July 15, 1701, was deacon, inherited his father's estate; married, first, Hannah Briggs; second, Sarah Perkins, and reared a family of fifteen children. His eldest son, Joseph (5), born in Scituate, Feb. 21, 1734-35, married there Eliza Turner, and spent the latter portion of his life elsewhere. He had six children, one of whom, Barnard (6), born in Scituate, married Lydia Packard and settled in Braintree, where he died in 1803, leaving two children,—Charles (7) and Lydia (married Daniel Holbrook). Charles, born in Braintree, Jan. 10, 1795, was early an orphan, his mother dying when he was scarcely two years old, and his father when he was about eight. He was taken by his uncle, Nathan Packard, a farmer of North Bridgewater, with whom he remained until his majority. He acquired sufficient education to enable him to teach several terms of school in early life, and in which he gave great satisfaction. He married Sally, daughter of Nathaniel and Betsey Manley, who was born in North Bridgewater, and shortly after settled in North Easton as a farmer. In 1821, he came to Stoughton, purchased seventy-five acres of land, which, with additions, now is the farm occupied by his son Lucius, and was ever after a resident there. He died Jan. 16, 1838, a quiet, unostentatious man, of good repute. He held the various town offices of importance with credit, and was called out to defend the coast in the war of 1812. His children were Lucius (8), and Charles, who died, aged nineteen, in 1846. He was a young man of more than ordinary ability, quiet and unassuming in his manners, honorable and upright in his life, making friends of all who came in contact with him. He was a good scholar, having, beside his common-school education, studied several terms at an academy, and was engaged in a course of studies at the normal school in Bridgewater, preparing himself for future usefulness, of which he gave great promise, when he was prostrated by consumption.

Lucius Clapp is the eighth in direct descent from Thomas, the emigrant, and was born in North Bridgewater (now Brockton), Mass. He was educated at common and private schools; was reared a farmer; took pride in agriculture, and has always followed that avocation, and is to-day one of the representative farmers of this progressive age. He has always resided on his father's homestead; has been successful in business, and has used the funds Providence has given into his care wisely, and done much to make him remembered as a liberal and kind-hearted man. He married Emily, daughter of Lewis Waters, July 14, 1847. Formerly a Whig, Mr. Clapp has been identified with the most progressive political creeds. He was one of the original Free-Soilers, and chairman of the first Free-Soil meeting held in Stoughton. Since its organization he has supported the Republican party. He has been member of school committees several years, and selectman of Stoughton seven years, and now (1883) holds that position. He has always been pronounced in advocacy of temperance, and has been connected with every movement for the betterment and advancement of his native town. He is an attendant and supporter of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

We might write much of the esteem in which he is held by the better element of the community in which he has passed his entire life, but we forbear, fearing that we might wound a modest, retiring nature, when we only sought to do justice. We must, however, give the remark made by a prominent citizen concerning him, "He is a selectman in the fullest and highest sense of the term, an able man, and honest and faithful as able."

ROBERT PORTER.

Robert Porter is (eighth) in direct descent from Richard Porter, who with others came over from Weymouth, England, in 1635, and settled at Weymouth, Mass. In the years 1648, 1654, 1663, and 1668 grants of land were made to Richard Porter. He was continually in office as selectman, constable, and upon committees; was a member of the original church,—“Brother Richard Porter” often occurs on the old records. The name of his wife was probably Ruth, and he was doubtless married after arriving in this country. He died between Dec. 25, 1688, the date of his will, and March 6, 1689, the date of the inventory of his estate. The commencement of this will is quaint, and worthy a place in this history. “I, Richard Porter, of Weymouth, in New England, being apprehensive of my near approaching departure out of this world, and being through the mercy of God of a short memory and disposing mind; trusting in the mercy of God through ye Lord Jesus Christ for eternal life: Do make this my last will & testament.” The line from Richard to Robert, of whom we write, is Richard (1), John (2), Samuel (3), Samuel (4), Joseph (5), Robert (6), Robert (7), Robert (8). John Porter (2) is mentioned in the Porter genealogy as one of the most enterprising men of his time. He had many land grants, and was a large purchaser of lands in ancient Bridgewater. In 1693 he built the first saw-mill in what is now South Abington, at “Little Comfort,” and was a useful, honored citizen, holding all the various town offices at different times. Joseph (3), born June 10, 1730, lived in Bridgewater and Stoughton, moving from Bridgewater to Stoughton in 1777. He and his wife were admitted to the North Bridgewater Church, of which his uncle, John Porter, was the minister in 1780. He was a lieutenant in the militia in the time of the Revolutionary war. Robert Porter (6), son of Joseph and Elizabeth (Burrill) Porter, born in Bridgewater, March 30, 1762, was a farmer, and resided in Stoughton; married Elizabeth Gay, June 5, 1794; he had several children, among them Robert (7). Mr. Porter was an active, energetic man, was captain of militia, and served his day and generation well. He died Aug. 18, 1835. We come now to Robert, father of the present Robert Porter. He was born in Stoughton, Dec. 19, 1798; married first, Fannie B., daughter of Uriah Capen, of Stoughton, Aug. 20, 1822; second, Eunice Freeman, of Orleans, June 24, 1832; third, Mrs. Caroline P. Ames, of Milton, June 5, 1875. His children numbered thirteen, Robert being the oldest. He died Nov. 9, 1876, aged seventy-eight. He was a farmer and large real-estate owner, and for more than fifty years owned and lived upon the land where the town hall now stands. He laid out and built Porter and Canton Streets as far as the Catholic Church, also School Street from Pearl to same point, thence westerly over his land nearly to Water Street. He also extended Canton Street to the line between him and his son Robert (8), being nearly a mile in the whole, selling the lots to the first builders and dwellers thereon. He was a “road-builder” from his early days, having built the road through Ames’ Pond about 1830, also the road through the old mill-pond at the head of the present Brockton reservoir, in 1838. In the latter he had a partner, Mr. Samuel Capen. His trade was that of stone-masonry, and he used to say that he “had stoned wells enough to measure three miles.” He got out hardwood timber, and inaugurated the wood and lumber business now carried on by his son Robert. He held several town offices, such as collector, constable, etc., was at one time deacon of the Universalist Church, but afterwards connected himself with the Congregationalists.

ROBERT PORTER (8) was born in Stoughton, on the Uriah Capen (his grandfather's) place on Pleasant Street, Dec. 6, 1823, married Mary Holmes Drake, daughter of Luther Drake and Catherine (Pope) Holmes, his wife, Nov. 16, 1848. Mrs. Porter was born in Sandwich. Their children are Mary Emma (1), died young; Mary Emma (2), born Dec. 26, 1850, died Dec. 25, 1877; Theresa Jane, born March 17, 1853; Robert D., born July 29, 1855; Ellis B., born April 28, 1860; and A. St. John Chambré, born Sept. 27, 1867.

Mr. Porter had only the advantages of the common schools, and as he was early put to labor, his opportunities for education were very limited. When four years old, in the summer of 1828, he rode and drove horse to plow, continuing this for his father and others until his next younger brother was old enough to supersede him. When about eight years of age he began to accompany his father on his trips to Boston and drive team, and from that time to the present has been an active laborer in various departments of business. As soon as he was old enough to ride, he was set to ride horse in plowing out corn, and when nine years old "held plow and drove for himself." He remained with his father on the farm and doing stone-mason work until he was twenty-one. He established himself in business in 1845, by purchasing a timber lot in Easton, from which he removed the timber and wood and also made charcoal. He has dealt in wood and timber ever since, about forty years. He did everything that came in his way to make an honest day's work, drove team, stoned cellars, dug wells, laid stone walls, and has always been proficient. Among other things, selling and carting (with some aid in loading) fifty cords merchantable oak and chestnut wood four miles, on twelve and one-half consecutive days, the loads, many of them, being divided between three and four purchasers. This was hauled on an eight-foot wagon, and one load of heavy oak contained nineteen and five-twelfths cord feet, and was so high that sometimes a hind wheel would rise upon the road. This was in 1847 or 1848, and when fifty years of age cut seven cords of pine wood in one day; at another time, one and three-eighths cords in seventy-four minutes, of which witnesses are now living. When thirteen years old he practiced tending windlass for well-digging, and lowered tubs of stone into wells for his father to lay. At one time, when near the bottom, the tub got the start, overbalancing him, as he weighed less than one hundred pounds, throwing him over the windlass. He shrunk from no productive employment, but never strove to make a dollar dishonestly. He purchased the place where he now lives June 15, 1852. This was originally forty-five acres, and to this he has added by purchase until he now has in this place one hundred and two acres, and altogether about three hundred acres. When Mr. Porter purchased this place it was much run down, having scarcely a rod of good fence and a few "tumble-down" walls, and he could only cut three tons of English hay on the entire place. From this unpromising beginning, Mr. Porter, by expenditure of great time and labor, has changed it from a barren waste to a rich, productive farm. It has been said that "he who made two blades of grass grow where only one grew before, was a public benefactor." How much more applicable is this term to Mr. Porter. The farm was almost covered with wood, through which one could scarcely see a house. He cleared off the wood, extirpated the stumps, and laid out a private road across his farm, along which and the public highway he has set out fine shade-trees, being about a mile of distance. He has constructed hundreds of rods of drainage, open, stone, and tile. One drain, a rod in width, is over eighty rods in length. Also stone walls of great beauty and solidity, and developed a charming scene of pastoral beauty from the primitive wilderness by his energy and taste. Mr. Porter is a model farmer, cuts more than sixty tons of fodder, follows no specialty, but engages in all departments of agriculture applicable to this section. He was the first to establish the coal business in Stoughton, which he has carried on for more than a quarter of a century. In this he disposes of from three to four thousand tons per annum. By the stringency of the panic times, in 1877, Mr. Porter was compelled to compromise with his creditors at sixty cents on the dollar. That his honesty and integrity was not impeached by this is evidenced by the fact that, immediately after settlement, his creditors offered to advance him funds to continue his business. In public and private life Mr. Porter takes a high moral and religious stand, and holds the most advanced positions. His political life has had three stages, Free-Soil, Republican, and Prohibition. Having no aspiration for office, he has only accepted that of chairman of selectmen, one term (1854). He has, however, allowed his name to run in connection with senatorial and other offices on Prohibition tickets, merely as the representative of a principle, and enjoyed the satisfaction of running ahead of his ticket. He is an industrious, hard-working citizen, and enjoys the esteem of the community.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

HOLBROOK.

BY A. E. SPROUL.

ELSEWHERE in this volume Holbrook is alluded to as the daughter of Randolph. Technically, this is correct enough; practically, however, the distinction between the West and East villages of the present town—now respectively the towns of Randolph and Holbrook—was as marked for many years previous to the division as it has ever been since. The centres of the two villages were nearly two miles apart, and although there was a well-built highway extending almost in a straight line between them, the communities did not grow together, and to this day the street alluded to is but scantily settled for the greater part of its length.

General History.—The division of the town of Randolph, by a line running in the vicinity of the Cochato River, had been a topic of conversation, especially in East Randolph, for many years previous to the autumn of 1871, when the first really decisive steps were taken. In January, 1867, two meetings to consider the subject were held, at which it was evident that a majority of the citizens of East Randolph were in favor of the formation of a new town east of the Old Colony Railroad line; but there was not the harmony and unanimity which seemed desirable, and the matter was dropped. Early in the autumn of 1871, however, it seemed to some that the time for a successful effort in that direction had come, and preliminary work was begun, culminating in a citizens' meeting held on the evening of Tuesday, December 5th. This meeting was largely attended, and great enthusiasm prevailed. It was called to order by Mr. William Gray, and organized by the choice of Mr. L. S. Whitcomb as chairman, and Mr. E. Frank Lincoln, secretary. The following resolve, offered by Mr. Frank W. Lewis, was, after a full discussion by several of the most prominent citizens, accepted and adopted by a rising vote, only one negative vote being recorded:

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this meeting that it is expedient that the portion of Randolph lying east of the Old Colony and Newport Railroad be set off from the main town and incorporated as a new town."

Executive and other committees were chosen and set to work. On the following day (December 6th) a formal petition was signed by Mr. E. N. Holbrook and thirteen others and recorded in the office of the Secretary of State, and on the 8th it was served upon the town of Randolph by a deputy-sheriff. A second citizens' meeting, held on Saturday evening, December 9th, was made noteworthy by reason of the proposal by Mr. E. N. Holbrook, there advanced, to give to the new town, in the event of its incorporation, the sum of fifty thousand dollars—of which twenty-five thousand dollars were to be expended for a town hall and library building, ten thousand dollars for a public library, and the remaining fifteen thousand dollars for the payment of the town debt, or some kindred object. The idea which still remains current to a considerable extent, more particularly outside the borders of the present town, that Mr. Holbrook made his munificent gift conditional upon the proposed town being named for him, deserves emphatic contradiction at the hands of the present writer, based upon the most reliable contemporary testimony. At the meeting where the generous proposal was made, the citizens assembled at once brought forward the name "Holbrook" for the new town, and it received almost unanimous approval by the townspeople. The name was adopted not so much in honor of any one man, as in recognition of a family of old residents, who had become wealthy in the prosecution of legitimate business, and who had always shown themselves enterprising and public-spirited, and alive to the interests of the community with which they were for so many years identified. At the meeting of December 9th, therefore, it was immediately voted that the Legislature be petitioned to name the new town Holbrook, if incorporated, and three cheers were given for the name, and three more and a vote of thanks for Mr. Holbrook. Petitions and subscription papers were actively circulated, frequent meetings of the executive committee were held, and the Hon. E. W. Morton, of Boston, was engaged to act as counsel for the advocates of division. About Jan. 8, 1872, the first petition was presented to the Senate by Senator Carpenter, of Foxboro'. Up to this time the project had been regarded by the citizens of West Randolph as visionary; but they now saw that it must be met in a serious spirit. On January 18th a town-meeting was held in Stetson Hall, West Randolph, "to take action on the petition of E. N. Holbrook and others," at which it was voted to appoint a committee to oppose the division of the town, and to instruct the representative to the Legislature, Mr. Ludovicus F. Wild, of East Randolph, to carry out the expressed wish of the town, or resign. All this was done in the face of the vigorous opposition of the citizens of East Randolph, but they were outvoted, as often before. The hearings before the legislative Committee on Towns were begun on January 24th, Mr. Morton, as previously stated, appearing for the petitioners, and the Hon. B. W. Harris (now of East Bridgewater) for the remonstrants. Before their close an event occurred which filled the hearts of the people of East Randolph with profound sadness. This was the sudden death, on Feb. 5, 1872, of Mr. Elisha Niles Holbrook, the benefactor of the future town. Though a digression from the subject immediately in hand, perhaps no more appropriate place than the present may be found in which to allude to Mr. Holbrook's career.

He was born in East Randolph, Oct. 31, 1800, and was the second son and fifth child of Deacon Elisha and Anna Holbrook, of Randolph. His opportunities for an early education were not limited, judged by the standard in vogue at the period of his birth. For some time he was a pupil of the Rev. Dr. Strong, his first pastor, who, besides the labors of the pulpit and the parish, conducted the studies of many of his youthful parishioners, and fitted numerous young men for college. He was also a pupil in an academy elsewhere. At the age of twenty he entered upon a business career, as a partner in a boot and shoe manufacturing firm, with a capital of one thousand dollars, and with the world before him. He soon left the firm and conducted business alone, and in his own way. This he did in one form or another for more than fifty years, to the last four days of his life. With scarcely an exception, every day's toil in that life of fifty years was a success. He gave ten thousand dollars toward the Winthrop church edifice (the original building), from whose Sabbath services he was absent but one day during the last fifteen years of his life. For defraying the current expenses of the society he paid annually from one thousand to thirteen hundred dollars, and during the fifteen years immediately preceding his death he gave away the sum of eighty-five thousand dollars. He intimated a wish to do more, and named the objects on which he expressed a willingness to bestow his benefactions. Had his life been longer spared, or the premonitions of its sudden close been earlier given, unquestionably more would have been done in the execution of purposes which he cherished. His generous gift of fifty thousand dollars to the new town has been already alluded to. The Rev. Ezekiel Russell, D.D., in an appreciative sketch of Mr. Holbrook, says of him, "There was no taint of sloth in his composition. Action, industry, enterprise were his life. . . . It is conceded that he never failed to fulfill a promise or redeem a pledge, and that he never resorted to unlawful expedients or doubtful methods for the purpose of adding to his wealth. On the contrary, his career was ever one of stainless rectitude and honor. . . . Like his honored father, Deacon Elisha Holbrook, he was a liberal supporter of religious institutions. . . . When a friend or a neighbor was known to succeed and prosper, he was pleased, and never withheld the expression of his satisfaction. No bitter sarcasm ever fell from his lips against a neighbor or an acquaintance, or anything that wore the aspect of a calumny or slander. . . . He was courteous, refined in his tastes, modest, unassuming, and never obtrusive in the statement or defense of his opinions. . . . Nature had gifted him with an elegant person, with a pleasing presence, a genial countenance, a black and sparkling eye. . . . He was the faithful, the affectionate husband, the kind, the tender father, the loving grandparent, and the sympathizing brother. . . . He was a firm believer in the Christian Scriptures as the inspired Word of God, and in all the fundamental doctrines of the living oracles. He kept a copy of them in his counting-room and on his centre-table, and few were the days that were allowed to pass without his perusal of them, either at his fireside or at his place of business."

Though the death of Mr. Holbrook came with a sudden shock to his fellow-townsmen, it was no time for faltering in the prosecution of the work in hand, and the efforts of the advocates of a division of the town were in no respect suffered to abate. On February 8th the Committee on Towns reported in the Senate a bill for the incorporation of the town of Holbrook, two of the House members of the committee alone dissenting. On the following day the bill passed to its second reading, and on the 13th it passed the Senate by a vote of twenty-five to ten. But the decisive battle was to be fought in the House; and from that time until the bill reached its debatable stage, on February 19th, both petitioners and remonstrants were unremitting in their efforts to secure legislative supporters. On the last-mentioned date a debate of six or seven hours, lasting through that day and the next, resulted in a vote of one hundred and thirteen to ninety-one for the bill. Another contest was waged upon the engrossment of the bill, but an engrossment was ordered on February 24th by eighty-six to seventy-one. Then the sturdy remonstrants attempted to secure a reconsideration, but in this endeavor they were unsuccessful, and after passing the several remaining stages the bill received the Governor's signature on February 29th, and the town of Holbrook became an accomplished fact. Following is a copy of the more important portions of the act of incorporation:

"Be it enacted, etc., as follows:

"SECT. 1. All the territory now within the town of Randolph, in the county of Norfolk, comprised within the following limits, that is to say: beginning at the stone monument in the line between said Randolph and the town of Braintree, on the easterly side of Tumbling Brook; thence taking a southwesterly course, in a straight line to a point six feet westerly from the northwesterly corner in range of the northerly side of the so-called East Randolph station-house of the Old Colony and Newport Railroad Company; thence the same or other southwesterly course to a point on the town line dividing Randolph and Stoughton, one hundred and fourteen rods southeasterly from the town stone monument in said last-mentioned dividing line, at the southerly terminus of Main Street in said Randolph; thence southeasterly, northeasterly, northerly, and westerly as the present dividing line between said Randolph and Stoughton, North Bridgewater, Abington, Weymouth, and Braintree runs, to the first-mentioned bound, is hereby incorporated into a town by the name of Holbrook; and said town of Holbrook is hereby invested with all the powers, privileges, rights, and immunities, and is subject to all the duties and requisitions to which other towns are entitled and subjected by the Constitution and laws of this Commonwealth.

"SECT. 2. The inhabitants of said town of Holbrook shall be holden to pay all arrears of taxes which have been legally assessed upon them by the town of Randolph, and all taxes heretofore assessed and not collected shall be collected and paid to the treasurer of the town of Randolph in the same manner as if this act had not been passed; and also their proportion of all county and State taxes that may be assessed upon them previously to the taking of the next State valuation, said proportion to be ascertained and determined by the last valuation in the said Randolph.

"SECT. 3. Said towns of Randolph and Holbrook shall be respectively liable for the support of all persons who now do or shall hereafter stand in need of relief as paupers, whose settlement was gained by or derived from a settlement gained or derived within their respective limits; and the town of Holbrook shall also pay annually to the town of Randolph one-third part of all costs of the support or relief of those persons who now do or shall hereafter stand in need of relief or support as paupers, and have gained a settlement in said town of Randolph in consequence of the military services of themselves or those through whom they derive their settlement.

"SECT. 4. The corporate property belonging to the town of Randolph at the date of this act, and the public debt of the said town existing at said date, shall be divided between the towns of Randolph and Holbrook according to the valuation of the property within their respective limits as assessed May first, in the year eighteen hundred and seventy-one; and said town of Holbrook shall receive from said town of Randolph a proportionate part of whatever amount may hereafter be refunded to said town of Randolph from the State or United States to reimburse said town of Randolph for bounties to soldiers, or State aid paid to soldiers' families after deducting all reasonable expenses; and said town of Holbrook shall bear the expense of making the survey and establishing the line between said towns of Randolph and Holbrook."

[Sections 5, 6, and 7 have no present interest.]

The first town-meeting in Holbrook was held March 11, 1872, "in the East Parish meeting-house." It was called to order by the Hon. Zenas French, and after prayer by the Rev. Ezekiel Russell, D.D., Mr. Lemuel Whitcomb was elected moderator, and the meeting proceeded to the election of town officers. At another meeting, held March 21st of the same year, various appropriations for town purposes were made, by-laws adopted, etc.

One of the earliest business transactions to demand attention from the officers of the new town was the division of town property. For this purpose the selectmen of both Randolph and Holbrook were appointed committees with full powers by their respective towns; and according to a document dated "Randolph, March 19, 1873," and signed by both boards, it was agreed and certified "that there has been paid by the town of Holbrook to the town of Randolph the balance of indebtedness as within stated, amounting to $14,988.94, and interest on the same from Feb. 1 to March 1, 1873, of $74.94, making $15,063.88," etc. In 1873 a town hall was built only a few feet south of the Winthrop Church, on Franklin Street, at an expense of about $35,000. It was of wood, two stories high, with French roof and brick basement, and was ninety by forty-eight feet in dimensions. The public library occupied rooms on the first floor. Early on Christmas morning, 1877, fire broke out in the town hall building, and both it and the church were wholly consumed. After the fire the citizens held their town-meetings in Library Hall, in the rear of the burned structure; but early in 1879 a new brick town hall, with stone trimmings, was completed on the site of the former one, and was dedicated on the evening of March 26th of that year.

The building is in plan a parallelogram, measuring fifty-three by one hundred feet, with projections forty-four feet wide on front and rear, flanked at the corners on the front with projections thirteen feet wide. It contains four stories—basement, street floor, public hall, and roof story. The former contains the steam and gas apparatus. The street story is thirteen feet in height, containing two stores, apartments for town officers, and commodious quarters for the public library. The main hall, on the second story, is ninety by fifty feet and twenty-five feet in height, and with its paneled walls and ceilings, long arched windows, and tasteful frescoing forms one of the most striking interiors of the kind in the State. It will seat, including the gallery at the northerly end, nine hundred persons. There is a large stage, with commodious dressing-rooms adjacent. A stone tablet set [in the front of the edifice bears this inscription:

"Holbrook
Town Hall.
Erected
1878.
The Gift of
E. N. Holbrook."

The total cost, including furniture, fixtures, etc., was nearly twenty-eight thousand five hundred dollars. On the left of the stage, in the hall, is a finely executed portrait of the late donor of the building; and in a corresponding position on the right of the platform is a marble slab inscribed as follows:

"Holbrook Town Hall.

Erected 1873.

Destroyed by Fire

Dec. 25, 1877.

Rebuilt, 1878."

The dedicatory exercises consisted of prayer by Rev. Z. T. Sullivan, of Brockton; song by the Mozart Quartette (male); address by Prof. J. B. Sewall, principal of Thayer Academy, South Braintree; presentation of the keys of the building by Mr. J. T. Southworth, chairman of the building committee, to Mr. Henry Newcomb, chairman of the board of selectmen, who responded appropriately; song by the quartette; remarks by Hon. Seth Turner, of Randolph; reading of letters, and brief speeches by invited guests from neighboring towns. Dancing closed the festivities of the occasion.

In view of prevalent incendiarism, the following significant vote was passed at a special town-meeting held Nov. 5, 1881:

"Voted, That the selectmen offer $500 reward each for the arrest and conviction of the party or parties who set fire to the barn of S. L. White, house of the late Ebenezer Alden, barn of James Holbrook, barn of Mrs. Prudence D. Holbrook, and $1500 for the arrest and conviction of the party or parties who set fire to the house of the late C. S. Holbrook; and in no case shall a double reward be paid for the arrest and conviction of any one party."

Ecclesiastical History.—Up to the year 1818 the residents of both the East and West villages of Randolph worshiped in the First Church, which was located in the latter village, and formed one society. In this year, however, the question of repairing the old house or building a new one was raised. The church edifice was then fifty-four years old, it being the second building erected by the society. It having been voted to build rather than repair, most of the residents living east of the Cochato River petitioned to the General Court to be set off as a separate parish. This movement on the part of the citizens of East Randolph excited an opposition which was fully on a par with that created by the proposition to divide the town, made more than half a century later. The petition was granted, however, and the "Second Church in Randolph" was organized Dec. 15, 1818. [It may here be remarked that the action of the Legislature in dividing the parish put a quietus for several years upon the project of rebuilding the edifice occupied by the First Church in West Randolph, and it was not until Nov. 2, 1825, that the third meeting-house of that parish was dedicated.]

The original members of the Second Church were as follows:

Deacon William Linfield.	Hannah Linfield.
Deacon Elisha Holbrook.	Cassandana White.
Bailey White.	Rachel Wild.
Joseph Holbrook.	Sarah Belcher.
Jacob Whitecomb, Jr.	Lydia Whitecomb.
Samuel Whitecomb.	Phebe Whitecomb.

A meeting-house for the Second Church was built immediately after the organization of the parish, and the first pastor, the Rev. David Brigham, was ordained Dec. 29, 1819. He was dismissed Nov. 22, 1836, and was succeeded by the Rev. Dennis Powers, on Dec. 5, 1838. The latter clergyman remained only until April 15, 1841, his successor being the Rev. William A. Peabody, who was settled March 2, 1843, and was dismissed Oct. 2, 1849. The Rev. Ezekiel Russell, D.D., became pastor on May 8, 1850. Six years later dissensions arose in the church, and a division of the society occurred, resulting in the organization, on Dec. 30, 1856, of the Winthrop Church, named in honor of Governor John Winthrop of colonial fame. The circumstances immediately attending the formation of this society were these: Deacon Elisha Holbrook and fifty-eight others—members of the Second Congregational Church in Randolph—presented a request to the church, at its stated and regular meeting, Dec. 5, 1856, for letters of dismission and recommendation to such ecclesiastical council of sister churches as might be called for the purpose of organizing them into a separate and independent church of Christ. The petition submitted was as follows:

"To the Second Congregational Church in Randolph:

"The undersigned, members of said Second Church, having become unalterably convinced, by a train of circumstances now of long continuance and known to all, that our peace and harmony as members of the church of Christ require an entire change of our relations, and a new organization into a distinct and separate church, do, therefore, request letters of dismission and recommendation from the said Second Church in Randolph, to such ecclesiastical council from sister churches as may be called to act on their request.

"EAST RANDOLPH, Nov. 28, 1856."

It having been moved and seconded that the above request be granted, the motion was carried by a majority of ten votes. There were five negative votes cast, and five persons did not vote. Letters of dismission and recommendation were immediately placed in the hands of the petitioners, signed in due form by the pastor and clerk of the Second Church in Randolph. The persons who had thus been dismissed met Dec. 18, 1856, in the hall of E. N. Holbrook, Esq., and voted, unanimously, to call a council to act on their request for organization, and adopted, also, a confession of faith and covenant, to be submitted to the council for its approval. The council thus invited to convene assembled in conformity with the invitation, and left behind the following record of its doings:

"RANDOLPH, Dec. 30, 1856.

"Pursuant to Letters Missive from Deacon Elisha Holbrook and sixteen others, holding letters of dismission and recommendation from the Second Congregational Church in Randolph, and from other churches, to such ecclesiastical council of sister churches as may be called for the purpose of organizing them into a distinct and separate church of Christ, an ecclesiastical council assembled this day in the hall of E. N. Holbrook. The following-named churches were present by their pastors and delegates, viz.:

First Church in Braintree, Rev. R. S. Storrs, D.D., pastor; Deacon David Hollis, delegate.

Union Church of Braintree and Weymouth, Rev. J. Perkins, pastor; Deacon J. P. Nash, delegate.

First Church, North Bridgewater, Rev. Paul Couch, pastor; Brother J. Kingman, delegate.

Trinitarian Congregational Church, Bridgewater, Rev. David Brigham, pastor; Deacon G. N. Holmes, delegate.

"The council was organized by the choice of Rev. R. S. Storrs, D.D., as moderator, and Rev. David Brigham, scribe. After prayer to God for divine wisdom and direction in the business before them, in which the council was led by the moderator, a document, properly authenticated, was laid before them, showing that the petitioners referred to in the letters missive had been regularly dismissed and recommended, as therein stated. The moderator here inquired if any persons present had objections against the petitioners being formed, according to their request, into a distinct and separate church of Christ. As no one appeared to offer objections, the council now listened to the confession of faith and covenant adopted by the petitioners, with which they voted entire satisfaction. The petitioners at this point, by request of the council, presented their reasons for withdrawing from the churches with which they had hitherto been connected, and for wishing to be organized into a separate church. After attending to these reasons, the moderator again inquired if any persons present had objections to make, or remarks to offer upon the document now presented to the council by the petitioners. No one appearing to respond, the council voted to be by themselves. It was then moved that the prayer of the petitioners be granted, and that we proceed to organize a distinct and separate church of Christ, under the name of the Winthrop Church of Randolph. This motion, after full and free discussion, was unanimously adopted. Arrangements were then made for the public services of the occasion, as follows:

"1. Sermon, with the Introductory Prayer, Rev. David Brigham.

"2. Reading the Confession of Faith and Covenant, with the Consecrating Prayer, Rev. Jonas Perkins.

"3. Charge to the Church, Rev. Paul Couch.

"4. Right Hand of Fellowship, with Concluding Prayer, Rev. R. S. Storrs, D.D.

"After attending public services as above arranged, council dissolved.

"R. S. STORRS, Moderator.

"DAVID BRIGHAM, Scribe.

"A true copy of the doings and result of council.

"Attest:

"D. BRIGHAM, Scribe."

The whole number of members composing the Winthrop Church on the day of its organization was sixty—males, 17; females, 43. On the evening of the same day a society in the same place was organized in connection with the church, the legal steps for this purpose having been previously taken. The church, January 8th, and society, Jan. 20, 1857, with entire unanimity, extended an invitation to the Rev. E. Russell to become their pastor, he having already sustained to them this relation nearly seven years, in connection with the Second Church in Randolph. To this invitation a favorable response was promptly made, and the clergyman was dismissed from the Second Church on Feb. 3, 1857, and on the same day he was installed over the Winthrop Church, the sermon on that occasion being preached by the Rev. Dr. Storrs.

The church and society met for the first time for public worship in the hall of E. N. Holbrook, Esq., on the first Sabbath in the year 1857. Here all the assemblies for public and social worship were held till the 17th of January, 1858. The new house of worship being then complete, it was dedicated with the usual solemnities on the 20th, and opened for the first time for public worship on the Sabbath, the 24th of January, 1858. It was of the Romanesque style of architecture, eighty-four feet in length by fifty-three in breadth, and with a spire one hundred and forty-seven feet in height. It contained a bell and an organ, and its interior was tastefully frescoed. The cost of the edifice, including the land, was twenty-two thousand dollars, and its bills were all canceled on the day of its dedication. The names of the twenty-three persons who originally contributed to its erection are as follows: Elisha Holbrook, E. N. Holbrook, C. S. Holbrook, Lewis Whitecomb, Elijah Howard, John Holbrook, Calvin French, Erastus Wales, Apollos Wales, Newton White, Edmund White, Simeon Whitcomb, Daniel Faxon, Theophilus Wood, M.D., William W. Linfield, Samuel Baker, Charles French (2d), Zenas French, Stephen Chesman, Nathaniel B. Thayer, David White, Caleb Harris, William E. Linfield.

After the separation of the churches the Second Church had no settled pastor, and relinquished the holding of public services in April, 1864. The church building ultimately became a shoe-factory, for which purpose it is now occupied. Meanwhile, however, the Winthrop society prospered. The Rev. Dr. Russell was dismissed from the pastorate on May 14, 1872, and on Jan. 29, 1874, there was a merging of the old Second society with the Winthrop Church under the name of the Winthrop Congregational Church of Holbrook. Early on Christmas morning, 1877, occurred the disastrous conflagration which destroyed both the new town hall and the Winthrop Church. The edifices stood side by side, and sufficiently near together for the flames, which originated in the town hall building, to communicate to and envelop the church. The latter had been extensively repaired, not long previous to its destruction, at an expense of several thousand dollars.

Immediately after the fire the members and friends of the Winthrop society took the initiatory steps looking to a rebuilding of the edifice. Their efforts were crowned with abundant success, and on the evening of Wednesday, Feb. 25, 1880, a commodious and handsomely finished new church was dedicated in the presence of a large congregation. The invocation was by Rev. J. C. Labaree, of Randolph; reading of the Scriptures by Rev. Z. T. Sullivan, of Brockton; prayer by Rev. P. B. Davis, of Hyde Park; sermon by Rev. L. H. Angier, acting pastor of the Winthrop Church, who took his text from Exodus xiv. 14 and 15; dedicatory prayer by Rev. George W. Blagden, D.D., of Boston. At the conclusion of the ceremonies an opportunity to inspect the new structure was afforded to those in attendance, which was embraced very generally. The total cost of the edifice was $23,327, of which $15,790 was subscribed by citizens, and the church was substantially free from debt when dedicated. The more important subscriptions were: Ladies' Sewing Circle, $1000; George N. Spear, $1000; E. Everett Holbrook, $1000; Edmund White, $750; Sabbath-school, $600; Thomas White, $500; Mrs. E. N. Holbrook, $500; E. Newton Thayer, $500; George T. Wilde, $300; J. T. Southworth, $300; Charles H. Paine, $300; Seth C. Sawyer, $300; Charles V. Spear, $250. One hundred and seventy-four other persons donated from $5 to $200 each. The family of the late C. S. Holbrook gave a piano for the vestry; a bequest of $330 from the late E. N. Holbrook was employed in the purchase of pulpit furniture, etc.; the tower-clock was given by Mrs. Mary W. Holbrook, clocks in the main auditorium and vestry by Mrs. C. V. Spear, and silverware by Mrs. E. Everett Holbrook, who also gave $200 to the Ladies' Sewing Circle.

There was no pastor settled over the church after the discharge of the Rev. Dr. Russell, until May 10, 1881, when the Rev. Herbert A. Loring was settled. During the interim the pulpit was occupied successively by Revs. S. C. Kendall, Albert Bryant, H. C. Crane, George W. Blagden, D.D., D. W. Kilbourn, William Adams, L. H. Angier, and George C. Gordon. The Rev. Mr. Loring was dismissed Nov. 23, 1882, and on June 19, 1883, the Rev. Oliver S. Dean, the present pastor, was settled.

Methodist Episcopal Church.¹—An informal meeting of a few persons interested in the formation of a Methodist class was held Friday evening, July 26, 1878, when it was decided to organize a weekly class, which should meet for the first time the next Wednesday evening, July 31st, at the residence of Mr. Jos. W. Thayer. On that evening, July 31, 1878, the first class-meeting was held, twelve persons being present. The Rev. Joshua Monroe, of West Abington, acted as leader. On the following Wednesday evening the class met at the residence of Lewis Alden, who was chosen as the regular class-leader.

Three months afterwards it was thought wise to hold a prayer-meeting on one evening of the week. Such a meeting was held for the first time at Joseph W. Thayer's residence, with an attendance of about twenty-five. These prayer-meetings, held regularly on Monday evenings during the autumn and winter, had an increasing attendance, until on one occasion seventy-two were present. More than half of these, however, were from the Winthrop Congregational Church, and others still were from out of town—South Braintree, West Abington, Brockton, etc. Thus these meetings from house to house were kept up under the lead of a few persons of the Methodist persuasion and preference, until a strong desire was felt that, in order to make the movement already begun a more permanent one, there ought to be a formal organization of a society under the discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The preliminary steps having been taken, and the necessary arrangements made, on Tuesday, Feb. 11, 1879, Rev. D. A. Whedon, D.D., presiding elder of the Providence District,

Providence (now N. E. Southern) Conference, visited the town and formally organized the Holbrook Methodist Episcopal Church, with seven members and two probationers. Truly a very small beginning! These original members were Lewis Alden, Mrs. Hattie S. Alden, Elmer F. Reynolds, Mrs. Georgiana Reynolds, Mrs. Emma O. Thayer, Mrs. Nancy A. Nickerson, and Edward Brewer. Probationers: Mrs. Abbie C. Hollis and Sarah W. Bates.

A desire for preaching services on the Lord's day soon prevailed, and on April 27, 1879, under the direction of the presiding elder, Rev. C. M. Comstock came to Holbrook and preached to the first congregation ever assembled in the town under the auspices of a Methodist Episcopal Church. Library Hall had been engaged, and the services were held therein. Eighty were present at this first preaching service. The Rev. B. L. Duckwall preached May 4th and 11th, after whom the Rev. D. C. Stevenson acted as preacher and pastor from May 18th to August 2d. In this brief time he made many friends in Holbrook, who were sadly pained, the past year, at the news of his death in the South. The pulpit was supplied August 9th and 16th by the Rev. A. M. Osgood, and the 23d and 30th by the Rev. W. C. Helt. Next came the pastorate of the Rev. Nelson Edwards, for six months—September 7th to March 7, 1880. During this time an attempt was made toward building a church. The Rev. Mr. Edwards succeeded in getting about six hundred dollars pledged, and sufficient collected to buy a lot for four hundred and fifty dollars, located on Plymouth Street, also to pay for the laying of a trench-work foundation for a church, thirty-one by forty. Here the work stopped. The first regularly-appointed preacher sent by the bishop was the Rev. E. M. Dunham, April 13, 1880. On the Saturday night on which he arrived in town, April 17, 1880, Library Hall was burned. Severe illness of his wife compelled him to resign his work in September, 1880, and the Rev. W. C. Endly was sent to fill out the remainder of the Conference year. The Rev. F. J. Ward was sent as the supply in 1881, and remained until ill health compelled him to resign in August ensuing. The Rev. Howard E. Cook, of Boston University School of Theology, succeeded to the vacancy. Unit-ing with the N. E. Southern Conference as a probationer in April, 1882, he was sent by the bishop as the second regularly-appointed pastor of the Holbrook Methodist Episcopal Church. Again in April, 1883, he was reappointed to a third year's pastorate.

The membership of the church has been increased as follows: The Rev. Mr. Edwards received two "by letter," the Rev. Mr. Dunham one "from probation," the Rev. Mr. Ward one "by letter" and one "from probation," and the Rev. Mr. Cook twenty-six "from probation" and nine "by letter." Thus the total number received is forty-seven. One, Otis Thayer, aged eighty-seven, is deceased; two have removed to Hopkinton without letter, one has been dismissed by letter to the South Braintree Methodist Episcopal Church, and one has been excluded for flagrant neglect of the means of grace. The present nominal membership is therefore forty-five. There are, besides, ten members on probation. Other Christians not formally united with the church are regularly associated with these in the religious work.

After Library Hall was burned, preaching services and other services on the Lord's day were held in the committee-room in the town hall building. Week-day services were continued from house to house. The loss by fire was considerable for this young, weak, and struggling church. There was no insurance. All was lost except the contribution-boxes and hymnals, which were found among the ruins, and such Sabbath-school books as were in the hands of scholars. A few weeks after the present pastorate began, the pastor initiated a movement towards building a church. He called a meeting of the stewards and trustees, and moved that the board of stewards and trustees serve as a building committee. This was carried, and the committee consisted of Lewis Alden, Wm. B. Crocker, and Edward Brewer. The preparations for building were then at once begun, and a subscription-book was started by the pastor, who also drew up some plans and specifications for a church, which were accepted by the committee, who gave him authority to solicit and receive bids thereon. This done, the carpenter's contract was given to Edward Brewer at two thousand two hundred and seventy-five dollars. An additional cost was incurred by putting in Scotch cathedral glass, and other extras, amounting to about one hundred and twenty-five dollars.

The church is thirty-one by fifty feet, with front projection six by twenty-three feet, and rear projection six by twelve feet, with a rear covered entrance and stairway to the pulpit recess. Six weeks after the building committee was chosen the lumber was hauled on to the church-lot, and in about three months the house was ready for dedication. The dedicatory services occurred Feb. 8, 1882. About fifteen hundred dollars was pledged in a day to remove all debt. The interior of the church is divided up as follows: main audience-room thirty-one by forty feet with pulpit recess six by twelve feet; lecture-room fifteen by twenty feet connected with former by ground-glass windows; hallway eight by fifteen feet; library-room four by six feet; ladies' kitchen over lecture-room and hall, and connected with lower floor by stairway and dumb-waiter; seating capacity of whole church three hundred and fifty. Some improvements since the dedication have consisted of grading in front and also the concreting of walks, improving the library-room, and elevating and railing off a section for the choir. The whole church property is valued at about four thousand dollars. The parsonage property at present is about two hundred dollars. The Sunday-school was organized the third Sunday on which meetings were held, in Library Hall (May 11, 1879), with a membership or attendance of fifty-two. The present membership is one hundred and thirty, and the superintendent is Lewis Alden. There have been two special revival seasons during the present pastorate, in which nearly one hundred persons have taken a public stand for Christ. Many of these have been soundly converted, and are now in the church. Some were transient residents and gone from town. Some were members of the Winthrop Sabbath-school, while others are turned back into the world.

The above facts show a marked and rapid progress for the Holbrook Methodist Episcopal Church, especially during the present pastorate. Death has not broken into its ranks, and there have been steady accessions. In four years this church has acquired a property worth nearly forty-five hundred dollars, has become a regular appointment in the N. E. Southern Conference, and pays a salary of seven hundred and fifty dollars per annum. The parsonage tenement, of six rooms, is convenient, pleasant, and comfortable.

The church is doing a good and needed work, and its past success is felt to be the harbinger of far greater growth and power for good.

The officers of the church are as follows: Stewards, Lewis Alden (recording secretary), Wm. B. Crocker, Samuel C. Curtis, Alexander H. McGaw, Josiah W. Chamberlain, Chas. B. Boynton, Winslow P. Wilbur, Chas. C. Webster, and Franklin Z. Phillips; Trustees, Lewis Alden, Wm. B. Crocker, John I. Glover, Samuel C. Curtis, Franklin Z. Phillips, and Chas. C. Webster; Class-Leaders, Lewis Alden and Wm. B. Crocker.

On the first Sabbath of July, 1861, a few members of the Winthrop Congregational Sabbath-school organized a mission school in the engine-hall in South Randolph, which continued under their care until the spring of 1868. During the winter of 1867-68 a revival was commenced by the Methodist brethren of North Bridgewater (now Brockton). As a result of the work the people wished a church organization, and in May the choice was made in favor of a Baptist society. On May 30th the church was constituted under the labors of the Rev. Benjamin I. Lane, with four members, viz., Paul Hollis, A. L. Russell, Emily F. Russell, and Sarah E. Belcher, and the Sabbath-school was given formally to the church. At the close of the year the membership was twenty-nine. The church was recognized by a council of Baptist Churches convened at South Randolph in a pine grove, on land of Mr. Thomas West, Sept. 14, 1868. On Dec. 10, 1870, the ground was broken for a church edifice by Samuel Ludden (age eighty-two) and Daniel Faxon, Jr., son of the donor of the land, Rev. J. K. Chase, pastor at East Stoughton Baptist Church, officiating.

The meagre records afford but little information for the years from 1870 to 1873, but they note the dedication of the church June 25, 1872, with a sermon by the Rev. William Lamson. The Rev. Mr. Lane continued to supply the pulpit until about November, 1869. After three years of supply by students and laymen, the church called the Rev. Benjamin Wheeler to be pastor, Nov. 1, 1872, who by faithful ministry greatly built up the society, twenty-two being added during his pastorate, which ended with his death, Aug. 25, 1876. Following him came the Rev. Richard M. Nott, who became a stated supply (residing in Wakefield) until his death, in December, 1879. Although but three were added to the church during his ministry, the fruit of his and others' labors was gathered in by his successor, the Rev. Clifton Fletcher, of Melrose, who still continues as a stated supply. Fifteen members were added during October and November, 1883. During the years 1882 and 1883 a debt of one thousand dollars was canceled and improvements made in the church, including furnaces, at an expense of nearly three hundred dollars.

Business.—Holbrook is emphatically a "shoe town." How completely this business overshadows all others is shown by the fact that in the census of 1880, out of a total value of manufactured products of two million thirteen thousand seven hundred dollars, all but six thousand dollars was in boots and shoes. The business dates back to the beginning of the century. Ephraim Lincoln was one of the pioneers, and others of the early manufacturers bore the characteristic names, known and honored in the town to-day, of Paine, Blanchard, Holbrook, White, Whitcomb, Faxon, etc. The sires laid the foundations, and the sons have proved themselves worthy successors. Today three of the largest firms do ninety per cent. of the entire business.

The house of Thomas White & Co. was founded in 1839 by the senior member of the present firm, Mr. Thomas White. In 1865, Mr. Edmund White, brother of Thomas, formed a partnership, under the style of T. & E. White, which continued until 1870, when the firm dissolved, Mr. Edmund White retiring, and a new partnership was formed consisting of Thomas White, T. Edgar and Henry M. White (his sons), which was known under the firm-name of Thomas White & Co. In 1873, Mr. M. Walker was admitted as a partner, but no change was made in the firm-name. The firm manufactures men's and women's kip, calf, buff, and split boots and shoes, and occupies a four-story building one hundred by thirty-six feet, with an L seventy by seventy-five feet. The factory is supplied with the latest improved machinery, and at all times presents a busy scene, as there are some four hundred and fifty people engaged in various ways. The sales for the last six years averaged six hundred thousand dollars per year, the goods going all over the United States. The firm also has a large manufactory at Great Falls, N. H., where, in a three-story building one hundred and seventy-five by thirty feet, employment is given to about one hundred and seventy-five hands. The business transactions of that establishment amount to about three hundred thousand dollars per year.

The boot and shoe business of Mr. Edmund White was established by him in 1848. The building occupied as a factory is one hundred and thirty by twenty-five feet, and three stories in height, with two wings, measuring one hundred and forty by thirty and one hundred and forty by thirty-five feet. About four hundred and fifty hands are employed, who manufacture on an average two thousand five hundred pairs per day, which are sold throughout the New England and Western States. Mr. White, who is sixty years of age, is a native of Holbrook.

Messrs. Whitcomb & Paine, manufacturers of men's and boys' calf boots, pegged and standard screw, occupy two buildings—the main structure being a four-story and basement building, one hundred and seventy by thirty feet, and the other eighty by twenty-five feet, containing three floors. About two hundred and twenty-five hands are employed, who turn out one hundred cases per day. The firm is one of the oldest in the town, having been established in 1861. The members are L. S. Whitcomb and C. H. Paine.

The firm of R. Thayer & Son, manufacturers of leather shoe-strings and dealers in leather remnants, was established about 1845 by Mr. Ezra Thayer. At his death he was succeeded by his son, Royal Thayer, who later admitted his own son, Mr. E. Newton Thayer, to a partnership, thus constituting the present firm. Two buildings are utilized as factories, and from twenty-five to thirty hands are employed. The business is prosperous and increasing under its present intelligent management.

The following statistics of boot and shoe manufacture in the town are taken from the census of 1880:

Number of establishments.....	16

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

E. N. HOLBROOK.

E. N. Holbrook was born in East Randolph (now Holbrook), Mass., Oct. 31, 1800. He was the second son and fifth child of Deacon Elisha and Anna Holbrook. He came of an ancestry distinguished for energy of character, piety, devotion to principle, and zeal in their religious faith, and he united in his own character those traits in a high degree. His opportunities for an education in his youth were fair, and were well improved. Instead, however, of pursuing his studies through a collegiate course he early devoted his attention to business, and at the age of twenty he, in company with others, engaged in the manufacture of boots and shoes. He soon withdrew from the firm, however, and established himself alone in the same line of business. He may be ranked as one of the pioneers in that branch of manufacture for which Massachusetts has since become so famous. From the outset he was successful, and during the long course of his business life it has been remarked of him that he seldom, if ever, failed in any of his undertakings. For a period of nearly half a century he conducted a boot- and shoe-manufactory, always alone, until within a few years of his death he admitted his son, E. Everett Holbrook, as partner.

During the last twenty years of his life his interests outside his manufactory had grown to be so extensive as to demand most of his attention, and much of his time was spent as a dealer in stocks in Boston.

His methods of business were straightforward and direct; scorning subterfuge and finesse, he met all issues squarely as they arose, and by his life's work and its results he furnished indubitable proof of the truth of the old adage, "Honesty is the best policy." He possessed in an eminent degree those qualities that command success, and to his infinite credit, be it said, he applied the results of that success to no selfish end. Not only the town hall, the beautiful Winthrop church edifice, to the erection of which he was so liberal a contributor, not only the public library which he endowed, but even the town itself stands as a monument to his memory, bearing as it does his name in token of the munificent donation of fifty thousand dollars to the new town (in event of its establishment), in order, as he said, "that the people might be permanently benefited and begin their history as a municipality free from debt, and in more propitious circumstances than most of the other debt-incumbered towns of the Commonwealth."

He was one of the prime movers and most active agents in securing the establishment of the new town, but unfortunately he did not live to see his wish fully consummated. His last visit to Boston, only a few days before his death, was to confer with the committee appointed by the Legislature to determine as to the advisability of establishing the new town. The committee reported favorably, the town was set apart, but Mr. Holbrook had ceased his earthly cares and labors.

He died Feb. 5, 1872, in the seventy-second year of his age. Nature had blessed him with a fine physique, a genial, pleasant countenance, and commanding presence. View his character in what light we may, it was such as to command admiration not only as a strong, successful man of business, as a philanthropic citizen, but as a loving, tender husband and father. He married Relief, daughter of Samuel and Relief Linfield. She died March 19, 1883, aged seventy-nine years and seven months. Their children were two daughters and one son,—Relief L. (afterwards the wife of Rev. Charles V. Spear, principal and proprietor of Maplewood Institute, at Pittsfield, Mass.

died April 26, 1883), E. Everett (married Mary J., daughter of Rev. Dr. Ezekiel Russell), and Mary W. The son and last-named daughter are still living.

THOMAS WHITE.

Thomas White was born in East Randolph (now Holbrook), Mass., April 30, 1816. He attended the common schools of his town, and also the Pittsfield (N. H.) Academy, graduating from this institution in 1836. His father was a pioneer in the shoe manufacturing industry, commencing that business in East Randolph in 1810. At that early day very primitive methods were in use, machinery for the purpose was unknown, and the unpretentious little shops where shoes were made by hand were very insignificant affairs compared with the vast establishments where, operated by steam, hundreds of odd-looking machines shape, fashion, and finish the foot-gear of the present generation. At the time of which we speak there were no railroads, and each manufacturer would make up a load of shoes or boots, and with his team proceed to cart them to market to dispose of them, and having done so would return home to repeat the process. During his boyhood, when not attending school, Mr. White worked in the shop with his father, and upon his return from Pittsfield, at the age of twenty, he determined to follow boot and shoemaking as a business. For a few years he worked for others, but in 1839 he commenced business for himself. It was a very small beginning. All that was required in the way of an outfit was a cutting-board, a few patterns, and a knife. Mr. White had, however, youth, strength, energy, ambition and good business capacity, and all of these he put as capital stock into his business. From the beginning he was successful, and so rapidly did his business increase that in 1843 he found it advisable to admit a partner, and Samuel Whitcomb was admitted, the firm being White & Whitcomb. This relation was soon terminated by the death of Mr. Whitcomb. Though still a young man, Mr. White had come to hold a prominent place in the community. He employed quite a number of hands, and his factory became quite a source of revenue to the little village. In the mean time he had also established a general store in the village, having for partners during the eight years he was connected with it Mr. F. H. Keith, now a prosperous merchant of Philadelphia, and Mr. Adolphus Clark, who has since been successful in business in London, England. In October, 1842, he married Miss Harriet E. Keith, of Bridgewater, a sister of Mr. F. H. Keith, his partner in the store. Mr. White was one of the few who successfully met and weathered the great financial storm of 1857-58. During those terrible months there were hundreds of level-headed, far-seeing business men unable, notwithstanding their most heroic endeavors, to breast the tide, but having his business well in hand, and by the exercise of clear foresight and good judgment, Mr. White passed the crisis and met all liabilities dollar for dollar. The war of the Rebellion following soon after, Mr. White, in common with other manufacturers, lost all his Southern trade, which had been quite extensive. Taking advantage of the demands of the occasion, however, he at once began making army boots and shoes, dealing sometimes directly with the government, but more largely with New York merchants. This branch of business was continued until the close of the war caused a cessation of the demand.

In 1866, Mr. White took his brother, Edmund White, into partnership with him, the firm being T. & E. White. Up to about this time it had been the custom of manufacturers to dispose of their goods through commission-houses or selling agents. Believing, however, it would accrue to their benefit to distribute their own products, they opened a wholesale boot and shoe-store on Pearl, near Milk Street, Boston, Thomas superintending the selling of the goods, while Edmund had charge of the manufacturing at East Randolph. Mr. White at once took rank as one of the leading business men of Boston. Under his management the business during the next two years increased so rapidly as to necessitate increased facilities for production, and they purchased the large four-story steam-factory built by Spear, Sprague & Co., and which admirably suited their requirements. The firm had now become one of the largest and most influential houses in the trade.

In 1871, Mr. Edmund White withdrew from the firm, and soon established a large business of his own in the same village. Upon the withdrawal of his brother, Mr. White admitted his two sons, T. Edgar and Henry M. White, as partners, assuming the firm-name of Thomas White & Co. In 1872 the great fire in Boston left their store, like all others situated in what is known as the "burned district," in ashes. Some of their stock was saved, but they experienced heavy losses by the failure of the insurance companies. Although they suffered temporary inconvenience by their inability to secure advantageous quarters, yet their business continued to increase so rapidly that during that year they took another partner, Mr. Marcellus Walker, of Cambridge, who for many years had been their salesman, and who had proven himself an efficient business man. As soon as possible they established themselves at the corner of Pearl and High Streets, near their old quarters, and, in order to keep pace with the demands of their trade, they purchased and fitted for their use the meeting-house situated near their factory. At present their ranks among the largest factories of Eastern Massachusetts, and they turn out weekly from six to nine hundred cases of goods.

In 1880 they still further enlarged their business by securing a factory in Great Falls, N. H., one hundred and seventy-five feet long, three stories in height, and capable of turning out fifteen hundred pairs of shoes per day. In 1883 they secured a large factory in Boston, where they can produce from two to three thousand pairs of boots per day. The productions of this firm rank as standard goods throughout the United States.

Mr. White's business career has been in many respects an exceptional one. But few of those who are referred to to-day as our "self-made men" have passed through so many severe ordeals, met with so many heavy losses, and yet paid at all times and in full all obligations. While phenomenally successful from a business point of view, Mr. White has always been liberal and public-spirited, and has found time to fill honorably and creditably many positions of public trust. He has held many town offices, and twice represented his district in the State Legislature. In politics he was a Whig in ante-bellum days, and since the organization of the Republican party he has always given his support to that party.

Mr. White has done much toward making Holbrook the beautiful village it is, and is justly regarded by the citizens of that place as one of their benefactors.

CHAPTER XXXV.

MEDFIELD.

BY W. S. TILDEN.

THIS region of country lying to the southwest of Boston was, when first known to white men, the home of several Indian tribes. Among these were the Naticks, the Neponsets, and to the westward of Norfolk County, the Nipmucks. These tribes were at the beginning of their acquaintance with the English settlers quite friendly to them; indeed, when John Oldham and three others, in 1633, went overland as far as the Connecticut River, he found the same friendly disposition existing among the Indians all along his journey. It was only after the encroachments of the whites upon their domain, and after some wrongs committed by the English, that the temper of the Indians toward them suffered a change. The aboriginal tribes scattered over this part of the country were known under the general designation of "Massachusetts;" and Charles River was at first known to Englishmen as the "Massachusetts River." There is no account extant of any exploration of Charles River Valley during the first decade after the establishment of the Bay colony, though doubtless it was not long before adventurous pioneers became acquainted with the general features of this region.

The territory south and east of Charles River was claimed by the tribe of the Neponsets, whose domain included the river of that name. Their sachem, Chickatabot, was very friendly to the English from the first, forming treaties and agreements with both the Plymouth and Bay colonies. About 1632, William Pynchon, of Boston, afterwards of Springfield, purchased of Chickatabot the territory lying between Charles River and Neponset River. The town of Medfield was included in that purchase, together with several other towns of Norfolk County as far south as the Rhode Island line; though the southern boundaries of that purchase were very indefinite, and misunderstanding arose between the settlers and the Indians many years afterwards. It is doubtful if the limits were very clearly defined at the time of purchase, as, in 1635, the colonial government called for any persons who were present at the time of the purchase, or who knew where the boundaries were, to come forward and testify. There was no response, great numbers of the Indians having been swept off by the smallpox in 1633, among them the sachem, Chickatabot.

Dedham was incorporated in 1636, and included "all the lands on the easterly and southerly side of Charles River not formerly granted to any Towne or particular person." Roxbury had been already set off from the Pynchon purchase, and Dedham, when it was founded, appears to have taken in all that was left of it, or the territory of nine or ten of the present towns of Norfolk County.

Medfield was a part of Dedham for fifteen years, but this part of the town is seldom mentioned in the early records of Dedham. Special attention seems to have been first drawn to this region on account of the wide expanse of meadows lying along Charles River, and at the mouths of its tributary streams near this place. The name given by the aborigines to the valley of Charles River above Natick, for several miles southward, was "Boggestow," variously spelled, as were most words in the ancient papers and records. From all that we can gather, the name seems to have been more particularly applied to the meadows and uplands lying on the west side of the river, which were not in the Neponset lands, but belonged to the Naticks or Nipmucks, probably the Naticks. But the Dedham people were accustomed to speak of all this west end of their township as Boggestow; sometimes designating it as "lying near Boggestow." In 1642, Dedham granted to one of its citizens a farm of three hundred and fifty acres, "to lie in or about that place called Boggestow, or not far from thence." This farm lay on the east side of the river and was afterwards bought in by the selectmen of Medfield, no settlement having been made upon it.

The meadows in those days being much dryer than at present, and being kept clear of bushes by the annual fires of the Indians, produced great quantities of grass of such quality that it was very highly valued by the early settlers, as it furnished an available supply of fodder for their cattle during the winter seasons. This was probably one of the chief inducements to men to look for a place of settlement in this immediate vicinity.

There were several open plains hereabouts before the land had been cleared by white men, as, indeed, there were in various portions of the Indian country. They are often mentioned by the writers of those days. The forests were quite open, and much grass for pasturage was found in them.

During the fifteen years above mentioned, prior to the incorporation of the town of Medfield, there were no actual settlers upon its territory. In all the earliest records there is not only no reference to any such fact, but everything indicates the contrary, though many persons have supposed that this part of Dedham had been previously overspread by settlers, and these "set off" as is the case now when new towns are formed. We are not to conceive of any buildings erected here in those days, except, perhaps, a cowpen and a rude shelter for the keeper of the herds that found pasturage here during the summer; as we read in very early records of "herd-house plain," which was the level stretch of land lying along the Dedham road a mile east of the present village. It is also spoken of as "the cow-pen."

Settlement.—The first known movement for the formation of a new settlement here was made in 1649. It was started by Dedham men, though they were soon joined in the enterprise by people from other towns. The scheme was to make a new town out of a portion of Dedham and a corresponding portion of land belonging to the colony and lying on the west side of the river, so including the river and the wide meadows on both sides.

A petition was sent to the General Court for a grant of land on the west side, four miles north and south by three miles east and west, which was granted and laid out. This land, which was long called "the old grant," corresponds very nearly to what is now East Medway. After this petition was granted, the town of Dedham set off a portion of its territory lying on Charles River, about four miles north and south and three miles east and west. This grant from Dedham corresponds very nearly (perhaps exactly) with the present extent of the town of Medfield. It is described as being in the "west end of the bounds of Dedham next Boggestow." The men authorized by the town of Dedham to lay it out accomplished their work in the spring of 1650. The orders of the court in regard to the laying out of the land on the west side of the river were also obeyed about the same time by Robert Kayne and Edward Jackson. At the acceptance of their report by the General Court, in May, it is stated that the court, in answer to the request of the inhabitants of Dedham, "doe order that it shalbe called [Meadfield]." The brackets seem to indicate that the name had not then been decided upon, but that it was afterwards inserted. Various conjectures have been offered as to the reason for the selection of the name for the new town. One is that the open field where the village was afterwards built, lying on the way from Dedham to the Boggestow meadows and very near them, was called the "meadow field," and hence "Meadfield." Another is that, as there were open fields in the north and south parts of the town, the plain where the settlement was commenced, lying midway between them, was called the "mid field." The most probable reason is that the towns of Medfield and Dedham in Old England, lying near each other, and many of the early settlers coming from that vicinity, the towns were named by them in honor of their former homes. We know that this was the case with Dedham, and there is little doubt that the name of this town was adopted for a similar reason.

It was decided at a Dedham town-meeting that "in consideration of their town rights in the meadows," the settlers should pay that town the sum of one hundred pounds. This was afterwards reduced to fifty pounds, but it goes to show in what estimation the meadows were held at that time. Nothing is said of the value of the rest of the land that was set off.

A committee was chosen by the inhabitants of the town of Dedham to manage all affairs relating to the "erecting, disposing, and government of the said village" of Medfield. It consisted of Ralph Wheelock, Thomas Wight, Robert Hinsdell, Henry Chickering, John Dwight, Peter Woodward, and Eleazar Lusher. The first three were men foremost in the new settlement; the next three were men who proposed to stay in and act for the town of Dedham; and Eleazar Lusher was clerk of the town and kept the record of proceedings until the new town was fully recognized. Those records, in his characteristic handwriting, are still preserved among the town papers.

The "society for removing to Medfield" was organized by the signing of a curious agreement, probably drawn up by Ralph Wheelock, the "founder of Medfield." This agreement provided, (1) That all persons receiving grants of land from the new town should become subject to all rightful orders of town government; (2) that all questions or differences between them should be settled by reference or arbitration without carrying matters into court; (3) that no person should be allowed to become a townsman but such as were honest, peaceable, and free from scandal and erroneous opinions; (4) that none of the inhabitants for seven years to come should let any piece of land received by grant from the town for the space of a year together, except by consent of the selectmen, unless it be to some member of the society.

How many signed the agreement at this time is unknown. It is certain that some of those whose names are appended signed it years afterwards, at the time they were accepted as townsmen; and some who signed at the beginning never removed to the new settlement.

It was provided that no man's house-lot should exceed twelve or fall short of six acres; its size, between these limits, to be determined by his wealth and the size of his family. Also, that all who received house-lots should be settled at Medfield before the end of May, 1651, and that no person should receive lands but those who intended to become actual settlers. The first highways were established preparatory to rendering the town capable of being suitably laid out in house-lots; but all records of those earliest highways are lost. There was a bridge built across Charles River near the present town farm; a road from it eastward through the town to Dedham. It is impossible now to tell on which side of Mount Nebo the first road ran. From this road, at the centre of the town, a road ran northerly, now North Street, and another south, near what is now Pleasant Street. The meeting-house lot and the cemetery were laid out about the same time, though there is no record extant.

The first thirteen house-lots were laid out June 19, 1650. These were scattered along Main, North, Green, Frairy, South, and Philip Streets. The first thirteen settlers were Ralph Wheelock, John Ellis, Samuel Bullen, Daniel Morse, James Allen, Joseph Clark, Francis Hamant, John Turner, John Frairy, Timothy Dwight, Robert Hinsdale, Thomas Wight, and John Wight. It appears that good timber trees near the village grew only along the brook, and strict orders were made in regard to the use of them, they having been reserved for the use of the town.

Dedham surrendered its jurisdiction to the settlers above named Jan. 11, 1651, and in May of the same year the town was incorporated by act of the General Court, the forty-third in the colony in the order of incorporation. During these months accessions to their number were being made and new house-lots granted on North, South, and Bridge Streets.

The first minister of Medfield was Rev. John Wilson, Jr., who commenced his pastorate in December, 1651. He built his house where the town hall now stands. Public worship was conducted at the houses of the settlers for the first two or three years.

The first family to remove to their Medfield home was that of Samuel Bullen, whose house stood near Philip Street. The first mill was built by George Barber in 1652. It stood on Mill Brook, a little way below where it is crossed by Elm Street. It was sold the same year to Henry Adams, and a few years afterwards superseded by a mill above the bridge on Elm Street, which was burned by the Indians and never rebuilt.

The first meeting-house was commenced about 1653. It was a small, plain building, with a thatched roof, and stood where the Unitarian house of worship now stands. It was not completed and furnished till 1656.

The meadows were laid out in grants to the owners of house-lots in 1652, and the following year the lands easily accessible to cultivation were also divided, according to the rules of division,—that is, by persons and estates, each member of the household being appraised at ten pounds. The same year the town clerk commenced his records of births, deaths, and marriages, and the town has an unbroken record from that year down to the present.

In 1653 Mr. Wheelock took up a contribution in this town in aid of Harvard College. The same year we have a record of certain men being chosen to burn the woods. The custom of burning over all the waste lands in November of each year, which was derived from the aborigines, was continued for many years by the settlers, in order that the underbrush on the public lands might not prevent the pasturage of cattle upon them.

The principal town business for the years preceding 1660 was granting house-lots to new-comers, the division of wood-lands, laying out roads in various sections of the town and on both sides of the river, adopting orders in regard to fences and bounds, to the yoking and ringing of swine, and providing the town with a "pair of stocks."

A school "for the education of the children" was established in 1655, at the town's expense, and Mr. Wheelock was appointed schoolmaster. In 1657 Medfield contained forty families. It had, also, an "ordinary," or place of public entertainment. The State tax was paid in eighteen and one-half bushels of wheat.

Our territory west of the river was enlarged in 1659 by what was called the "new grant," two miles east and west, and four miles north and south. It is now included in the westerly part of Medway and Holliston. All owners of house-lots shared in this land, it being mostly laid out in large parcels of from fifty to one hundred and fifty acres each. Soon after this date men began to settle on the west side of the river.

The first school-house was built in 1666, eighteen feet long and fourteen feet wide. It evidently stood on the meeting-house common, near what is now the corner of North Street and Janes Avenue.

The first emigration from this town took place about 1670, when the Hinsdales, Plimptons, and Frairys removed to the Connecticut Valley. At about the same date a post-road from Boston to Hartford was established, and a way laid out from Medfield to Mendon; and the business of tanning leather was commenced by Samuel Rockwood, near the present railroad junction in the north part of the town. A tax was levied upon the inhabitants of Medfield, in aid of Harvard College, amounting to £2 4s. 2d.

In 1672, John Awashamog (Indian), of Natick, laid claim to our territory west of Charles River. It was settled by the payment to him of twenty-one pounds. It would seem by this that the region now Medway was originally the possession of the Natick tribe.

Sixty-two persons at Medfield subscribed various sums in money and produce towards the "new brick college." The total amount was £25 1s. In this they were joined by men at "the farms," now Sherborn. In 1675 Medfield had seventy-seven land proprietors.

The Indian War.—The year 1676 is memorable for King Philip's war and the burning of the town. In the hostilities of the previous summer Mendon had been abandoned, leaving Medfield the frontier town in this direction. After the great fight at the Narragansett swamp in December, the Indians formed themselves into small bands for the purpose of falling upon remote and defenseless settlements. On the 10th of February they attacked Lancaster, burned the town, and carried its inhabitants into captivity. On the reception of the news, Mr. Wilson addressed a letter to the Governor and Council containing an urgent and pathetic appeal for aid. He states that Capt. Oakes had just arrived from Lancaster, and reported the Indians apparently bending their course towards this place. In answer to this appeal the Governor sent a hundred or so of soldiers during the week, who were quartered upon the inhabitants in different parts of the town. Signs of the approaching enemy were discovered on the 20th, and a watch was kept through the night. In spite of this precaution, however, the savages stealthily secreted themselves about the houses and in the out-buildings, and when the watch was taken off, at daybreak, they commenced firing houses and barns in every direction. The soldiers, scattered as they were, could do but little against the enemy for a time; but as soon as the people were fairly aroused they fired the cannon as a signal to Dedham, at which the Indians, taking fright, retreated over the bridge across the river, setting the bridge on fire as they went. Across the river, on a hill, in full view of the burning buildings, they had a grand feast. Thirty-two houses, besides barns, two mills, and other buildings were destroyed, about half of the entire number in the settlement. The houses in the centre of the village were saved. Four houses burned were on the west of the river in what is now East Medway. The cattle and horses were generally lost with the barns. The loss of property was estimated at more than two thousand pounds, and it is said that "seventeen or eighteen persons were slain or mortally wounded, besides others dangerously hurt." Our records contain the names of seventeen who lost their lives at this time. Hubbard relates that some were taken alive and carried off captives, but we have no certain knowledge of any who suffered this terrible fate.

Notice of the attack was immediately sent to the Governor, who at once dispatched another company of soldiers hither; but not finding the enemy, they pushed on to Marlborough. It is by no means probable that King Philip was near this place at the time of the attack, notwithstanding all the traditions about his having been seen on his black horse, careering through the town, leaping the fences, etc. Those who lived in those times, and who wrote a full account of the war, tell us that Medfield was destroyed by Monaco, who boasted of the deed at Groton, and at the same time threatened many other places. He was executed at Boston the following September. Mr. Wilson's house was open to care for the wounded soldiers who were obliged to remain here, some of them for three months, with the surgeon to attend them.

The Indians did not appear here again till the last of April, when a fresh force of horse and foot was sent out against them; and on the 6th of May they were finally routed at Boggestow Pond, near Sherborn. They lingered in small force around this vicinity for some time afterwards, and small parties of soldiers went out to hunt Indians during the summer. But after Philip's death, in August, they were seen no more, though alarms were given for several years afterwards, which caused the people here great uneasiness, but no disasters followed beyond the burning of a mill at Rockville.

The General Court granted some little relief to the sufferers by this calamity, chiefly in the way of remitting taxes. It was several years before the town recovered from the stroke; but most of the houses were finally rebuilt on the original sites. One of the mills destroyed was that of Henry Adams, before referred to, and the other was a mill on Boggestow Brook, now in Medway.

In 1680, the first resident physician of whom we have any record, Dr. Return Johnson, built his house on North Street. He practiced medicine here upwards of twenty years.

In 1685, Josias, grandson of Chickatabot, asserted a claim to the land embraced within the limits of Medfield; the town settled with him by the payment of four pounds ten shillings. The land had been already paid for by Mr. Pyncheon, but as no deed could be found the matter was compromised.

Mr. Wilson, the first minister of Medfield, died in 1691, and it was not till six years afterwards that his successor, Rev. Joseph Baxter, was settled. At that date, 1697, the membership of the Parish Church was sixty-five; twenty-five men and forty women. A few of the members lived in that part of Dedham which is now called Walpole.

The Black Swamp lands were laid out in 1702, to the "proprietors," of whom there were now one hundred and twenty-three. Of these at least twenty-seven lived west of the river.

The first meeting-house had become somewhat dilapidated, and it was now insufficient for the accommodation of the people; it was removed in 1706, and replaced by a new one on the same spot, which stood eighty-three years. There is no definite description of that house. We know that in it the men were required to sit on one side, and the women on the other.

Division of the Town.—The subject of dividing the town began to be seriously agitated in 1712. Indeed, at the time the new meeting-house was built, those living west of the river were promised a refunding of half the amount paid by them in case a meeting-house should be built in that part of the town within twenty years. In 1713, the west side people sent a petition to the General Court; a committee was chosen to visit the place and report, which they did, and they reported in favor of a division of the town. It was divided by an act of the Legislature, passed October 25th. Since that date, Charles River has been the western boundary of Medfield. Those set off at this time to form the town of Medway constituted about one-third of the householders, and they possessed about the same proportion of the wealth.

Until 1720, but one school had been kept in town, and that at the Centre. At this time it was ordered that a school be kept a part of the time in the north and a part of the time in the south part of the town.

In these days, when there was no artificial heat in the meeting-houses, and those who came from a distance remained through to hear the two sermons, it was common for neighbors to join together and build what was called a "noon-house" near the meeting-house, into which they could go between sermons, eat their dinner, and make themselves comfortable. Several of these noon-houses, in old times, stood on the meeting-house common here. That kind of building is described as being some fifteen feet square, opening toward the south, with conveniences for building an open fire at the opposite end.

Medfield sent at least eleven soldiers into the army to fight against the French and Indians in 1722. At this date the town was held to answer for not maintaining a grammar-school according to law. The law required that every town having a hundred householders should maintain a school capable of fitting boys for the college. The selectmen replied that they had but ninety-four families; but the school was established.

The protest of the Medfield meadow owners against the Natick Dam was first made in 1723. The owner of the dam at that time was compelled to remove it on account of its preventing the drainage of the meadows.

A movement for the division of the county of Suffolk was started in 1731. The division did not take place till more than sixty years later.

Mr. Baxter's health declining, the town settled Mr. Jonathan Townsend as his colleague early in 1745; but Mr. Baxter dying in May of the same year, Mr. Townsend became his successor in the old parish pastorate. A portion of the church was dissatisfied with him, and there was much dissension for a long time. Several members withdrew; some united with a Baptist Church in Boston and commenced holding Baptist meetings in Medfield about 1752.

There are no records of the old parish church during the ministry of John Wilson. In 1738 Mr. Baxter commenced a regular book of records for the church, copying into it, evidently from his private papers, the list of members at the beginning of his pastorate, as well as the admissions to the church thereafter. This record was continued by his successors. Mr. Townsend built his house on a lot granted him by the town opposite the meeting-house. The house was that long afterwards made into a straw-shop by Walter Janes.

In early times it is said that shad and alewives ran up Charles River to their breeding grounds. About the middle of the century complaint was made that they were prevented by the obstructions in the river, and this town took action in reference to their removal. Further action was taken in regard to the same subject as late as 1785.

During the French and Indian war this town furnished its quota of men to serve in the army. In the rolls at the office of the Secretary of State are found the names of forty-five men who served a longer or shorter time in that war. In 1756, when the unfortunate Acadians were driven from their homes and dispersed through the colonies, several of them were quartered upon Medfield. Some of them remained here until 1766, when the town made an appropriation "to enable the French neutrals to return to Canada."

Three new school-houses were built in the town about 1760.

The Revolutionary Spirit.—Medfield entered most heartily into the struggle for maintaining the rights of the people against the claims of the crown, and during the Revolutionary period we discover many indications of a spirit that would hardly have been expected of our quiet, steady-going citizens. After the passage of the Stamp Act, in 1765, Seth Clark, the representative, received very pointed instructions. Referring to the loyalty of our people, and their efforts to maintain the dignity of his Majesty's arms, they protest that they have received a most unkind return, and express the hope that the remonstrances that were about to be made would bring redress. At the same time, the representative is instructed that he is by no means to express an acquiescence, or even a willing submission to the acts of Parliament. The instructions close with these words: "Honor the king, but save the country."

It was voted that these instructions be put on file "as a memorial to ages yet unborn of the present generation's high sense of the importance of our natural and charter liberties."

In 1767, resolutions were adopted discountenancing the use of imported articles, especially articles of luxury, and recommending the encouragement of our own manufacturers. In addition, the representative was urged to contribute his part to the "entire abolition of that standing reproach to the nations of Christendom,—the slave trade."

Rev. Mr. Townsend resigned his pastorate in 1769, and was succeeded, two years later, by Rev. Thomas Prentiss as pastor of the old parish church.

The town voted, in 1770, that they "applaud and agree to, and will conform their conduct agreeable to the non-importation agreement entered into by the truly patriotic merchants of Boston, so far as it may relate to themselves." In 1773 voted that "the representative of this town be and hereby is instructed to use his best endeavors in the General Assembly to have the full exercise of our just and invaluable rights and liberties restored, secured, and established on a just and constitutional foundation; also that he use his utmost influence to have a final period put to that most cruel, inhuman, and unchristian practice, the slave trade."

In 1774, the town voted compliance with the agreement and resolves adopted by the Continental Congress which met at Philadelphia in October; also voted that those resolutions be entered on the Medfield records. One hundred and fifty-three Medfield men signed their names as personally complying with and indorsing those resolutions. The list embraces, with scarcely an exception, the entire voting population.

In accordance with one of the resolves, a committee of seven was appointed to observe the conduct of men toward the measures of Congress, and to publish the names of all such as were found hostile to the interests of American liberty.

During the exciting times of 1774–75, town-meetings were held by adjournment from week to week. A committee of five was chosen as a committee of correspondence. One-fourth of the able-bodied men were enrolled as minute-men, and put under drill, to be compensated for their time by the town,—that is, for three half-days a week.

By the rolls at the State-House we learn that at the Lexington alarm, Capt. Sabin Mann and his company of twenty-seven minute-men marched from Medfield, April 19, and were in service twelve days. Besides these, another company of fifty-four officers and men marched at the same time, though their services were not on that occasion retained. In all, eighty-two men from Medfield took the field at the Lexington alarm.

When the Bunker Hill alarm came, Capt. Chenery started for the scene of action; and though he with his men did not arrive in time to take part in that battle, they served in the siege of Boston.

In the instructions voted to the representative in 1776 is the following: "Whereas, the King, Lords, and Commons of Great Britain in Parliament assembled, have declared their right to bind us in all cases whatsoever. We, therefore, if the Congress declare the colonies independent of Great Britain, will support said declaration with our lives and fortunes."

As the struggle of those seven years of war went on, the citizens of this town bore their part with fidelity. They were constantly called upon to furnish men, material, and provisions for the army. From first to last, one hundred and fifty-four men are known to have been in the Revolutionary service, of whom forty-two were in the Continental army.

The first public library in this town was opened in 1786; it was called the "Medfield Social Library," and was owned in shares of four dollars each. It is said to have contained about seven hundred volumes.

The parish meeting-house of 1706 was replaced by a new one, on the same spot, in 1789. The principal part of that building, with many changes, is still standing, and is included in the present Unitarian house of worship.

Until the year 1789, from the settlement of the town, Medfield had sent its own representatives. But in that year Dover and Medfield were united in a representative district, and so continued for forty-seven years. With very few exceptions, however, the representatives chosen during that period were Medfield men.

A very earnest petition was sent in from this town to the General Court asking for the passage of a stringent law for the apprehension of thieves. The reasons given were that after the disbanding of the army the country was overrun with vagrants and thieves, from whom this town had suffered much.

The first national census was taken in 1790, at which time the population of Medfield was seven hundred and thirty-one.

A New County.—The agitation which had commenced more than half a century before, and in which this town had taken much interest, as is shown by the action taken in town-meetings at various times, resulted in the formation of Norfolk County in 1793. It was proposed at one time, it is said, to make Medfield the shire-town; but some of our prudent towns-men objected, on the ground that the practice of visiting the court-room during the trial of cases would be prejudicial to habits of industry in the citizens.

The last effort to levy ministerial taxes upon all the inhabitants, irrespective of religious belief, was made in 1794. Ebenezer Clark was arrested for non-payment and committed to jail. The town authorities discovered soon after that they had been over-hasty in the matter, and went to Boston for the purpose of having him released at once. Mr. Clark, however, brought suit for damages, and the defense cost the town sixty dollars.

The first guide-boards in this town were erected in 1795. They were five in number, and placed at the corners of the principal thoroughfares.

At this period it was customary to tax men for any special skill or faculties they possessed, either professional or mechanical. Twenty-eight men of this town in one year paid a "faculty tax." Doctors had to pay fifteen dollars, then came employers, master mechanics, and various craftsmen, including blacksmiths, who gave evidence of the value of their skill by the payment of five dollars.

About 1798 a weekly meeting for reading and conversation was held. It seemed to be a sort of political lyceum. Certain books on political subjects, approved by the society, were read aloud, questions asked, and conversation had on the topics presented. Other subjects might be introduced after the readings at the discretion of the presiding officer.

At this period, also, there was much interest on the part of our citizens in planting trees by the roadsides. Many of the fine trees by the public highways in various quarters of the town were planted during the succeeding years as a result of this laudable enthusiasm. The streets of our town owe very much of their summer beauty to these early efforts in tree-planting.

The schools had been established in the different parts of the town for many years, but the district system was adopted, and the district lines drawn, in the year 1800. They continued the same till the abolition of the district system sixty-nine years afterwards.

The straw manufacture, which has since grown to immense proportions, and has been for many years the principal manufacturing industry of the town, was commenced in a small way by Johnson Mason and George Ellis about the year 1801. They kept a common country store on North Street, opposite the head of Dale Street. Rye straw was cut in a green state, prepared by scalding and bleaching, and braided in families. The children's labor was largely utilized, and many of our older people have grievous recollections of the long weary hours they spent, day after day, in braiding straw when they were children. This braid was purchased by Mason & Ellis and paid for in goods from their store, put out to be trimmed and pressed by other families, and yet again to be sewed into bonnets by those who had the requisite skill. The bonnets were sold in Boston and New York. After the death of George Ellis, Col. Mason continued the straw business, and several years afterward received a premium for straw bonnets manufactured by him from the Massachusetts Agricultural Society.

The Turnpike and Post-office.—The Boston and Hartford Turnpike was built in 1806; it was the property of stockholders, who, though supposing it a paying enterprise at first, realized very little from it. A line of coaches was run through the town for the next thirty years. Toll-gates were erected at several points along the way; those who traveled by private conveyance were compelled to take the old road or pay toll for traveling on the turnpike. The following year a post-office was established here, and was kept at the store on the corner of North Street. Prior to this time citizens of Medfield went for their mails to Dedham or Medway.

The business of brush-making, an industry new to this part of the country, was started by Artemas Woodward about 1808, in a shop near where the orthodox parsonage now stands, and where he had previously carried on cabinet-making. Several other persons, among whom were John W. Adams, John Harmstad, and George M. Smith, subsequently engaged in the same business, which continued to be carried on in this town for many years.

Several public-houses had been kept in different parts of the town for a long time. One was on North Street opposite the head of Dale Street, commenced by Samuel Sadey and continued by others; another was kept in the south part of the town, by Sabin Mann, at the place now owned by W. R. Smith; another was started by Seth Clark, continued by his son, and by Partridge Holbrook, and was at the place now owned by heirs of Warren Hartshorn, on Main Street; and still another, for a few years, was kept by Moses Richardson in the east part of the town, at the place now owned by Mr. Bussey. In 1810, David Fairbanks, who was for several years the prominent business man of Medfield, built the tavern which stood on the site of the present town hall, and which was for half a century the only public-house. Fairbanks also carried on a store at the corner of Main and North Streets, and did a large business besides in manufacturing straw bonnets.

The old school-houses, built about 1760, proving now inadequate, were replaced by new ones. The north and south districts had been provided with suitable buildings about 1803, and a new house was built for the centre district in 1810. "Academy Hall" was added to it as a second story, and was owned by a company who maintained a select school in it for some dozen years or more.

The manufacture of cut nails was commenced about 1813, and continued several years. The nail-factory was on the stream a little way below the stone mill which stands on the Dedham road.

Rev. Dr. Prentiss died in 1814, and the following year he was succeeded in the pastorate of the old parish church by Dr. Daniel C. Sanders.

Town and parish affairs were separated in 1815. Up to this date from the settlement of the place all matters connected with the parish, the minister, and the meeting-house were settled by vote in town-meeting. The First Congregational parish was at this time incorporated as a religious society under the laws of the State.

The first attempt, so far as known, to collect the leading facts in early Medfield history was made by Dr. Daniel C. Sanders, in his well-known historical sermon, in 1817.

A Sunday-school was started in 1818 by citizens of Medfield, irrespective of church affiliations; and it was held at the centre school-house. It continued in that form but one year, after which each church carried on a school of its own.

Freemasons.—"Cassia Lodge" of Freemasons was instituted in 1823, and had an existence of twenty-two years. "Academy Hall" was purchased and fitted up as a lodge-room. The hall was afterwards sold to the town for school purposes.

The second town library was started in 1828. It was owned by stockholders, and contained about a thousand volumes. In the same year, Eliakim Morse commenced purchasing domestic straw and manufacturing it, a business in which he continued for several years.

The town purchased a farm for the use of the poor in 1837. Up to this time paupers were put up at public auction, and struck off to the lowest bidder for their support. The town farm was paid for in part by the town's proportion (seventeen hundred and sixty-three dollars) of the forty millions divided among the States by the general government.

The same year the Boston and Hartford turnpike was laid out as a county way by the commissioners.

In 1838, Henry Partridge, of Sherborn, bought the old nail-factory property in the east part of the town, and commenced the manufacture of hay- and manure-forks and similar goods, which had a wide reputation for excellence. He continued the business for some fifteen years. In 1856 he, with others, formed a company for the same line of manufactures, and the stone mill on the Dedham road was built, where the business was carried on till the company dissolved.

The old cemetery, which was originally laid out when the town was settled, and which had been periodically cleared of trees and bushes, was in 1843 enlarged by an addition of land on the north and east. The faced wall next the street was built, the driveways and paths were made, lots laid out, and a large number of trees planted.

The school in the centre having become quite large, and a better system of grading being desired, as well as more suitable accommodations being needed, in 1844 the Masonic Hall was purchased, and the entire building was repaired and fitted up as a two-room school-house. It remained at the same place where the centre school-house had stood from the first, on North Street, near the corner of what is now called Janes Avenue.

A straw-shop was built in 1845 by Warren Chenery, who had transacted business in a small way for several years previously; and from this date may be reckoned the modern development of that branch of manufactures in the town. The business conducted by Mr. Chenery was a branch of the Foxboro' Straw Works, and the building proving inadequate to his wants, five years afterwards it was enlarged to double its original size. Warren Chenery & Son carried on the manufacture there till 1857, when the large three-story building was erected, which was burned in 1879.

The old brick school-house in the north district was removed, and the present building, corner of North and School Streets, was erected in 1849.

From early times, and especially from the times of the Revolution, the State militia, which included all able-bodied men between eighteen and forty-five, kept up a vigorous existence till about 1830. After that time the interest in it declined, till the trainings and musters, which had been occasions of great enthusiasm, became a mere farce. Many towns then formed what were termed "independent companies," composed of those who had a taste for military affairs. This town boasted such a company from 1839 to 1847. It was of efficient character and of considerable local note. Among its commanding officers were F. D. Ellis, Isaac Fiske, Moses H. Johnson, John Battelle, and Amos W. Shumway.

The voters were very much excited over the election of a representative to the General Court in 1850. After several ballotings, Jonathan P. Bishop, Esq., was chosen. He took part in the long struggle that resulted in the choice of Charles Sumner to the United States Senate, voting persistently for the successful candidate.

Several citizens formed a company, in 1851, for the purpose of introducing the boot and shoe manufacture. The quality of the goods manufactured was excellent, but the business was not successful enough financially to warrant its long continuance.

A Hunneman fire-engine was purchased in 1853, at a cost of six hundred dollars. A little afterwards an engine-house was built on North Street, and an engine company was formed.

In the same year Walter Janes commenced the manufacture of straw-goods in the old Townsend house, which stood on North Street, nearly opposite the Unitarian Church.

A new school-house for the south district was built in 1855; it stood a few rods south of the original site.

The straw-manufacturing firm of Janes & Curtis commenced business in 1858; the old shop of Mr. Janes was enlarged to more than double its former size. This business arrangement continued till the death of Mr. Janes.

The manufacture of carriages had been commenced by Jacob R. Cushman about 1835. For some time he did all the work with his own hands; but enlarging gradually, he employed several workmen in the different departments of the business. In 1852 the copartnership of Cushman & Baker was formed, and five years later they purchased the mill privilege on Frairy Street, and erected a factory there with other buildings. The factory was burned in 1868 but immediately rebuilt. Business was continued under the same firm-name until the retirement of the senior partner, since which it has been conducted by J. H. Baker & Co. The work of this firm has always had a high reputation for thoroughness and general excellence.

The old school-house in the centre district was sold and fitted up for store purposes on the corner of South Street, and a new building erected for the schools on Pleasant Street at a cost of about five thousand dollars, which is the building at present occupied as a school-house.

Various projects for a railroad through this town had been proposed during the preceding twenty years, but the first railroad communications were opened in 1861, when the Charles River Railroad, as it was then called, was so far completed as to allow trains to run as far as the station in the north part of Medfield.

The War of the Rebellion.—Medfield took an active part in the civil strife of 1861–65. The first volunteer, Allen A. Kingsbury, started at daybreak on the morning after the news of the attack upon our soldiers in Baltimore. He enlisted from Chelsea, and was killed at Yorktown, April 26, 1862. The following men enlisted from this town during the war:

Besides these, several men were procured as substitutes, and at the close of the war it was found that Medfield had sent eighty-two men into the country's service, and had paid, on account of the war, five thousand five hundred and seventy-one dollars, which, added to the amount paid by individuals, made a total of about ten thousand dollars.

The following are the names of those Medfield soldiers who lost their lives in the army:

Caleb Howard.	John A. Strang.
Allen A. Kingsbury.	Eugene Sumner.
Joseph Hardy.	John B. Chenery.
Willard R. Holbrook.	Daniel McMahon.
William Vennon.	Frank E. Morse.
Gabriel Strang.	Curtis W. Jones.
Eleazer Johnson.	William Dailey.

The school-district system was abolished in 1869, and the care of the schools thenceforth devolved upon the school committee of the town.

A new railroad from Framingham to Mansfield was laid out and built through the town, and trains commenced running upon it early in 1870.

The Straw-Works.—During the same year the copartnership of D. D. Curtis & Co. was formed, the manufacture of straw goods was carried on in the buildings hitherto occupied by Janes & Curtis, until the fire of six years later, when they were destroyed. During this period machinery was introduced to a considerable extent. The present ample building was erected in the fall of 1876, and the proprietors furnished it with the most approved appliances in the way of machinery, etc. The capacity of the factory affords room for six hundred operatives within its walls, and furnishes employment for four hundred more outside. Forty thousand cases of goods, of the value of more than a million dollars, are turned out in a year.

Chenery Hall.—By the will of George W. Chenery, a bequest was made to the town of a sum of money to be used in building a town hall. The trustees of that fund allowed it to accumulate for several years, till, with the accumulation and some appropriation by the town, a suitable building could be erected. The old tavern site in the centre of the village was purchased, together with some adjoining land, on which the town hall was built in 1872. In it a room was fitted up as a public library, and by bequests from Deacon George Cummings, and the generous aid of other citizens, a good library was secured, which was thrown open to the public the following spring.

J. H. Gould, afterwards Gould & Stevens, commenced business, in 1872, as dealers in grain, at the Chenery Mills in the east part of the town. Three years later the steam-mill on Park Street was built by D. D. Curtis, when Gould & Stevens removed their business thither. The firm, since Gould & Co., has developed a large wholesale as well as retail trade in flour, grain, meal, and feed, as well as in coal. Their business is among the largest in this line in the county.

In 1873, Messrs. Clark & Marshall built a factory on Frairy Street for the manufacture of bonnet-wire, where they have since carried on a successful business.

On the 8th of January, 1874, the new town hall was totally destroyed by fire, with the exception of the tower, some portion of which remained; among the contents destroyed was the public library, the fire-engine and apparatus, together with the hearse, which was kept in the basement; also a portion of the town books and records. The safe containing all the most valuable records was kept, by the heroic exertions of a few of our leading citizens, from falling into the cellar, where its contents must inevitably have been destroyed.

Immediate steps were taken for rebuilding the hall, which was accomplished during the year; and the new hall, though in some respects unequal to the first, is believed on the whole to be more convenient and available for town uses. The library was replaced by gifts from Deacon Cummings, John J. Adams, and many others; and at his death, Deacon Cummings left one thousand dollars to the public library, the income of which is to be expended yearly for its benefit.

The rate of taxation in 1874 was the highest ever reached in this town,—fifteen dollars on one thousand.

The bi-centennial anniversary of the burning of Medfield by the Indians was observed in 1876 with appropriate exercises. Addresses were delivered by Rev. C. C. Sewall, Hon. R. R. Bishop, and others, and a poem was read by its author, James Hewins, Esq. The exercises of that occasion have proved the means of awakening a lively interest in the subject of our local history.

In 1877 a hook-and-ladder truck, with apparatus, was purchased by the town and a company was formed.

During 1878-79 the records of the town were copied, arranged, and rebound. It is safe to say that no town in the county has its records in better condition than this.

Population of the town, according to the census of 1880, was 1365; number of polls, 375; number of men liable to do military duty, 200; number of dwelling-houses, 276; horses, 212; cows, 449; amount of school fund, $3760; valuation of real estate, $770,559; valuation of personal estate, $294,291: total valuation, $1,064,850.

First Congregational (Unitarian) Church.—

The first parish and the town were identical from 1651 down to 1815, and the history of the church during that period has been already given in connection with that of the town. The members of the church in 1815 numbered eighty-seven, and forty were added during Dr. Sanders' ministry.

The records of the church, commenced by Mr. Baxter in 1738, and which had been missing for many years, were discovered at Northfield and returned to the keeping of the church by Dr. Sanders.

The use of artificial modes of heating was first known in the Medfield meeting-houses in 1826, when large box-stoves were placed near the pulpit with long "Russia pipes" running back to the opposite end of the building.

In 1827 several members of the old church asked for dismissal from that body for the purpose of forming a new church of the orthodox Congregationalist belief. A council was called, which reported favorably for the petitioners, and they were dismissed.

Dr. Sanders resigned his pastorate in 1829, and was succeeded in the following year by Rev. James A. Kendall. During his ministry twenty persons became connected with the church. Some changes were made in the church covenant. He resigned in 1837.

In 1839 the old meeting-house, built in 1789, was completely remodeled. It was turned around so as to face the south instead of the east. The old belfry and porch were removed, and a spire erected about ninety feet high, and a portico with columns added. The interior was modernized, new pulpit and new pews built. The house was also raised so that a vestry was built underneath. Rev. Charles Robinson was installed as pastor the same year. During his ministry twenty members were added to the church. Mr. Robinson resigned in 1850.

Rev. Rushton D. Burr was ordained in 1853. Five members were added during his stay. He having received a call from Marietta, Ohio, he was dismissed from the pastorate here in 1857.

Rev. Solon W. Bush was installed in 1857. In the eight years of his service as pastor twenty-three persons united with the church. He was dismissed in 1865, and became editor of the Christian Register.

Rev. James H. Wiggin was installed as pastor in 1867. During his ministry the old plan of two sermons on a Sunday was changed to an afternoon sermon only, preceded by the Sunday-school, which was enlarged and more perfectly organized at that time. Meetings were also held on Sunday evenings. Mr. Wiggin remained till 1873, when, having received a call to the church in Marlborough, he was dismissed at his own request. While the church was under his charge fifteen members were added to it, the interior of the house of worship was somewhat improved in appearance, and a new bell purchased.

In 1874 the meeting-house was again remodeled, an addition was made to the height of the spire, the vestry was much improved, the exterior appearance of the house much changed, and the interior completely modernized and refurnished. The entire cost of these improvements was upwards of six thousand dollars.

For the next three years the pulpit was supplied by the Rev. C. C. Sewall. In 1877, Rev. Granville Pierce became pastor of the church. He was succeeded in 1882 by Rev. J. N. Pardee.

Baptist Church.—A few persons of Baptist sentiments resided in Medfield at a very early date, and out of the disaffection which arose in the parish church after the settlement of Mr. Townsend several of its members united with a Baptist Church in Boston, and commenced holding meetings in town, about 1752, as a branch of the Boston church. The meetings were held at private dwellings till 1771, when a meeting-house was built,—a small, plain building, thirty-one feet square. That house is still standing, and forms a part of the house and shop occupied by Mr. Hoisington. There was occasional preaching in it till 1776, when a church was formed and a pastor settled. The following are the names of the original members: Ebenezer Mason, Dorothy Mason, Asa Mason, Beriah Mason, Hannah Mason, Priscilla Mason, James Morse, Maria Morse, John Thebault, Abigail Morse, Susannah Reed, Benjamin Boyden, Elizabeth Baker, Edward Coffea, Kezia Plimpton, Mary Ellis, Kezia Cutler, Olive Cheney, Taphath Chenery, Bathsheba Morse, Kezia Morse, Mary Edwards, Lydia Lovell, Mary Harding, Abner Bullard, John Bassett, and Grace, a slave.

The first pastor was Rev. Thomas Gair, educated at Rhode Island College. Many additions were made to the church within the few years next following, largely from the surrounding towns. The prosperity of the church declined when other churches were formed in those places, and especially when a controversy arose between the pastor and some of the leading members, resulting in the exclusion of one of the principal resident supporters. In 1787 the church could no longer support a pastor, and Mr. Gair resigned to become pastor of the Second Baptist Church in Boston. After this date the church was without a settled pastor for twenty-three years, and much of the time with only occasional preaching. At one time the church numbered but two male members, and it was thought that it would become extinct. But the two male and ten female members were encouraged to continue, and by the help of West Dedham people, who began to attend here in 1808, public worship was not only sustained, but in 1810, Rev. William Gammell was settled as pastor, preaching alternate Sabbaths in Medfield and West Dedham for the next thirteen years.

In 1811, the Baptist society was organized under the laws of the commonwealth. In 1823, the original house was enlarged and improved, and the same year Mr. Gammell resigned, having received a call to the church in Newport, R. I. After his resignation the West Dedham portion of the church withdrew and formed a church there.

In 1824, Rev. Joseph Ballard became acting pastor, in which relation he continued until 1829. Forty-one persons were baptized by him during his ministry.

The pulpit having been supplied for a short time by Rev. J. A. Boswell, in 1830, Rev. Moses Curtis became pastor and remained three years, during which time twenty-three were baptized.

Rev. Horatio N. Loring became pastor in 1834, and remained till 1838, baptizing fourteen into the fellowship of the church.

In the latter year the church erected a new house of worship in a more desirable locality, on the corner of Main and South Streets. It was supplied with a bell, and a half-underground room, according to the fashion of those times, for a vestry.

In 1838, also, Rev. D. W. Phillips was ordained as pastor, who continued in that office for twelve years. He baptized forty-five persons, who were added to the church during his pastorate. In 1842, the old Baptist parsonage, given to the church in 1778, was sold, and a cottage on Pleasant Street purchased for the use of the ministry.

Rev. George G. Fairbanks was ordained in 1851, who remained till 1855; during his stay ten members were added to the church.

Rev. James W. Lathrop was installed as pastor in 1856. Sixty-three members were added (fifty-one of them by baptism) during the years of his ministry, which lasted till 1862.

Rev. Amos Harris was the next pastor, being ordained in 1862. He remained till 1865, when he resigned on account of ill health. There were twenty-four additions in that time.

Rev. A. W. Carr assumed the pastoral charge at the beginning of 1866, and retained it five years. He baptized twelve. In 1869, the church cast off the forms of a religious society, and itself assumed the entire charge of the support of public worship.

Rev. A. M. Crane was ordained in 1872, and continued as pastor six years. Under his ministry the additions were sixty-nine, thirty-eight of these by baptism.

In 1874 the house of worship was completely remodeled, additions being made both front and rear, the corner tower and spire erected, a better vestry and other rooms finished in the basement, and the whole refurnished. The total expense of all these improvements was twelve thousand five hundred dollars, one-half of which sum was paid by Deacon George Cummings.

Rev. Mr. Crane resigned in 1878, and was immediately succeeded by Rev. I. H. Gilbert.

The Pleasant Street parsonage was sold, and the present parsonage built in 1879.

Second (Orthodox) Congregational Church.—The members of the First Church, whose petition for leave to withdraw for the purpose of forming a new church has been already noticed in the sketch of that church, and which had been granted by the council, organized the Second Congregational Church Feb. 6, 1827. The constituent members were seventeen, as follows: Moses Wight, Artemas Woodward, Obed Fisher, Nathaniel Stearns, Stephen Turner, Elisha Clark, Sarah Wight, Mehetabel Woodward, Mary Stearns, Susan F. Turner, Esther Chenery, Esther Chenery (2d), Olive Mason, Mary Smith, Waitstill Smith, Martha Adams, Keziah Mason.

The same year a new religious society was organized under the laws of the State. During the first four years of the existence of this church and society, meetings were held in a small hall which was over the store at the corner of Main and North Streets.

Rev. Arthur Granger was installed as the first pastor in 1831. Previous to this time the church had received an addition of twenty-five members, and during his ministry twenty-four more were added. His pastorate terminated in 1832. The same year a house of worship was built on the spot now occupied by the society for the same purpose.

Rev. Walter Bidwell was installed in 1833, and dismissed in 1836, having received twenty-two members.

Rev. Charles Walker was installed in 1837, and continued in that office about a year. He was followed by Rev. John Ballard and Rev. Moses G. Grosvenor, who supplied the pulpit during the next three years, during which time ten members were received.

Rev. Thomas T. Richmond was installed as pastor in 1842, and continued thirteen years. Thirty-four were added to the church membership.

Rev. Andrew Bigelow, D.D., was installed in 1855; he remained till 1866; during his ministry seventy-one members were received. After Dr. Bigelow resigned, the pulpit was supplied for a year by Rev. Chester Bridgman, who received ten persons to fellowship.

In 1869 Rev. J. M. R. Eaton commenced his labors as acting pastor. In 1873 the meeting-house was repaired, newly furnished, and a chapel built, at a total expense of four thousand five hundred dollars, of which sum about three-fourths was furnished by Mr. F. D. Ellis.

In 1876, Mr. Eaton was succeeded by Rev. William H. Cobb, and the same year the church edifice with all its contents, together with the chapel, was totally destroyed by fire. The present house of worship was built in 1877, its total cost, including furnishing, being about ten thousand dollars. The parsonage was built in 1879.

Rev. George H. Pratt became pastor in 1879; he was succeeded in 1883 by Rev. Wilbur Johnson.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

DANIEL D. CURTIS.

Daniel D. Curtis, son of Bracey and Eliza (Day) Curtis, was born at Kennebunk, Me., Jan. 19, 1830. His father was a farmer, and descended from an old and honorable English family, but his means being limited, Daniel, like most of the farmers' sons of that time, was obliged to go into the world and seek his fortune. At the age of twenty-one he left the paternal home and State and came to Billerica, Mass., where he went to work on what was called the "Old Winning Farm." Here he remained two years, and then came to Medfield and engaged to work for Walter Janes, who was carrying on a very small business in a primitive way, using his dwelling-house as a shop, manufacturing straw goods. Three years later the enterprise and business tact which young Curtis displayed induced Mr. Janes to take him into partnership, said partnership continuing until the death of Mr. Janes, twelve years later. Year by year the business had steadily increased, and at the time of Mr. Janes' death they were making about three thousand cases of goods per year,—a small business indeed, but it was the nucleus for what has since, through the skill and management of Mr. Curtis, grown to be one of the largest of its kind in the world. After the death of Mr. Janes Mr. Curtis formed a copartnership with H. A. Searle and G. F. Dailey, of New York City. Messrs. Searle & Dailey took charge of the New York department of the business, selling the goods, buying stock, etc., while to Mr. Curtis was left the supervision and direction of the manufacturing itself. He immediately took measures to increase the product, and from time to time made additions to the works. They made it a rule at the beginning only to do business with their own capital, never to venture beyond their means, but, however, to avail themselves of everything in the way of improved and labor-saving machinery as fast as it was invented. He also added the manufacturing of chip, lace, velvet, plush, satin, beaver, and felt hats,—in fact, everything in the line of ladies' head-gear, as they make that a specialty. They employ about two hundred men and one thousand women in the different departments of their work. A small part of their manufacturing, particularly in felts and beavers, is done in New York City. They manufacture on an average forty thousand cases per year, averaging four dozen bonnets or hats to a case. About nine months in the year they are turning out goods daily, the other three months they are occupied in getting up new "shapes," etc., and preparing for the coming seasons. The sales amount to at least a million dollars per annum. The firm-name at Medfield is D. D. Curtis & Co.; at New York, Searle, Dailey & Co.

In September, 1876, their factory was destroyed by fire. They immediately set to work erecting a new and much larger establishment, and ninety days after it was commenced it was ready for occupancy. It is a model structure, built on the most modern plan, with all conveniences and improvements. They have new machinery throughout, and nothing is omitted that could possibly facilitate their work or advance their interests. In addition to the straw-works Mr. Curtis has a mill, where he cuts up every year a million feet of lumber, all of which he has made into the boxes in which his goods are encased for the market. He also owns a large steam grist-mill, where is ground an average of two car-loads of corn per day, besides oats, barley, etc. He carries on agriculture on quite an extensive scale, owning a beautiful farm on the outskirts of the village of Medfield.

Mr. Curtis married, in the autumn of 1860, Ellen, daughter of Jonathan and Clarissa Wight, of Medfield. They have four children,—Blanche E., Maude A., Bracey, and Daisy E. Mr. Curtis has proved himself to have in an eminent degree the characteristics indispensable to a successful business career,—pluck, judgment, and enterprise, and united with these another quality not always possessed by even successful men, liberality. While he has built up a very large and constantly-increasing business, he has at the same time been the foremost man of his town in all things tending to public improvement.

The impression that is made on the stranger as he drives through the lovely village of Medfield is that of a happy, prosperous, and thoroughly enterprising community. It is not detracting from whatever spirit of enterprise may have been exhibited by any other citizen when we say that to Mr. Curtis more than any other man thanks are due for this impression. Mr. Curtis is noted for his genial disposition and generous charity, and is liberal in his political views. He has never held an office, and asserts that he never will. His life has been one of steady devotion to business. His success has been the natural result of his ability to examine and readily comprehend any subject presented to him, power to decide promptly, and courage to act with vigor and persistency in accordance with his convictions.

ISAAC FISKE.

The Fiskes of Massachusetts descended from an ancient family of that name which for centuries and until recently had its seat and manorial lands in Laxfield, in the county of Suffolk, England.

Investigations by Somerby have traced its existence as early as the reign of Henry VI., when Simon Fiske was lord of a manor and entitled to "coat armor."

Several of his descendants appear to have gained repute for piety and liberal education, and in the days of Queen Anne to have suffered persecution on account of staunch adherence to evangelical principles. It is recorded of one in particular that to escape being burned at the stake he was concealed in a cellar, where he wrought diligently such handicraft by candle-light as sufficed for his support. Such was the stock from which sprang at a later period the Puritan Fiskes, of Suffolk and New England. Over one hundred bearing the family name have variously attained distinction as divines, authors, scholars, and public men in the States where they have resided.

The first Americans of the Fiske family were David, grandson of Jeffrey, and son of Robert and Sibil, a lineal descendant of Simon mentioned above, who, with his nephews, Nathan and John, settled in Watertown, Mass., in 1642. His brother Nathanael, father of Nathan and John, probably died on the passage from England. Nathan Fiske (1) settled in Watertown in 1642, admitted freeman May 10, 1643, was selectman in 1673. Lieut. Nathan Fiske (2), born Oct. 17, 1642, died October, 1694, married Elizabeth —; she died May 15, 1696. Deacon Nathan Fiske (3), born Jan. 3, 1672, died in 1741. He represented Watertown for some years,—1727–29, 1732. He was a man of judgment and "much confided in by his townsmen." He married, first, Oct. 14, 1696, Sarah Coolidge, she died Nov. 27, 1723; second, May 22, 1729, Hannah Smith, a widow. Nathan Fiske (4), of Weston, born February, 1701, married, first, Oct. 9, 1730, Anne Warren; second, Mary Fiske, daughter of Deacon Jonathan and Abigail (Reed) Fiske. Jonathan Fiske (5), born Dec. 15, 1739, married Abigail Fiske, born Aug. 16, 1739, daughter of Thomas and Mary (Pierce) Fiske, of Waltham. Jonathan Fiske (6), born Jan. 19, 1774, married April 7, 1799, Sally Flagg. Isaac Fiske (7), son of Jonathan and Sally (Flagg) Fiske, was born Nov. 7, 1813, in Medfield. His education was not confined to common schools. He fitted for college at Concord Academy, but changed his intentions and entered the store of Edwin Warren, of Framingham, as clerk, where he remained for a few years, afterwards becoming partner in the firm. Two years later he purchased the store of his brother-in-law, Francis Ellis, of Medfield, giving up his interest in Framingham, and moved to Medfield, where he continued in active business as a merchant till within a year of his death. Mr. Fiske was very prominent in town affairs, having been town clerk for fifteen years and town treasurer forty years, holding that position at the time of his death; had also represented his town in the Legislature, and was postmaster in Medfield for twenty years. Politically he was Whig and Republican; orthodox in religious belief. Oct. 2, 1836, he married Mary, daughter of Loring and Elizabeth Manson, of Framingham. They had but one child,—Elizabeth L., born June 5, 1846, who matured into a bright, accomplished woman, the pride of her parents. She died suddenly in the prime of her womanhood, of heart disease, May 9, 1877. Mr. Fiske's death occurred Jan. 18, 1883.

As a business man Isaac Fiske performed faithfully and earnestly whatever he undertook, was careful and successful, although liberal in his dealings with all, and men with whom he had business relations in Boston and elsewhere speak of him in the highest terms of praise. As a neighbor and citizen he was kind-hearted, charitable, and benevolent to a fault, a gentle word for all, he always stood ready to condone the faults of the weak and erring, and to encourage them to better acts in the future. He won the admiration of every one he came in contact with by his kindly disposition and cheerful spirit. It has been remarked of him that he was probably more universally loved than any man who ever lived in Medfield. In the family circle he was a devoted husband and kind father, and the sweet tribute of praise from his loved companion of many years should not be omitted here. During the long period of their married life (forty-five years) she says that not an act, a word, or look could she wish changed, or that left behind a bitter memory. In all his life Isaac Fiske kept in mind and practiced the golden rule of Christ,—“Do ye unto others as ye would that they should do unto you.”

CHAPTER XXXVI.

SHARON.

BY SOLOMON TALBOT.

SHARON, located seventeen and one-half miles southwest of Boston, is on the line of the Boston and Providence Railroad, and has two stations. It is bounded on the north by Canton, east by Stoughton, south by Easton, Mansfield, and Foxboro', west by Walpole and Norwood. It occupies the height of land between Boston and Providence, and is the watershed of the Neponset on the north and the stream that runs south into Canoe and Taunton Rivers.

Sharon has an area of about fourteen thousand acres, a little more than one-half of which is under cultivation. In 1880 it contained 1492 inhabitants, and its manufactures at the last State census were: boots and shoes, $93,190; iron and steel goods, $61,700; cotton goods, carriages, boxes, $125,820.

The surface of Sharon is diversified and uneven, and increases in height from the level of the Neponset River, on the northwest, until it reaches, at Sharon Village, an elevation of several hundred feet. This village is drained by the Massapoag Brook on the east and Beaver Brook on the west side.

Lake Massapoag is a beautiful body of water, situated one mile south of the village, and was so named by the aborigines of the country, and it signified to them "Great Water." This sheet of water is surrounded in many places by beautiful groves, on a hard, dry, pebbly shore, with a carriage-drive of about four miles in extent around it. Of late years much attention has been given to the inland fisheries, and this lake has been stocked with the following varieties: the carp, land-locked salmon, black bass, and white perch.

Many beautiful residences have been built upon the bluffs which overlook the lake by people from Boston, who come from the city during the summer to enjoy its romantic scenery and rural quiet. Upon the southeast side is the Massapoag House, located in a grove about thirty feet above the water,—a summer watering-place, large and roomy,—a pleasant resort during the summer for people of business or of leisure, or those in quest of health. Here they can repose in a quiet home, away from the dust and turmoil of a city life. The balsamic odors of the pines, the agreeable surroundings, airy drives, cheerful outlook, all combine to relieve and invigorate the weak and the weary, either in body or mind. Upon the west side of the lake is Burkhardt's Grove, which has a branch railroad station. Here parties are brought from Boston or Providence, and spend the day in agreeable recreation, sports upon the water, in the woods, or in the buildings erected for their comfort and accommodation.

Southwest of Sharon Heights Station is a large extent of prairie-like land of more than one thousand acres. It was upon this extended plain, after the late war, that the squadrons of the Massachusetts militia were mustered and reviewed by Gen. Benjamin F. Butler, in September, 1866. Here, during three days, they went through the tactics of war, and showed how fields were won. But now the scene is changed, the swords are turned into plowshares, and this extensive plain has become one of the finest and most famous vegetable gardens in the county.

There is a pond of pure, soft, spring water adjoining this plain, named by the Indians "Wolomolapoag," or "deep pleasant water." This is to be utilized for irrigating the gardens. No doubt that it will double their productiveness.

The waters of this pond are discharged in a southerly direction, and after passing a mile or more, cross the main road near where once stood the famous Billings Tavern. This was the earliest house known to have been erected in this town, being located upon the Bristol and Boston post-road. There was a house here before 1660, although it is doubtful if Capt. Billings occupied it before 1675. But he died here in 1717, and has a monument to his memory in the cemetery near this place. This stream continues on into Foxboro', where it assumes the name of Canoe River, and finally empties into Mount Hope Bay.

Moose Hill.—This hill, upon the west side of the town, is a high, rocky region, interspersed with some fine farms, but mostly covered with wood. It has a gradual rise from the plain, and its summit is probably six hundred feet above the level of the sea. The name given to this section is probably the name of the wild animals that once ranged its forest, fed upon its nutritious grasses, and drank from its pure springs and purling streams.

It is uncertain at what period these animals disappeared from this town, but as late as 1765, deer-reeves annually formed a part of the officers of the district, for the protection of moose and deer. A rugged road leads to the top of the hill, where upon the rocks, in olden time, was lighted the signal-torch of liberty. It now has an observatory, twenty feet in height. From this tower can be seen Wachusett Mountain and hills in New Hampshire, Boston on the horizon, Blue Hill, and the valley of the Neponset below, interspersed by a landscape that embraces towns and villages, farms and forests, lakes and church spires, and railroad lines, until the view is bounded by the hills in Rhode Island.

There are many smaller hills, as Bluff Head, Bald, and Bullard's Hill. From the southern part of this last-named hill is seen Sharon village nestled among the trees upon the horizon, while the new town house is a most conspicuous object upon the right. Below, in the foreground, are seen dotted in the woods the Mas-kwonicut meadows, and a little never-failing stream called by the Indians by the same name (now known as Puffer's Brook) passes near the base of this hill.

Rattlesnake Hill is a high, rocky section in the southeast part of the town, mostly covered with wood. There is a mountain road over its hills that passes by the Tisdale mansion, the Bay Street Chapel (evangelical), and continues on to North Easton.

The rocks in this town are mostly syenite, but there are some excellent granite quarries in the east part of the town. In former times large quantities of bog iron ore have been here obtained.

Early History.—In order to introduce the local history of this town it is necessary to advert to the circumstances and the condition of affairs when the territory south of the Blue Hills was incorporated as a town, in the year 1726, called Stoughton. This territory at that time extended from Readville, on the north, to Mansfield (or perhaps Norton at that time), on the south. This west line was nearly twenty miles in length, while the east line extended from the Blue Hills to Bridgewater and Easton on the south. This tract of country was probably ten miles in width.

Now, in those times the colonial laws required the support of and the attendance upon public worship on Sunday, and the only Congregational meeting was held in the meeting-house at Canton Corner. Those people who lived adjacent to other towns worshiped where it was more convenient. But the people mainly went to meeting at Canton. Sharon was a component part of this territory, which will account for the following petition :

"To His Excellency, Jonathan Belcher, Esq., Captain-General and Governor-in-Chief in and over His Majesty's Province of the Massachusetts Bay, in New England, and the Honorable, His Majesty's Council and House of Representatives of the General Court assembled at Boston, on the eighth day of June, 1739.

"The petition of John Hixson and Benjamin Johnson, committee to prefer a petition to this court in behalf of the subscribers, inhabitants of the Southerly part of Stoughton, humbly sheweth :

"Whereas, by the Providence of the all-disposing God, our lots are fallen to us at so great a distance from the Public worship of God, in the North part of the said town, that your petitioners cannot ever, without great difficulty, attend the public worship of God ; Wherefore we have petitioned the town once and again, to be eased of the great difficulties we now labor under, but have been by them rejected, notwithstanding the great length of way which some of your petitioners live from the public worship in the North Part, about eight or nine miles ; and in consideration of our great duty to attend the public worship of God, not only ourselves, but by our families and children, which, by the blessing of God, are greatly increased ; Therefore, your petitioners have of late petitioned this Honorable Court to be set off a separate Town or Precinct, but this Honorable Court did not see cause to grant the petition. The reason, as we humbly conceive, was the answers to the petition, which were wrong and erroneous.

"Therefore, your petitioners humbly pray that this Honorable Court, to see with your own eyes, by sending a committee to view the circumstances, at the charge and cost of the petitioners ; that this Honorable Court may be rightly informed, and see the unjust proceedings of the Honorable respondents, and their fallacious answers to our former petitions ; and as your petitioners are obliged by conscience and law to attend the worship of God, they have, by a free contribution, maintained preaching among themselves for a considerable time. Notwithstanding they have paid their proportional part to the North Part, where they can have but little or none advantage.

"We would beg leave to inform this Honorable Court that since we have had preaching among us, it has encouraged some well minded persons to come and settle within the limits herein petitioned, and, if it should please the Honorable Court to grant our petition, it would be a great encouragement to a great many more, if your petitioners were in a capacity to have the ordinances of God administered among them ; and your petitioners having had some experience, by their having maintained preaching among themselves, they look on themselves as able to maintain the worship of God.

"Your petitioners, therefore, humbly pray this Honorable Court that they would please to send a committee to view our circumstances, that so your petitioners may be put into a capacity that they may have the ordinances of our Saviour settled among them, in a regular order, by setting them off as district, and separate town or precinct, viz."

"We humbly beg leave here to say, that what we now offer in respect to our being set off, is in sincerity for the promoting of the worship of God and religion in its purity among us.

"Wherefore, we pray your Excellency and Honors would be pleased to hear our request, and grant our petition, and as we in duty bound, shall ever pray.

The respondents to this petition say :

"The petitioners have used a great deal of craft in the course they have pursued, inasmuch as the town now owes the minister about eighty pounds, and the town has just laid out nearly one hundred pounds, in building a road for the petitioners to go to meeting, and now, not satisfied, they have built a church near their own doors, and ask to be set off as a Town, or Precinct."

The committee to whom the subject was referred came upon the premises, examined the circumstances, and reported the prayer of the petitioners ought to be granted. The report was accepted, and the Second Precinct was set off and received the signature of the Governor, July 2, 1740.

It must not be supposed that everything had been accomplished when the people had become a precinct. The meeting-house, although boarded and shingled, was not plastered, neither was it finished inside.

At a meeting of the inhabitants of the precinct, held in 1740, Mr. John Hixson, Ephraim Payson, and Daniel Richards were chosen a committee, and Ebenezer Hewins, treasurer.

After hearing several candidates, among whom were the Rev. John Ballantine, Rev. Noah Clapp, Ebenezer Gay, and Philip Curtis, the people settled the Rev. Philip Curtis, Jan. 5, 1742, as pastor of the Second Precinct.

In 1744 the committee put out the work of building the galleries and their seats, two pair of stairs and banisters, and the plastering of the inside of the church to the gables. This contract was taken by John Hixson and Ephraim Payson.

The meeting-house was completed during the year. Capt. Benjamin Johnson made the irons for the great doors of the meeting-house, and everything appeared so safe and secure that the committee ordered a place in the gable prepared for the ammunition of the precinct. Capt. Johnson procured a ladder and brought the ammunition and placed it in the repository made for it. Many men who had been active in public life now rested from their labors and passed away.

John Hixson, an enterprising mechanic, built a house near the Chestnut Hill Cemetery, known as the "Increase Hewins' house," where he resided. He probably gave the first land for the cemetery, and made bricks from the clay in the meadow opposite. He died May 13, 1751.

Elder Joseph Hewins occupied land on the opposite side of the railroad. He was very early settled there. He was deacon of the church at Canton Corner in 1717, and when Stoughton was incorporated, in 1726, he was elected assessor and selectman, to which office he was chosen many years. He died Feb. 24, 1755, aged eighty-seven years, and left many descendants.

Capt. Benjamin Johnson, a prominent man, carried on the iron-works until his death in 1760, in his sixty-fifth year.

Samuel Bird lived on a farm at the outlet of Massapoag, which he occupied in 1716, and died in 1742. His son Samuel was afterwards deacon of the church.

William Tolman having bought a tract of land south of Massapoag for the purpose of preparing a new home, was assisted by his brother, Johnson Tolman, in clearing off the forest and erecting a habitation. They stopped at Samuel Bird's, for the Birds and the Tolmans were formerly neighbors in Dorchester.

Here the boys seemed to be at home. Sharon was in those days comparatively a wilderness. Beyond was an almost interminable forest and swamp, and yet the boys were two miles from their destination. Being a young man of fertile invention and a good share of perseverance, William procured a large horn-beam log, which was common in those days, and soon had the inside dug out and fashioned into a boat, however rude it may have been.

Having made all ready and taking their dinner with them, William and his brother started on a voyage of discovery to find the new farm. It is supposed that William and Johnson Tolman were the first white men who navigated Massapoag Lake. In this manner they continued their labors. Early morning and twilight evening found them enjoying the cool refreshing breezes of Massapoag, as they floated to and from the scene of their daily toil. In this way they cleared and subdued the land, and when the adjoining property came into market Johnson bought it, there being about one hundred acres.

They now began to clear Johnson's land, which proved to be of a superior quality. They were both pleased with it. One day, as they were quietly eating their dinner, they were surprised to see a partridge run past them exhibiting signs of great fright. Soon, however, it was followed by an enormous rattlesnake which, seeing the men, stopped pursuing the bird, and, with head erect, eyed the strangers, while with an oscillating movement of its tail it commenced a free musical entertainment for their especial benefit. Not appreciating the musical talents of the performer, nor desiring the company of such visitors, they quickly dispatched the snake with a musket which was near them.

William built a house and brought home a wife, who proved a helpmate indeed.

The snake had produced a decidedly unpleasant impression upon Johnson's mind. He did not fancy such unbidden guests in his garden, and soon after sold out his farm to his brother, and returned to Dorchester. This farm proved afterwards to have the most fertile soil, and became one of the most successful farms in Sharon.

As had been anticipated, many worthy people became residents of the Second Precinct during the next quarter of a century. Among those who afterwards became active in public affairs may be mentioned Benjamin Gannett, William Billings, Jr., Nathaniel Morse, David Fisher, and Israel Smith, as well as the descendants of the first settlers, who had now become active citizens.

The French and Indian Wars.—From 1750 to 1760 the Second Precinct furnished a large number of soldiers for the king's service, although the call was made for Stoughton; that town included the above precinct. The soldiers whose names are annexed are presumed to be from Stoughtonham, and served at Crown Point, Ticonderoga, and Fort William Henry:

Capt. Ebenezer Mann, of Stoughtonham, went into the war with a company, but as the soldiers are most of them from Wrentham they are not included in the Second Precinct.

The results of this campaign were of incalculable benefit to the precinct. Her citizens had been taught a lesson in self-reliance, they had learned the tactics of war. They had fought by the side of the veterans of England, and, notwithstanding the pomp and pride of war, they had found the army to be composed of men like themselves. The precinct had valuable religious privileges granted by the General Court, and they could see no reason why their civil rights were not to them equally valuable and available. Therefore, Joseph Hewins, Jr., William Richards, and Jeremiah Fuller were ordered to present a petition to the General Court from the inhabitants of the Second Precinct, praying to be set off a separate town or district.

In accordance with this petition, the following act was passed:

"ANNO REGNI REGIS GEORGII TERTII QUINTO.

"AN ACT for incorporating the Second Precinct in the Town of Stoughton, in the County of Suffolk (as it now is), into a district by the name of Stoughtonham.

"Whereas the inhabitants of the Second Precinct in Stoughton labor under great difficulties, by reason of their distance from the place where the town-meetings are held in said town:

"Be it enacted by the Governor, Council, and House of Representatives, That the Second Precinct in the town of Stoughton by the same bounds and limits which the said Second Precinct now have, be, and hereby are, incorporated into a separate district, by the name of Stoughtonham; and that the inhabitants thereof be vested with all the powers, privileges, and immunities, which the inhabitants of any town within this province, do, or by law ought to enjoy: excepting only the privilege of sending a representative to the General Assembly: And that the inhabitants of said district shall have liberty, from time to time, to join with the town of Stoughton in the choice of a Representative."

Joseph Hewins, Esq., was authorized by the aforesaid act, passed June 2, 1765, to issue a warrant to some principal inhabitant in said district, to notify and warn the freeholders and inhabitants therein, qualified to vote in town affairs, to meet at the meeting-house for the choice of such officers as a town might legally choose.

By virtue of the above act, Joseph Hewins, Esq., issued his warrant to Richard Hixson, inhabitant, who warned the inhabitants of said district to meet for the above-named purpose on the 8th day of July, 1765.

At a meeting held on the 8th day of July, 1765, Daniel Richards was chosen moderator and clerk of said district. Daniel Richards, Mr. Job Swift, and Mr. Thomas Randall were chosen selectmen and assessors, and Daniel Richards, treasurer.

The district was now in a condition to divide its poor with its sister-town, define its boundaries, and apportion the school money, all of which was amicably done.

Although the inhabitants rejoiced in the accession to their number of those that feared and worshiped God, still it is hardly possible that some of the baser sort should not have grown up or settled among them.

There is no record of any sentences or punishments inflicted upon evil-doers in these days, but the following record would intimate the terror of the law was before their eyes, for in 1772 the treasurer was ordered to pay "William Price the sum of one pound ten shillings, for his providing plank and irons, and for making the stocks for the district, and carrying them to the meeting-house."

Very early in the troubles of the colonies with the mother-country were the questions of public policy discussed in the public meetings of Stoughtonham. The inhabitants who had suffered the privations and atrocities of the Indian wars for their sovereign, King George II., had learned a lesson in the school of war they were not soon to forget. They were not children, to be intimidated by the acts of Parliament or the soldiers of King George III.

When the public meeting was held in Faneuil Hall, Boston, Sept. 22, 1768, to consult upon the affairs of the provinces, Stoughtonham was represented by Mr. Job Swift.

At a meeting legally assembled at the meeting-house, Feb. 23, 1773, the district took into consideration the state of their liberties and privileges, as exhibited in a pamphlet sent from Boston, which, after being read, the following votes were passed, viz.:

"1st. That under God, through our Forefathers, we have enjoyed invaluable liberties and privileges, civil and religious, and when we consider the worth of them, and how dear it cost our forefathers to purchase these, for themselves and their posterity, we cannot but esteem them highly, nor wonder to see the people alarmed, when they behold their liberties and privileges threatened and invaded.

"2d. That from what we have heard and seen, we cannot but think that some of our liberties and privileges have been taken from us, and others are threatened, and that it is an alarming crisis with us, and we have a loud call in Providence to us, to imitate the prudent man, who foreseeth the evil and hideth himself.

"3d. That since we are bid to look to ourselves, not only in spiritual but in temporal affairs, we look upon it as our duty, and it shall be our practice, to use all constitutional measures to remove the burdens we feel and prevent those we fear, respecting our civil and religious affairs and concerns.

"4th. That our thanks are due to the town of Boston, for espiesing our dangers, and, like faithful watchmen, giving us warning.

"5th. That our deputy use his utmost interest and influence in Court, in a constitutional way and manner, to recover what liberties and privileges have been taken from us, and secure those that remain, and that our clerk inform him of this action.

"6th. That we own King George the third to be our rightful lord and sovereign, and promise allegiance to him, but at the same time deny the parliamentary power of taxing us, being without the realm of England, and not represented there.

"7th. That a copy of these votes be sent to the committee of correspondence in Boston by our clerk."

1774, August 29th. In a legal district meeting, it was, on motion made to see if the district were willing to comply with the late acts of the Parliament, voted, unanimously, in the negative. This year the treasurer was ordered to pay for a cask of powder and one hundred flints.

At a meeting held Jan. 2, 1775, it was voted that Mr. Job Swift be a delegate to meet with the Congress at Cambridge, on the 1st day of February next.

Voted, that the district strictly adhere to the resolves of the American Congress; and,

Voted, that a large committee be chosen for the public good, and that they use their utmost endeavors to suppress all disorders and outrages and disturbances in this district, and that said committee consist of the following persons: Messrs. Ebenezer Capen, Israel Smith, David Fisher, Ebenezer Hill, Benjamin Gannett, John Comee, Capt. Edward Bridge Savels, Thomas Richards, William Paine (2d), Capt. Ebenezer Tisdale, Samuel Gould, Benjamin Fairbanks, Elijah Baker, Josiah Robbins, Lieut. Richard Hixson.

1775, February 3d. Voted to raise twenty-eight minute-men and two officers, and that they exercise two half-days in a week. Also, that the committee supply four guns for the men who have none, at the cost of the district.

1775, April 19th. The Lexington alarm was sounded throughout the province, and Stoughtonham responded with the following companies of soldiers.

It is said that after the fight at Lexington there were no able-bodied young men left at home, and very few old men were away from the camp around Boston. In these old colonial times roads were trails or bridle-paths, and houses were scattered far between, and many were located in the fields. The occupants of these houses were some of them young women who had just been married. The bride had left father and mother, and her wedding tour was a journey to her new house, isolated though it might be, but here she had consecrated her life to new duties and her affections to husband and a new home. Now, when the husband of a few days put on the armor of war, and went away to battle for his country, the light and love of the bride's heart seemed gone forever.

But the occupants of some of these houses were women who were past the meridian of life. Their gray hairs and stern features told of a life of hardship and toil, and they had hoped their declining years would have rested lightly in the bosom of the family that had grown up around them. Yet they could give up their tea and little luxuries of life, which they had loved so well, for the love they bore their country,—the cause of freedom. Even more, with their counsel and their sympathy they cheered and encouraged the hearts of their husbands and sons as they went forth from their homes to engage in the struggle for life, home, and liberty, and these women felt in their hearts a glow of patriotism and conscious pride that they had done what they could.

It was the morning of the 17th of June, 1775, when the stillness of the early hour was broken by heavy cannonading in the distance, at Boston. The roar of heavy guns continued all the forenoon. In the afternoon the contest seemed to have redoubled its fury. What were the thoughts of these women as the horrors of war and bloody strife entered their minds? What if their husbands or sons should be slain in battle, and a revengeful, conquering enemy should put in execution their threats to come with fire and sword, burn the houses and kill the defenseless women and children?

In their agony of spirit and despair they turned their steps to Sharon Hill, the high ground near the school-house, where possibly they might behold the fearful contest. They sank down in despair as they beheld before them on the horizon, twenty miles away, in a fearful mass of smoke and flames, Charlestown, with its six hundred buildings.

Night coming on, the tumult and voice of war was hushed.

Anxiously awaiting some tidings from the terrible strife before them they went into the school-house, where they could sympathize with and console each other. Others came in, and a goodly number were gathered. Their minister, the Rev. Philip Curtis, who had faithfully watched over them these many years, was with them, with his prayers, exhortations, and watching. Here on this eventful night was held the first watch-meeting ever held in Sharon. Here these women, with aching hearts and tearful eyes, beheld in the light of burning Charlestown the beacon of freedom, the dawn of a nation's birthday.

The following incidents are a part of the history of this town. Edmund Quincy, Jr., was the son of a retired merchant of Quincy, Mass. He came to this town and married Hannah Gannett, April 30, 1767. He also bought a farm east of Massapoag Lake, where he resided during the remainder of his life. The members of this distinguished family were most of them decided patriots. That was the case with Edmund Quincy, Jr. One day while walking upon the beach of Massapoag his attention was attracted by the large amount of iron ore lying useless and neglected upon the shore and extending into the water. Being much interested in the affairs of the colonies, and well knowing their needs and necessities (in case of a conflict with the mother-country) for the want of heavy guns, he imparted the information to his friend, Col. Richard Gridley, of Boston, who had been an engineer in the colonial service, and was the only American in this country who knew anything in regard to the manufacture of cannon. Quincy bought the right to take the ore from Massapoag of the "Dorchester proprietors." Quincy, also, in connection with Gridley and Joseph Jackson, of Boston, purchased the furnace of the Ebenezer Mann Company, for the manufacture of heavy guns. This furnace was located in the south part of this town, on the site now occupied by Deacon E. Clapp's shingle-mill.

Col. Gridley came out to Canton in 1772, and, in connection with his son Scarborough, commenced draining the pond and exposing the ore. Large quantities of the ore were taken out in 1773, and yet the guns were not completed until 1775. These were the first cannons cast in America. Col. Gridley, who had become the chief engineer of the American army, with a number of men proceeded to Massapoag Pond to prove the guns.

Capt. Nathaniel Curtis, son-in-law of the Rev. Philip Curtis, who had acquired some knowledge of gunnery in the French war with Col. Gridley, volunteered his assistance and accompanied the party. Previous to leaving the house he had deposited in a place of safety several bags of Spanish dollars, the proceeds of a cargo of fish which he had just sold in the West Indies. In the meanwhile an impostor rode through the town stating that the British had marched out of Boston, and were near at hand destroying everything in their track. Capt. Curtis returned home to find the family had fled to the woods, except the faithful negro, who had put out the fires, armed himself with a heavy club, and was determined, as he said, to defend the house. The bags of money he said were at the bottom of the well, and he pointed out the hiding-place of the family. These guns having proved satisfactory, were taken to Roxbury and then to Dorchester Heights.

The Col. Richard Gridley Company continued the manufacture of heavy guns during the war of the Revolution for the United States.

The second call for soldiers came on the 4th of March, 1776. In response to this order, the company of Capt. Edward Bridge Savels marched to Dorchester Hills. The following is the muster-roll:

The result of this expedition was the fortification of Dorchester Heights, which gave the Americans the control of the harbor and the town of Boston, and caused the evacuation of the town by the British army. Exasperated beyond measure by the daring of the patriots, whom they pretended to despise, they sought every means to be revenged. Among other dastardly acts, they burned the light-house on Castle Island. From the proximity of the vessels of the British army to the towns upon the coast, the inhabitants were apprehensive that they too might be attacked and their property destroyed or carried off. Therefore a third call was issued. To this call Capt. Savels, of Stoughtonham, promptly responded on the 22d of March, 1776. His company was now officered as follows:

Edward Bridge Savels, capt.	William Bradshaw, corp.
Royall Kollock, lieut.	Benjamin Hodges, corp.

Capt. Savels marched with his company for Quincy on the 22d day of March, 1776. History informs us that Lieut.-Col. Benjamin Tupper, a native of Sharon, in Gen. Ward's brigade, was ordered to take his men in whale-boats, with cannon, and fire upon the British vessels from Thompson's and Spectacle Islands. So vigorously did he play upon the vessels, that they were quite willing to weigh anchor and drop down to Nantasket Roads, beyond the reach of the guns of the American army. The object of the British having been effectually prevented, the soldiers returned home.

Three-Years' Men.—At a town-meeting held on the 3d day of March, 1777, it was voted to give each man who shall enlist into the service of the United States of America for the term of three years the sum of £13 6s. 8d., to be paid by the town at the time of their passing muster, and at the end of each year, for the term of three years, if the war continue so long.

Under this vote the following men were enlisted and received the bounty :

Lavet Billings.	Jonathan Hawes.
Samuel Brown.	William Hewins.
Ebenezer Capen, Jr.	Elkanah Hixson.
Jonathan Clark.	Cato Johnson.
William Everdean.	Benjamin Kingman.
Jacob French.	Zebina Lyon
Stephen Flood.	James Perigo.
David Forrest.	Samuel Tolman.
Josiah Farrington.	Jacob Wellman.
Moses Howard.	Benjamin Westley.
Simeon Howard.

The families of these men were supplied by the committee of the town with such necessary articles as contributed to their sustenance and comfort during the absence of the soldiers in the war.

Six- and Nine-Months' Men in the Revolution.—In the Third Suffolk Regiment, Col. Jacob Gill, of Canton, was Company 7, whose officers, Capt. Nathaniel Morse, Lieut. Benjamin Fairbanks, Lieut. Ezra Morse, were of Stoughtonham, as were the following men. They were not all in Capt. Morse's company, but most of them did duty out of the State, at Fishkill or Claverack, on the Hudson River. The General Court paid these soldiers two shillings per mile as travel fees, the distance computed at two hundred and ten miles.

Mr. Job Swift represented the district in the Provincial Congress during one hundred days, for which he was paid eighteen pounds.

The district paid first requisition of beef, 7210 pounds, £10,815; second requisition of beef, 14,845 pounds, £20,764. Total, £31,579. Stoughtonham was required to furnish the support of thirty-one poor persons who left Boston during the siege. Also the district furnished 42 shirts, 42 pairs stockings, and 42 pairs of shoes for the soldiers in the army.

After the close of the war the soldiers returned home to their families poor, with little or no money. The taxes were heavy and their burdens hard to bear. Many who were able sought relief in immigration, and no doubt they prospered in the change.

Store.—The first store was opened in Stoughtonham about 1750 by Benjamin Hewins, Esq., near the residence of his great-grandson, Mr. Lyman Hewins. Many of his account-books are now in existence, and are remarkable for the clearness and beauty of the penmanship, as well as for the fact that there is no record of the sale of spirituous liquors upon its pages.

Negroes.—It is from these account-books and other sources that it is learned that the following negroes were held as servants: Rev. Philip Curtis had Scipio; Joseph Everett, Cato; Samuel Cumings, Caesar; Edmund Quiney, Jr., Cuffe; Benjamin Randall, Boston, who is still remembered by the older members of the community, although he died more than fifty years ago. He was very punctual in his attendance upon the meetings on the Sabbath, and outlived his master, who left a maintenance for Boston during his lifetime. Cato Johnson was probably a negro who served three years in the Continental army, and afterwards was cared for and supported by the town.

Civil History.—The enabling act, authorizing all districts in the province of Massachusetts Bay to become towns by a general law, was passed on the 23d of August, 1775. Stoughtonham became a town on that day, but it was nearly six months before the record of the clerk incidentally notices this fact. The question naturally arises, Why was this long circuit of measures required before the people could enjoy their rights and privileges?

It will be seen, as a precinct they only had the privilege of meeting together on the Sabbath and supporting public worship; as a district, they were to be vested "with all the powers, privileges, and immunities which any town do have, or by law ought to enjoy." Still the fact is apparent that the English government preferred to have good dependents rather than good lawmakers. The laws passed by the province were to be revised in England, and approved, before they became the law of the land here.

Now the first thing, almost, to be done after the declaration of independence was to invest the districts with their natural rights by making them independent corporate bodies or towns.

After Stoughtonham became a town the people voted to have the General Court change its name to Washington, but there is no account of any further action on this subject.

On the 10th of June, 1778, the south part of the town of Stoughtonham was set off and incorporated as a town by the name of Foxboro'.

It will be seen by the following act that the name of Stoughtonham is changed to the beautiful scriptural name of Sharon :

"COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

"In the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three.

"AN ACT for discontinuing the name of a town in the County of Suffolk incorporated by the name of Stoughtonham, and calling the same SHARON.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives in General Court assembled, and by the authority of the same, That the said town of Stoughtonham shall no longer bear that name, but henceforth shall be called and known by the name of Sharon, the aforesaid incorporating act notwithstanding. And all officers in said town shall hold and exercise their respective offices in the same manner as they would have done had not the name of said town been altered.

"In the House of Representatives, Feb. 24, 1783.

"This bill having had three several readings, passed to be enacted.

"TRISTRAM DALTON, Speaker.

"In Senate, Feb. 25, 1783.

"This bill having had three several readings, passed to be enacted.

"SAMUEL ADAMS, President.

"Approved.

"JOHN HANCOCK."

The Rev. Philip Curtis was born in Roxbury, Oct. 4, 1717. He entered Harvard College in 1734, and took his degree in 1738. He was admitted to church-fellowship, and studied divinity with Rev. Dr. Bowman, of Dorchester, where he taught school. He preached his first sermon in Sharon in May, 1741, and was ordained to the ministry Jan. 5, 1742. His salary was £60 13s. 6d. a year, with the use of the ministerial meadow and wood from the precinct woodlot. He married, in 1744, Elizabeth Bass, of Dorchester, by whom he had six children. His son Samuel taught school, and graduated at Harvard College in 1766; studied medicine, and was a surgeon on board a privateer during the Revolution. His wife, Elizabeth, died May 24, 1752, aged thirty-two years. On Oct. 31, 1754, he married Elizabeth Randall, of Sharon, and by this marriage he had five sons.

It was now 1787, and the faithful pastor and the meeting-house had grown old together. Having seen more than a half-century's service, the people concluded to build a new meeting-house. The pastor gave them an acre more land and relinquished a portion of his salary to encourage them.

The new meeting-house was erected in 1787. Joseph Hewins, Esq., procured a bell in London, which was placed in the tower in 1790, at a cost of sixty-two pounds. This bell became broken, and a new bell was cast at Canton, which replaced the old bell in 1809.

Mr. Curtis' sight was remarkably clear, as he never used glasses, and he preached until within a few months of his death.

His last affectionate tribute of respect for his people was in the following impressive words :

"SHARON, 2d October, 1797.

"FRIENDS AND BRETHREN :

"I hereby signify that I release you from all lawful claims upon me, after the completion of last year's salary, relying on your charity and generosity should I hereafter stand in need.

"I remain your Aged Pastor and Friend in Christ,

"PHILIP CURTIS."

His death occurred Nov. 22, 1797, in his eighty-first year. During the fifty-five years of his ministry Mr. Curtis baptized nine hundred and twenty-six persons, and married three hundred and fifteen couples. There were four hundred and three deaths in his parish, and two hundred and sixty-four were added to the church.

Mrs. Elizabeth Curtis, his last wife, died March 11, 1823, at the advanced age of ninety-one years.

At a meeting held Dec. 17, 1798, it was "Voted, to concur with the church in giving Mr. Jonathan Whitaker a call to the pastoral care of this church and congregation.

"Voted, that a committee of nineteen be chosen to take into consideration what sum will be proper to propose to him for his settlement and annual salary."

The committee reported as follows, which was voted by the town: "To give seven hundred and fifty dollars as a settlement to Mr. Jonathan Whitaker, provided he takes upon him the charge of the church and congregation in Sharon, as a gospel minister; which sum, in case he should leave the people in said capacity without their consent, to be refunded to the town without interest.

"Voted to pay him semi-annually one hundred and sixty-six dollars and sixty-six and a half cents, as a salary, as long as he remains their minister."

Mr. Whitaker in open town-meeting accepted the invitation, and was ordained Feb. 27, 1799.

Never had there been a more auspicious settlement in Sharon. The church was crowded with hearers, and new pews were added in that already capacious meeting-house.

Mr. Whitaker secured the house and estate of his predecessor in the ministry. He also taught school, and entered into plans for the general interest of the town. He was highly appreciated by his people, and it was not until political and sectarian questions came up in after-years that there began to be differences of opinion in regard to his usefulness as a public minister. Mr. Whitaker held to the old Puritan way of his predecessor of baptizing children, and when in after-years they desired to live in a closer communion with God, they were confirmed upon assenting to the covenant, and became members of the church.

Mr. Whitaker had now been the only preacher in town for many years when the first Baptist meetings began to be held in this town, and he was no Laban, to say to the itinerant, "Abide in my household," or to take the innovator into his field of labor. It is not necessary to discuss those questions of a past age; the actors have long since closed up their record and gone to their reward. Suffice it to say, that things continued to grow more unpleasant between pastor and people, until finally a council was held, and such grievances as the people labored under were submitted to and decided by the council, which advised, on account of the bad feeling existing between the pastor and his people, that the connection be dissolved. This result was secured by the society paying Mr. Whitaker five hundred dollars, April, 1816. This religious and political controversy in the town did not cease with the withdrawal of Mr. Whitaker, but continued to be exceedingly bitter and relentless for several years.

The third minister of the First Congregational Church and society was the Rev. Thomas Rich, settled in 1817. He could not have continued many years, as the Rev. Samuel Brimblecom succeeded to the pastorate of the society Dec. 3, 1821, and continued in office until March 13, 1826.

After this time the pulpit was supplied by different ministers until the Rev. Jacob Norton was settled, in 1829. He preached about two years, when the pulpit was supplied for short intervals by different preachers until 1842, when the old church built in the year 1787 was taken down and the present church erected.

The following are two stanzas from a poem written at that time and occasion by Jeremiah Gould, Esq.:

"That old familiar desk,
Whose glory and renown
Is spread from east to west,
And wouldst thou take it down?
Workman, forbear thy blows,
Rend not its oaken ties,
Oh! spare that ancient house,
Now towering to the skies.

"When but a little boy
I trod its sacred shade,
In thankfulness and joy
There I oft have played.
My mother led me there,
My father pressed my hand,
Forgive this foolish tear,
But let that old house stand."

The Rev. Samuel Pettes, Jr., became pastor Oct. 16, 1843, and continued to officiate in that capacity until March 18, 1847.

The Rev. James L. Stone succeeded the former pastor on Jan. 1, 1848, and continued in office until May 5, 1852.

The Rev. Thomas H. Pons was settled July 3, 1852, and continued until Oct. 1, 1853.

In June, 1854, Rev. Norwood Damon occupied the pastoral office, continuing until July 9, 1856.

From Jan. 1, 1857, to Jan. 1, 1862, the Rev. Charles C. Sewall, of Medfield, supplied the preaching. From this time there was no regular preaching until Jan. 4, 1868, when the Rev. George W. Stacy, of Milford, supplied the pulpit. Mr. Stacy's labors ceased on May 2, 1870. The Rev. Mr. Tyndall supplied the pulpit until September, 1870. After 1870 the church was supplied by candidates.

In April, 1873, the Rev. John Wills preached for several Sabbaths, and for several months in the summer the Rev. William H. Savary, of Canton, preached.

In 1878, Rev. W. G. Todd preached through the summer months. From this time there was no regular preaching until the Rev. William O. White, of Brookline, officiated as pastor from September, 1881, until September, 1883.

The Rev. C. C. Carpenter supplied the pulpit until January, 1884.

The Baptist Society.—The first meetings were held at the houses of Mr. Leavitt Hewins and Mr. Joshua Whittmore by the Rev. Mr. Gammell, of Medfield. Soon an interest was created, and many flocked to hear him preach. The first baptism took place at Billings' Pond in 1812, when Joshua Whittemore and Leavitt Hewins were baptized.

The Baptist society was formed in 1813, when Jeremiah Richards was chosen treasurer. On Oct. 26, 1814, the church was organized, and numbered twenty-six members. The first deacons were Joshua Whittemore and Leavitt Hewins. Barnabas D. Capen was elected in 1845, and Charles D. Hixon in 1877.

In the early days of its existence the society held its meetings in the hall of the parsonage.

The Rev. Mr. Gammell was succeeded by the Rev. Henry Kendall, from Maine. In the year 1818, Samuel Wait was ordained as pastor, and he continued in office four years, when he was succeeded by Rev. Thomas Barrett, who preached about two years. Then, in 1823, Rev. Thomas Le Favour preached one year.

In August, 1831, the Rev. Caleb Green was settled. As the numbers had increased it was thought advisable to erect a church, which was built in 1833. The next pastor was the Rev. Thomas Driver. In April, 1835, the Rev. Silas Hall filled the pastorate. He was succeeded by Rev. George N. Wait. In the year 1841, Edward G. Sears was elected pastor and continued in office until 1843, when he was succeeded by Rev. George W. Patch. He in turn resigned, and the Rev. Alfred Colburn took his place.

The Rev. Mylon Merriam became pastor in 1853, and closed his labors in 1858.

Rev. Freeman B. Ashley succeeded Mr. Merriam in 1859. This pastor was popular, and the congregation increased in numbers, and it was thought best to enlarge the meeting-house by giving room for sixteen additional pews.

In 1864, Mr. Ashley resigned his office as pastor, and the pulpit was occupied by Mr. Tozier, who preached one year.

The Rev. Benjamin A. Edwards was settled in 1865, and continued as pastor until 1872, when the Rev. Lyman Partridge accepted the pastorate and continued to preach until 1882. "During all these years," says Mr. Partridge in a printed discourse from which these statistics are mainly taken, "we have labored together in harmony, while my relations to the people of the town have each year become pleasanter and more intimate. I count it a privilege and blessing to be able to make this last statement so near the close of a pastorate of almost ten years."

Mr. Partridge is now settled at Westminster, Mass. He was succeeded in 1883 by the Rev. Irving B. Mower, the present pastor.

The Christian Society (Trinitarian).—At a meeting held at the house of Mr. Philip Curtis, it was voted that a committee be chosen to take measures for forming a new society. Deacon Joel Hewins, Deacon Benjamin Fairbanks, and Lemuel D. Hewins were chosen, and at a subsequent meeting made the following report:

"The practice of the primitive Christians, introduced into this country by our pious ancestors, for churches to take the lead in the settlement of their pastors, is, we believe, scriptural, rational, and salutary; and a departure from this practice so long preserved in this country, has doubtless been the principal cause of the unhappy difficulties now existing between this church and the Congregationalist society in this place; and this church having borne, as long as forbearance is conceived to be a duty, and seeing no prospect of a restoration of harmony between them and the society, deem it necessary and expedient to withdraw from said society, that they may independently of any body of men whatever enjoy the ordinances of religion agreeably to the practice of the primitive churches, and the sentiment of this church.

"Wherefore this church do hereby constitute themselves into a religious society, to be called and known by the name of the 'Christian Society in Sharon.' That in addition to the officers of the church, there shall annually be chosen by the church a clerk and treasurer, and also a committee of three persons to procure preaching and give certificates of membership to all who may wish to unite with this church for the support of public worship, agreeably to a law of this commonwealth, passed June 18, 1811, and generally to manage the prudential concerns of this society."

It was voted to accept the report June 16, 1821. The Rev. Joseph B. Felt was invited to become pastor of this church and society, which invitation he accepted, and he continued in office until 1825.

In 1822 the society built their meeting-house. The next minister was the Rev. Jonathan Curtis, who was installed in October, 1825, and continued in office until the year 1834, when he requested to be released from the pastoral office, which was granted by the society.

The Rev. Jacob Cummings was settled as pastor, and continued in office until 1837. In the year 1835 this church received the legacy, bequeathed by Mrs. Nancy Gould, of the parsonage of the former ministers of Sharon.

Rev. Lucius R. Eastman was the next pastor in 1838, and on November 28th of that year the church took fire from the stove on Sunday morning, and was totally destroyed.

In the summer of 1839 the present house was erected, and Mr. Eastman closed his labors with this church and society in 1840.

In 1841 the Rev. Lebbeus R. Phillips was settled as pastor. This was one of the most successful pastorates enjoyed by the society, and was terminated by the request of Mr. Phillips in 1860. The Rev. Perley B. Davis succeeded Mr. Phillips, Jan. 29, 1862, and continued in office until April 8, 1867, when he was dismissed at his own request. He afterwards settled in Hyde Park, where he still preaches.

Rev. S. Ingersol Briant was settled April 22, 1868, and continued in office until April, 1874, when he resigned. He was succeeded by the Rev. Henry C. Weston, who was born in Charlestown, Mass., May 9, 1844. After leaving the high school he entered Amherst College, where he graduated in the year 1866. He entered Andover in the class of the same year, and afterwards preached at North Bennington, Vt. While here he married Clara A. Loring, of Chelsea, Aug. 18, 1870. He was settled at Sharon, Sept. 2, 1874. An excellent preacher, eminently social in his character and his relations with his people, a world of usefulness seemed to open before him. He early became interested in the schools as a committee, and he also served the town as superintendent of schools. But this continued but a short time. His health soon became impaired and he was obliged to abandon his labors, not only as superintendent but also as pastor of his church and society. His interest in the labors he had chosen never ceased, although it became evident that there was little hope of his recovery. He died Feb. 24, 1883, rejoicing in the hope of a glorious immortality, and leaving many sorrowing friends to lament his early departure. Mrs. Weston and three children remain in Sharon.

The Rev. Edward G. Smith, who supplied the pulpit for some time before the death of Mr. Weston, is now pastor of the Christian society.

The Catholic Chapel on Pond Street has a mission service, and is connected with the church at Stoughton of the same denomination.

The Bay Street Chapel (Evangelical) is located in the southeast part of Sharon, on the Bay road, near Easton.

The Methodist Church was organized in 1876, but has no regular preaching.

Physicians.—How great is the influence of the medical profession over the individuals in the community. The patient who recovers from a serious malady is ever likely to retain lively emotions of gratitude towards the man who has rescued him from a bed of sickness, pain, or death.

Dr. Samuel Hewins was born in this town, Aug. 31, 1734. He married, in 1760, Sarah, the daughter of Dr. Nathaniel White, of Weymouth, his instructor. He settled in Sharon near the trowel-works. He was an active and useful man, brought up a family, and died in 1827.

Dr. Elijah Hewins, born May 23, 1747, studied medicine with Dr. Young, of Boston. He was surgeon in Col. Jacob Gill's regiment in the Revolution. He bought the place now occupied by Mr. Increase Hewins, where, after his marriage with Lois Whiting, of Wrentham, his children were born. His wife died in 1795, and afterwards he married Irene Balch, of Dedham. After the marriage of his son, Elijah Hewins, Esq., scribe and surveyor, the doctor sold his place and resided with his son much of the time until his death, which occurred May 21, 1827.

Dr. Samuel Capen, born in this town May 20, 1757, studied medicine with Dr. Samuel Hewins, and finished his course of study at Randolph. He married, Nov. 18, 1792, Sarah Savels, of this town, and resided east of Massapoag, where his children were born. After his daughter Sarah married he left Sharon, and resided in Brockton, where he died Dec. 13, 1843, aged eighty-seven years.

Dr. Daniel Stone was born in Framingham, and graduated from Harvard University in the class of 1797. He then studied medicine with Dr. Willard, of Uxbridge, and practiced some time, when he afterwards came to Sharon. He boarded for a time with the Rev. Mr. Whitaker, who was his classmate in college. Afterwards he built the house now occupied by the Rev. A. P. Chute. Here he resided during his life. He was town clerk in 1819, and filled many offices in the town; was a respected member of the Massachusetts Medical Society. He died in August, 1842. There are but two of his children living,—Albert Stone, Esq., of Elgin, Ill., and Dr. Charles Stone, of Marysville, Cal.

Dr. Norton Quincy Tirrell succeeded Dr. Stone in Sharon. Dr. Tirrell was born in Weymouth in 1817. At an early age he was by the death of his father thrown upon his own resources. By his industry he managed to acquire the means to attend the academy at Willbraham, Woburn, and Gilmanton, N. H., where he finished his early school days. He then went to New York, and from there to Norfolk, Va. Here he taught school and studied medicine; afterwards he attended lectures at Washington, D. C., where he graduated. He was married in 1842, and the same year located in Sharon. Here he was highly esteemed as a physician and townsman, and an active member of the Christian Church and society. In 1852 he left Sharon for his native town, where he enjoyed a highly successful and lucrative practice. He died on Oct. 19, 1882.

Dr. Amasa D. Bacon was a physician of experience when he came to this town and succeeded to the estate and practice of Dr. Tirrell. Naturally a man of more than ordinary force of character, he was tender and assiduous in the care of his patients, kind and obliging as a neighbor, an active citizen of the town and the Christian society. He represented the town in the Legislature and on the board of school committee. Well posted in the advancement of medical science, he was an honored member of the Massachusetts Medical Society. He rode more to see patients during the last winter of his life than any winter before. His sickness, caused by exposure and other causes, terminated fatally on March 28, 1881, in the seventy-sixth year of his age. He had by his first wife, Clara Choate Bacon, two sons; by his last wife, Nellie Choate Bacon, one daughter.

Dr. John Smithwick, of Williams College and Pittsfield Medical Institution, is the present resident physician.

Soldiers in the War of 1812.—Although the people of New England were not generally in sympathy with the war of 1812, yet Sharon contributed her share of the State's quota, as the following names will show:

Amos Barden.	Ziba Plympton.
Ebenezer Capen.	Aaron Platt.
Theodore Drake.	James Packard.
Ellis Drake.	Ebenezer Packard.
John Delano.	Jedediah Packard.
Samuel Gilbert.	James Packard, Jr.
Charles Gay.	Linus Rogers.
Ebenezer Henshaw.	Jedediah Snow.
Joel Harlow.	Enoch Talbot.
Ellis Johnson.	Shepard Wood.
Matthew Johnson.	Zephaniah Washburn.
Samuel Mann

A part of these soldiers went to the lakes, near Canada, and others were stationed at Boston Harbor.

Schools.—Coeval with the religious and secular polity of the town was the appropriation of lands for the support of public schools and for the instruction of youth. These privileges were so highly prized and enjoyed by the youth of the early days, that in after-years, when they became the actors upon the stage of life, they resolved these benefits should not only be continued, but they should be increased beyond what they had enjoyed.

The following letter gives the origin of the Sharon Friends' school fund:

"To the Inhabitants of the Town of Sharon:

"GENTLEMEN,—The undersigned being a committee from the subscribers to the Sharon Friends' School Fund, have the pleasure to present to you a subscription paper for the purpose of beginning a fund for the education of the youth of your Town. . . . It is with pleasure we look back and remember the Land of our Fathers,—the place of Our Birth.

"Believing as we do, that to give the present and future generations a good, sound, practical education is the surest means of preserving our most valuable privileges, both civil and religious, which we consider to be far greater than any other nation enjoys. If this be the fact, how can money be better appropriated? . . .

"This fund is now begun with a hope and expectation that it will be increased, so that every child in your town will have an opportunity to acquire a good practical education, and that it may be the means of increasing Education, Peace, Harmony, and the good feelings of every inhabitant of your place. . . .

"This is offered as a token of remembrance of the place of our nativity, with our best wishes for your peace, your prosperity, and your happiness as a town and individually.

"We are Respectfully yours,

The town's appropriation was never to be lessened on account of the fund. Still, many people felt the importance of a higher grade of study than that furnished by the public schools. This want was happily supplied by Sanford Waters Billings, A.M., of this town, and a graduate of Amherst College, who erected a school-house at his own expense, and gave instruction in the classical and higher mathematical studies. His school became popular, not only in this but in the neighboring towns, and for seventeen years Mr. Billings has devoted his time to the cause of education and the instruction of youth. When the needs of the town required the establishment of a high school, it was with the same generous feeling that actuated those noble benefactors of a former age, rather than the stern requirements of the law, which led to the establishment of the Sharon high school. This school is under the charge and instruction of Mr. Billings, whose services and devotion to the cause of education have a warm place in the hearts of his pupils and the people.

Public Library.—The town has a well-selected public library, which, although not so extensive, is highly appreciated and well patronized by the community.

The Press.—The Sharon Advocate is a lively weekly paper, edited by William B. Wickes, Esq., and is devoted mainly to the interest of Sharon in local and general news, and the elevation of the community in social, moral, and philanthropic matters.

The Post-Offices.—The first post-office was established at Cobb's Tavern, on the Bay road, July 1, 1819; the post-office at Sharon Centre about 1828. The name of the office at Cobb's Tavern was changed to East Sharon, June 3, 1841, the other office to Sharon on the same date.

The following are the representatives from Sharon to the Legislature:

1776-77. Capt. Ebenezer Tisdale.	1835. Ziba Plympton.
1778. Capt. Edward Bridge Savels.	1837. George H. Mann.
1779-80. Nathaniel Kingsbury.	1838-39. Jedediah Morse.
1782-83. Jonathan Eddy.	1840. Capt. Charles Ide.
1785-86. Joseph Hewins, Jr.	1842-43. Erastus Richards.
1787-89. Benjamin Randall.	1845-46. Otis Johnson.

Those years not designated this town did not send a representative.

While Sharon furnished her quota of soldiers during the war of the Rebellion, there were many patriotic citizens who contributed to the service a soldier from their own personal fortunes.

The Town Hall.—The style of this building is "old colonial," which appears to be peculiarly adapted to its rustic surroundings. The building is forty-five by seventy feet, and is seventy-six feet from the ground to the highest part of the cupola on the main building.

At the right hand, in front, is a circular tower two stories in height, surmounted by a weather vane.

The front doors open outward and give access to a vestibule eleven by fifteen feet. From this is a corridor which leads to a school-room thirty-eight by thirty-eight feet; previous to reaching this room there is a door that opens into a library-room, also into the reading-room adjoining. The first room on the left is the town clerk's office, eleven by eighteen feet, and has a brick vault for storing records. This vault is protected by double iron doors. The next one is the school committee room, eighteen by fourteen feet, and connected with this by folding doors is the recitation-room, twelve by eighteen. From this room is the vestibule, from the side door of the building into the school-room, and then the coat-rooms, with hooks, the passage to the basement stairs, and the stairs to the rear of the main hall.

The main stairway is on the right of the vestibule, and is, like the tower in which it is located, circular or spiral in its course. Under this stairway is an ample closet.

At the head of these stairs is a lobby twelve by sixteen feet, from which a balcony over the front door is reached by windows. There are ante-rooms, eight by twelve feet, and twelve by sixteen feet, on each side of the lobby.

The main auditorium takes up the remainder of this floor. This hall is forty-four by forty-five feet, with a stage thirteen feet deep and three and a half feet high. It is reached by steps on either end, and by stairs from the side entrance below.

On the wall in front of the stage is a handsome clock presented to the town by Elijah A. Morse, Esq., of Canton.

The hall is ventilated by a ventilator in the roof of the building, and the room is twenty-four feet high.

The outside of the building is shingled half-way down the sides and then treated with clapboards.

The finish inside the principal rooms is ash, as are the heavy mortised doors, and the floors are the best of Southern pine.

The building has an ornamental heavy base water-table, and is erected on a handsome foundation of Sharon granite by John Moyle. The contractors of the building are L. E. and T. L. Barlow, and the architect was Arthur H. Dodd, of Boston.

The building committee were J. M. Waston, A. B. Lovejoy, and C. C. Barney. The town hall was dedicated Feb. 21, 1884.

The Woman Soldier of the Revolution.—Deborah Sampson was born in Plympton, in this State, Dec. 17, 1760, and was a lineal descendant of William Bradford, for many years Governor of Plymouth Colony. In early life, owing to the peculiar circumstances of the family, she was put out in a family in Middleborough. Here she remained until she was eighteen years of age. Afterwards she taught school.

In April, 1781, she resolved to enter the Continental army. For this purpose she made a suit of men's clothes with her own hands, and at night put them on, and started for Taunton, in hopes some one would direct her to the army headquarters. In a few days, however, she reached New Bedford, where she proposed to ship on board a cruiser, but being informed of the captain's bad treatment of his men, she abandoned the design. She now resolved to make a tour of several towns in Norfolk County, and afterwards she enlisted into the service at Worcester for three years, as a resident of Uxbridge, under the name of Robert Shurtleiff. The muster-master was Eliphalet Thorp, of Dedham. On May 13th she arrived at West Point, on the Hudson, in company with fifty soldiers.

The march of ten days was very fatiguing to her, and at the close of a chilly, wet day, on approaching the fire, she fainted and fell on the floor. Upon recovery she found herself surrounded by kind spirits ministering to her relief. In the morning she crossed the river and was assigned for duty in Capt. Webb's company of Light Infantry, in Col. Shepard's regiment, Gen. Patterson's brigade. Here her garb was exchanged for a uniform peculiar to the infantry. She learned the manual exercise with facility. She was about five feet seven inches in height. Her features were regular, though they would not be called beautiful. Her eye was clear and penetrating, and ladies of taste called her handsome in her masculine attire. Her movement was erect and strong, gestures natural, mild, and graceful. Her first experience in actual warfare was in Capt. Webb's company on scout duty in the morning with a party of Dutch cavalry. The ground was warmly disputed for some time; at length, however, the infantry were obliged to give way, but they were quickly reinforced by the Second Massachusetts Regiment. The Americans having retired to their encampment, our fair soldier came near losing her life by drinking cold water. She said she underwent more from the heat and fatigue of the day than from the fear of being killed, although the man next her was killed by the second fire. While in this vicinity she was twice wounded, once by a sabre cut on the face, and again by a bullet wound in the groin; the wound in the face was healed by salves and plasters, but the wound in the groin she dressed herself, and endeavored to extract the ball herself rather than have her sex discovered. In this, however, she succeeded, and was soon able to be on duty again.

In August, after eleven days of excessive traveling, the forces under Washington and Lafayette encamped near Yorktown, Va. It is needless to mention the hardships the common soldiers must have undergone. Our heroine bore up with a good heart until the day on which the troops arrived, when she was much indisposed. On the morning of the 23d of September, Washington addressed his army, and she was near and heard his impressive words. Miss Sampson was among the advance of that day, and labored with blistered hands in the redoubt and trenches before Yorktown. She aided in storming the British redoubt under Lafayette on the 13th of October, 1783, and witnessed with patriotic exultation the closing drama of the Revolution. Her personal purity of character was in keeping with her bravery in action and duty. Such high qualities of firmness and resolution were, perhaps, never known. She came to her aunt's, who lived in Stoughton, where she labored through the winter. It is presumed that her uncle Waters confidentially whispered in the ear of some young man that she would make a good wife. However that may be, Deborah Sampson married Benjamin Gannett, at his father's house, April 7, 1784. There were born of this union one son and two daughters. By a resolve of the General Court of Massachusetts, Deborah received one hundred dollars and a monthly pension, as did her husband after her death, which occurred April 29, 1827. Her husband died Jan. 9, 1837. Her tombstone, in the quiet cemetery of Sharon, covers the remains of the bravest woman of the Revolution.

Gen. Benjamin Tupper.—Benjamin Tupper was born in Stoughton, now Sharon, on the 11th of March, 1738. He never knew a father's care and protection; a father's love never warmed and gladdened his heart, as his father died soon after he was born. When a boy he learned the trade of a tanner in Dorchester. Afterward, he served in several campaigns of the French and Indian war. Then he taught school several winters in Easton. While here he became acquainted with Huldah White, whom he married, Nov. 18, 1762.

He removed to Chesterfield soon after, which was at that time a frontier town. Here he became an active citizen and a deacon of the first church.

He joined the army at Roxbury, as captain of a company, soon after the Lexington alarm, and soon after was promoted to the office of major. He was ordered, with his men, to prevent the rebuilding of the light-house by the British in Boston Harbor.

Maj. Tupper marched his men to Dorchester, and there informed them that he was about to proceed down the harbor to drive the British troops off the island. "Now," said the major, addressing his company, which consisted of about three hundred men, "if there is any one of you who is afraid, and does not want to go with us, let him step two paces to the front;" and turning to the sergeant he said, sotto voce, "if any man steps two paces to the front, shoot him on the spot." It is needless to add that every man kept his position. The major, with his men, then proceeded from Dorchester, taking field-pieces with them in whale-boats down the Neponset River. They arrived at the light-house about two o'clock in the morning, attacked the guard, killing the officers and four privates. The remainder of the English troops were captured. Having demolished the light-house then in process of construction, the party were ready to embark, when the major himself was attacked by several of the enemy's boats; but with his field-piece he succeeded in sinking one of the boats, and, happily, escaped with the loss of one man killed and one wounded. He killed and captured fifty-three of the enemy, among whom were ten Tories, who were sent to Springfield jail. Washington, the next day in general orders, thanked Maj. Tupper, and the officers and men under his command, for their gallantry and soldier-like behaviour. We have given this incident to show the bravery of the man, as there were many other such incidents that might be given. He was appointed colonel of a Massachusetts regiment in 1776, was at Valley Forge camp in the memorable winter of 1778, and wrote a letter to the General Court of Massachusetts, setting forth in strong, earnest language the destitute condition of the troops. He had a horse shot under him at the battle of Monmouth. He served through the war, enjoying the confidence of Washington and Lafayette, and was promoted to the rank of general by brevet before the close of the war.

Gen. Tupper entered enthusiastically into the scheme of the settlement of the northwest territory. Being selected as one of the surveyors to lay out the ranges, he very early entered upon that work, but was prevented by the warlike disposition of the Indians. He, however, returned the next season, and the historic seven ranges were completed. Returning home again, at this time Shay's insurrection broke out, and he rendered valuable assistance. Then he assisted in the formation of the Ohio Company. His son, Maj. Anselm, was appointed a surveyor for the company, and with the band of pioneers left Massachusetts Jan. 1, 1788, and arrived at the Muskingum River April 7, 1788. Gen. Tupper started, as soon as he could build suitable wagons, with his family, passed over the Alleghany Mountains in Pennsylvania, and then sending his horses by land, took a boat and arrived with the first families, Aug. 19, 1788, at Marietta, after a journey of ten weeks. Soon after he was appointed one of the judges of the court, which office he held until his death, which occurred during the Indian war. On his monument, in the Mound Cemetery, is the following simple epitaph:

"General Benjamin Tupper, born at Sharon, Massachusetts, in 1738;
died June 7th, 1792, aged fifty-four."

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

GEORGE H. MANN.

George H. Mann was born in Medfield, Mass., Sept. 16, 1793, and was the fourth child of Rufus Mann and Sybil (Allen), his wife, and was in the fourth generation from the Rev. Samuel Mann, the first of the name born in Massachusetts. Having a desire to learn mechanism, he was apprenticed to Otis and Oliver Allen, of Mansfield, to learn framing and building. After serving his time with them, he contracted with parties in Greenwich, Conn., to work at machine-making, that he might perfect himself for the business which he had laid out for himself, the manufacture of cotton goods, and went there in the spring of 1814, and remained some two or three years. The first year of his service there those employed with him struck for higher wages and used every endeavor to have him join them, but he steadily refused. His employers finding him alone in the shop, asked him, "How happens it you are not out with your mates?" His reply was a characteristic one: "I intend to abide by my agreement with you." When the parties came to terms, his pay was made as good as the best. While here, at the call of the State authorities for volunteers to throw up intrenchments against the threatened invasion of the British, he joined the ranks, and with pick and shovel marched to the tune of "Yankee Doodle" to the service and helped man the works they constructed until the threatened invasion was over. From Greenwich he went to Medway Village and engaged in building cotton machinery, and was associated with John Blackburn, Oliver Dean, Dean Walker, and others. While residing there he became acquainted with Rhoda Fisher, and they were married May 10, 1820. From there he removed to East Walpole in 1822, and engaged in the manufacture of sheetings for the Neponset Manufacturing Company. There he remained until the spring of 1826, when he removed with his family to Amoskeag, N. H., where he put in operation what was known in later years as the old

Amoskeag factory for the Amoskeag Manufacturing Company. Not being able to make satisfactory arrangements with this company, at the end of his year he returned to Massachusetts with his family in the same conveyance that he took there, a horse and chaise. His family consisted of his wife and two boys. The same year of his return he entered into copartnership with Joshua Stetson, Jr., of Walpole, and started a small factory for the making of bed-ticking. He was anxious to establish himself independently of others, and after about two years he dissolved his connection with Mr. Stetson and removed to East Walpole, having leased the factory there. His services were sought by Messrs. Amos & Abbot Lawrence to take charge of the Elliot Mills in Newton about this time, but he preferred to establish himself in business where he could carry out his own ideas. In the spring of 1831 he purchased a mill-site and privilege in Sharon of Joseph W. Revere, and moved there with his family. Here he erected a factory and commenced the making of ticking, of which he made a specialty. He won a high reputation on that class of goods, continuing in that business until March 10, 1840, when his factory was destroyed by fire. He represented the town in the General Court in the session of 1838, and was president of the Harrison and Tyler Club during that lively and interesting campaign. He took an active interest in all things relating to the town in its intellectual and moral growth as well as its general prosperity. He was a man of quiet mien, but of positive convictions, and never hesitated to openly take a stand when occasion required. The last few years of his life he suffered from ill health and withdrew from active business, yielding it to his two sons. In the spring of 1847 he sought the benefit of a warmer climate, and in the summer returned to his home and died, October 25th, the same year.

It is believed that all persons of the name of Hewins in this country are descended from Jacob Hewins, who was admitted a freeman and joined the church in Dorchester in 1658. His son Jacob, born in 1668, settled in Sharon, and was an important and useful man and one of the elders of the church. His descendants are now living in many and distant places, from Maine to Illinois.

¹The following data concerning ancestry of Hewins family have been kindly furnished us by Mr. Charles A. Hewins, of Boston.

Geo H Mann

Whiting Huxins

Of Jacob Hewins nothing is yet known previous to his purchase of a house of Samuel Mason in Dorchester, 19th February, 1655-56. It has been supposed that he came from England, but when Mr. Amasa Hewins, the artist, was there in 1833, he made many inquiries, but could find no trace or record of the name. In 1871, however, his son, Mr. Charles A. Hewins, of West Roxbury, found the family name, Hewins, in Stratford-upon-Avon. There were several families of the name in the immediate vicinity and at Birmingham. Mr. Thomas Hewins, of Stratford-upon-Avon, since dead, was an organ builder and the organist of the beautiful and famous church in Stratford where Shakespeare is buried.

In the late work of Mr. Halliwell Phillips, who has spent the last thirty years in searching with great diligence for every fact and record connected with Shakespeare, we find the Hewins name in connection with the Shakespeare family. Shakespeare's mother was Mary Arden, the sixth daughter of Robert Arden. The eldest daughter, Agnes Arden, married, previous to 1556, her first husband, John Hewyns. This proves that the Hewins name has existed in the heart of England more than three centuries, and it appears probable that careful research might connect Jacob Hewins, the ancestor of the American branch, with a parent stock in Stratford.

My great grandmother, Ruth (Cummings) Hewins, died in 1833, aged ninety-six. I well remember her, and was at her funeral. She remembered Elder Joseph Hewins (born 1668, died 1755), and described him as a tall, spare, grand, and dignified man, who stood in the pulpit with the minister. Thus I have sat in the lap of one ancestor who knew one older one born two hundred and sixteen years ago. This covers seven generations.

WHITING HEWINS.

Whiting Hewins was descended in a direct line from Jacob Hewins, who about the middle of the seventeenth century came to New England and settled in Boston. He purchased about 1656, from Samuel Mason, a dwelling-house and three acres of land in Dorchester. This he made his homestead. He was, it appears, a man of much thrift and energy, coupled with business sagacity, as is evidenced by the fact that he added from time to time to his landed possessions various lots and tracts of land, and became before his death one of the largest real-estate holders in that section. Some of his acres are said to be still in possession of his descendants. He was held in much respect by the early colonists, as was shown by the large cortège attending his funeral. His wife was named Mary. They had seven children, of whom Joseph, born in 1668, was sixth. It appears from records that he settled on the farm of one hundred and twenty-three acres assigned to his father in 1698, and located in that part of Dorchester, now North Sharon, near Pigeon Swamp. He was one of the leading spirits of his day. He was fence-viewer in Dorchester in 1715-16, tithingman in 1722-23, and selectman in 1724-25. The town was then divided and he thrown into Stoughton. At the first election for town officers in the new town he was chosen selectman and assessor, and re-elected in March following. In 1728-29 he was first selectman, town clerk, and assessor. In 1730-31 he was town clerk and treasurer, and in 1738 served for the last time as selectman. He repeatedly acted as moderator of town-meetings. He was deacon and ruling elder of the now Unitarian Church at Canton, and frequently served as moderator, etc. He was tall and erect of stature, and of dignified bearing. He married, 1690, Mehetabel Lyon, daughter of Peter Lyon, of Dorchester. They had seven children. He died in 1755; his wife in 1733. His son, Lieut. Ebenezer, was born in 1707, and was the youngest of his father's family. He settled in Stoughton, where he was constable in 1737, agent for the town in 1750, and selectman in 1751. He married Judith Porter, of Norton, 1730. They had ten children. He died in 1751, and Mrs. Hewins in 1755. Lieut. Enoch was the sixth child of Lieut. Ebenezer. He was distinguished for his patriotism; he was the first man in his town to enlist in the Continental army; he enlisted as a private soldier, but obtained the rank of lieutenant. He was sealer of weights and measures in the town of Sharon for a period of twenty years. He married, 1766, Sarah, daughter of Benjamin and Sarah (Bacon) Hewins. They had a family of thirteen children. He died in 1821, his wife in 1803, having resided all their lives in Sharon.

WHITING HEWINS, born Aug. 13, 1789, was the youngest of the thirteen children. He was brought up on the farm in Sharon, and received such instruction as the common schools of his town afforded, and in addition the benefits of a short attendance at Framingham Academy. His constitution not being of that robust character calculated to endure the hardships and toil incident to a farm life in New England, he came to Boston when a young man and engaged as clerk in a store devoted to the sale of West India goods. He remained here a few years until he had thoroughly familiarized himself with the details of the business. He then, in company with other parties, embarked in trade for himself, continuing with this partner but a short time, however; when, in copartnership with Warren Fisher, he opened a store in the same line of trade at South End, Boston. The young men were energetic, enterprising, and intelligent, and they succeeded in their enterprise. Boston was growing, and, as is the case in all growing cities, the "trade centre" gradually changed; so, following the tide of business emigration, they removed their quarters, and opened a store on State Street. After some years of successful venture in West India goods, they changed the nature of their traffic and began dealing exclusively and extensively in sperm oil. To facilitate matters they fitted out a number of vessels for the whale-fishery, and established a manufactory or refinery for making whale-oil at Edgartown, Dr. Daniel Fisher, a brother of Warren Fisher, having charge of this branch of the business. The partnership of Messrs. Hewins & Fisher extended over a period of thirty years; and with such prudence, enterprise, and foresight were their various undertakings conducted, that at the end of that long period it was their proud boast that they had never failed, had always paid all debts contracted, and owed no man a dollar. How very, very few of the great army of active business men can say the same! Some years prior to his death, having accumulated a handsome competence for that time, Mr. Hewins retired from active business pursuits. He married, in 1817, Olive, daughter of Lemuel and Hannah (Belcher) Eastey, of Sharon. They had three children,—Olive Eastey, George Whiting, and Horace Holley. Of these, the two sons grew up to manhood, but died unmarried. The daughter, Olive E., married Isaac Hayden, a manufacturer and inventor. They reside in Boston.

Mr. Hewins was a very genial, warm-hearted man; a conservative, honest, safe business man; a man upon whose word the strictest reliance could always be placed, and whose judgment and counsel could be confided in with safety. In politics he was a Whig, and was a great admirer and enthusiastic supporter of New England's great statesman, Daniel Webster. He died Aug. 16, 1855. Mrs. Hewins, July 30, 1867.

MOSES RICHARDS.

The first American ancestor of Moses Richards was Edward Richards, who—from the most authentic data obtainable—came to America in the ship "Lyon" (1632), and resided at Cambridge until about 1636. He became one of the proprietors of Dedham, 1636–37, and was the sixty-second signer of her "social compact;" was chosen selectman, 1646, and served nine years. He married Susan Hunting, Sept. 10, 1638, and both he and his wife died in 1684. They had five children, two sons and three daughters. Nathaniel, the second son and fourth child, was born Nov. 25, 1648. He inherited his father's homestead in Dedham and a large share of his lands, which were extensive. He was a man of high standing in the community. He married, in 1678, Mary Aldis, by whom he had eight children, five sons and three daughters. He died in 1726–27. Jeremiah, the second son and child, was born in 1681, married Hannah Fisher, settled in West Roxbury, and became a large landed proprietor. He bore the title of captain. He lived to be over seventy years of age, but no record is found of the exact date of his death. He had eight children, of whom William was second, born in 1707. He married, 1733, Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas and Sarah (Pike) Baker, of Roxbury, and settled on lands given him by his father at Pigeon Swamp, in north part of Sharon, about 1734. These lands are still in possession of the family, and the house in which he lived is now occupied by his great-grandchildren. These descendants have a number of heirlooms which have been handed down from this ancestor, among which are his spear, and his commission as an officer under King George II. This commission bears date Sept. 25, 1751, and is signed by Spencer Phips, Commander-in-Chief and Lieutenant-Governor of the Colony of Massachusetts Bay. He had six children, the youngest of whom was Ebenezer, who was born Feb. 27, 1744–45, and died July 6, 1811.

William died in 1797, in his ninetieth year. Ebenezer married, Oct. 6, 1769, Elizabeth Lyon, daughter of Benjamin and Ann (Dwight) Lyon, of Roxbury. He was by occupation a carpenter and farmer, and was a much respected citizen of Sharon. He had a family of eight children, of whom the elder was Moses, whose portrait accompanies this sketch. Moses was born at the old homestead in Sharon, July 27, 1770. He was brought up on the farm, and his life was spent in that avocation. He had the usual common-school education, nothing more; but he was a man of strong intellect, and physically was of splendid appearance, large, commanding, strong, very energetic and active. After he was eighty-four years old, he on one occasion hoed two thousand one hundred hills of corn and walked to Canton—two miles distant—and back in one day.

He married, Nov. 24, 1799, Esther Hodges, daughter of Benjamin Hodges. They had seven children,—Esther (1), born Sept. 19, 1800; married James Smith, of Stoughton; died April 10, 1882; had one child, Erastus. Moses (2), born Sept. 6, 1802; married Mary H. Sumner. Betsey (3), born Nov. 19, 1804; died Jan. 1, 1877, unmarried. Nancy (4), born March 1, 1807; married John F. Randall. William (5), born June 2, 1810; resides at the old homestead in Sharon; is unmarried. Amy (6), born Nov. 24, 1812; married Seth Pettee, of Boston; died Feb. 18, 1840. Olive (7), born Aug. 5, 1818; she resides with her brother William at the old home, and has never married. She has always taken much interest in matters pertaining to the family history, and rendered very valuable assistance in the preparation of the very elaborate "History of Richards Family," which was published in 1861 by Rev. Abner Morse. Moses Richards was a Unitarian in religious faith, and in politics a Whig. He was a very unobtrusive man, and could never be prevailed upon to offer himself for office.

Moses Richardson

Warren Tulbot

Warner M. Holmes

Probably no man in Sharon was more universally respected. He belonged to that class of sturdy, honest yeomanry in whom are deeply grounded the principles of honor, equal rights, and freedom, and in whose keeping the sacred trust of political and religious liberty confided by our fathers may safely rest. He preserved in a remarkable degree all his faculties to the time of his death, which occurred March 15, 1857.

WARREN TALBOT.

Warren Talbot was born June 15, 1798, in Sharon, Mass. He was descended from two of New England's old and honorable families. His father, Deacon Josiah Talbot, was born in Stoughton, Mass., and when a lad removed to Sharon, where, when he grew to manhood, he married Susanna, daughter of Nathaniel Morse, one of the early settlers of Sharon, and who was a native of South Dedham.

Warren Talbot's youth was spent, like the sons of most farmers of that period, attending school a few months during the year, and working on the farm the remainder of the time. He chose farming as his life's work, and occupied the same spot whereon he was born. On Nov. 6, 1828, he married Esther A., daughter of Daniel and Nabby Hodges. They had four children,—Warren A., born Dec. 13, 1829; married Angenette Stone, and has two sons, and is now a floriculturist in Norwood, Mass. Edwin (1), born March 17, 1831, died Aug. 15, 1832. Edwin (2), born May, 1833. Hervey, born Aug. 2, 1842, and died in infancy. Mrs. Talbot died Aug. 6, 1842, aged thirty-four years.

Mr. Talbot married, as his second wife, Hannah, daughter of Benjamin Holmes (see Warren Holmes' biography). Their children were Hannah Esther (died in infancy), Etta F. (now resides in Newburyport), and Sarah Emma (died in infancy).

Warren Talbot lived the quiet, retired life of a farmer, and while he never sought or obtained office, or took an active part in public affairs, yet he was not wanting in public spirit, and was as benevolent as his means would allow. He was a very energetic and industrious man, one who attended strictly to his own affairs, and meddled with no other person's. He was conservative in his ideas, and was a Unitarian in religious belief. He lived far beyond the threescore and ten years allotted as the span of life, and was prepared and resigned when the hour and the summons came for him to pass to the other shore. He died Aug. 13, 1882.

WARREN M. HOLMES.

Warren M. Holmes was born in Sharon, Mass., Nov. 12, 1810. He is the son of Benjamin and Sarah (Morse) Holmes, and grandson of Zebulon and Abigail (Sable) Holmes. This Zebulon was a soldier in the war of the Revolution, and was a native of Stoughton, but came from there to Sharon in the early settlement of that town. His children were Zebulon, born June 26, 1758; Abigail, born Jan. 11, 1760; Olive, born July 10, 1763; Olive (2), born Jan. 17, 1766; Jesse, born May 18, 1768; Benjamin, born Sept. 7, 1770; Mary, born Dec. 25, 1772.

Benjamin married, Nov. 7, 1796, Martha Talbot. Their children were Lewis, born July 26, 1797; Benjamin, born May 16, 1799, died May 20, 1804. Mrs. Holmes died June 14, 1799. Benjamin married, as his second wife, Sally Morse, Feb. 11, 1802. Their children were Joseph; Martha, born Dec. 3, 1803; Benjamin (2), born Nov. 26, 1806; Warren M., born Nov. 12, 1810; Hannah, born Sept. 13, 1813. Benjamin Holmes died June 1, 1842. His wife, Sally, died in September, 1846.

Warren married Lydia Norris, Feb. 26, 1866. She died without issue. He married, as his second wife, Mrs. Eliza Sears, Dec. 15, 1872. They have no children. Mr. Holmes has been surveyor of highways more than thirty years. He is one of the quiet, unobtrusive yeomanry of Sharon.

LUTHER MORSE, OF DEDHAM, ROXBURY, AND SHARON.

The ancestry of Luther Morse is traced only in Massachusetts, and the first of the family in America was Samuel Morse, of Dedham, who was born in England in 1585, came to New England in 1635, and after about a year's residence at Watertown became one of the company of original settlers of the town of Dedham.

Samuel Morse was a Puritan, and as such was required to get a permit from the government before he could emigrate from England to America.

His wife, Elizabeth, and his son, Joseph, accompanied him, and six other children soon joined them in the new home.

John, the eldest of these, had a family of ten children, two of whom were probably born in England. He died at the age of forty-six.

The sixth child of John was named Ezra, which name was borne by the eldest son successively in this line until the seventh of the name, who died without issue.

The first Ezra, born 1643, died 1697, was but fourteen years old when his father died, but he possessed those conspicuous family traits,—good abilities, a strong will, great energy, and therefore self-reliance. His patrimony, about fifty pounds, was doubtless carefully husbanded for him, as we find him on attaining his majority joining two others in the purchase of a mill at Dedham. For some reason he sold out that interest within a year, but, with one partner, he was soon building another mill, and a dozen years later was largely extending his mill facilities in other parts of the town. A portion of this kind of his property continued in possession of his descendants for two hundred years or more.

He married Joanna Hoare, and, although we find but eight children of this union recorded in the "Memorial of the Morses," there is a tradition in the family that Joanna was but twelve years old when married, that she gave birth to twenty-four children, and that eighteen of them attained majority.

The second Ezra, born Jan. 28, 1671, died Oct. 17, 1760, was a captain of militia, and for a period of twenty-four years was deacon of the Second Church in Dedham. He attained the age of eighty-nine years, eight months, and nineteen days. He had four children, three of whom became heads of families.

The third Ezra, born Dec. 12, 1694, died Dec. 23, 1789, like his father became prominent as a military man. He received a commission as "Captain of the third foot company in Dedham in the first regiment of militia in the County of Suffolk, whereof Francis Brinley, Esqr., is Colonel." So reads the commission issued to him by "William Shirley, Esqr., Captain-General and Governour-in-Chief, in and over His Majesty's Province of the Massachusetts Bay in New England, &c." It bears that Governor's signature, and is dated March 3, 1745. In the same year Capt. Morse and his wife, Anna, were received into the church at Dedham. He died in 1789, as stated above, at the ripe age of ninety-five years and eleven days. Although he had but five children, there had been two hundred and sixty-two descendants born to him, of whom two hundred and sixteen survived him.

The fourth Ezra, born March 26, 1718, died June 14, 1755. At twenty-two years of age he married Bethia Lewis. At his death he left a widow with four children, to which number a daughter was added a few weeks later.

Col. Ezra Morse, the fifth to bear this full name, but the seventh generation of the line in New England, was born at Dedham, Sept. 17, 1741, and probably passed his minority in that town. In 1764 he was married to Susanna Guild, and in the same year paid a poll-tax in Sharon. The next year he paid taxes in that town on real and personal property, but probably sold out that year and removed to Dedham, which was his home during the next nine years or more. In 1775 he was again at Sharon, where the records show that Ensign Morse was one of a committee appointed, Feb. 23, 1775, in Sharon, to raise minute-men. He was styled Maj. Ezra Morse on the Sharon tax-lists of 1781, and Col. Ezra Morse in 1787. In 1764, he married Susanna Guild, by whom he had four sons and one daughter, viz., Ezra, Jr., Luther, Amos, Susanna, and Harford.

"He was distinguished for high-mindedness, patriotism, and combativeness. When the Continental army was organized he enlisted for the war, at the close of which he commanded a regiment, and, on the disbanding of the army, was entitled to precedence in marching from the field. This honor he exacted with cocked pistol of another colonel, who attempted to supersede him. On his return he settled upon a farm in Sharon, but his military habits continued through life, and the support denied him by the new government was mainly furnished by the industry of his sons. In his will he left his farm to his youngest son, Harford, for the maintenance of his widow." ["Memorial of the Morses:" by Abner Morse.]

The leading traits of the father's character were inherited by his sons, as also were the persevering industry and thrift which distinguished their mother. They were also endowed with strong constitutions and great power of endurance.

Luther Morse, of Dedham, Roxbury, and Sharon, the second son of Col. Ezra, was born at Dedham, Feb. 3, 1770.

The family removed to Sharon probably in 1775, and there the home of the parents continued as long as Col. Morse lived. During all that time the farm-work was done by the sons, who also obtained other employment at times, thus securing an income from which they accumulated some money for future needs or enterprises.

Luther performed his full share of the homestead labors, and continued to do so as long as he remained in Sharon.

On the 1st day of February, 1798, he was married to Mary, daughter of Zebulon and Abigail Holmes, of Sharon. The next day his brother Amos was married, and the two couples went, together, to Granby, Mass., where Amos had previously bought a farm. In March, Luther bought an undivided half of the farm, and the brothers carried it on for a time.

In April, 1801, we find he is a resident of Ludlow, and in November of that year he bought a farm, a part of which was on each side of the line between Granby and Ludlow; also a twenty-acre lot in Granby. He appears to have had a penchant for trading, and bought and sold both farms and outlying lots. But he did not neglect the cultivation of his lands, for he always seemed to have a surplus of various crops to sell, and rarely bought such things as could be raised on his farm.

A daughter was born to him in 1799, and in October, 1802, twins were added to the family. But the mother died, and one of the twins also. The surviving twin was a son, Luther Morse, Jr.

Dec. 8, 1803, Luther Morse married Miss Elizabeth Holmes, a younger sister of his first wife. She had been his housekeeper several months, and taken care of the children also. One fact about this wedding contract is well worth recording, viz., a solemn compact was made that if either became disturbed or incensed by the other, that other was to abstain from all retort or any other manifestation of irritated feeling; and it is a still more interesting fact that, during their long lives, no altercation between them was ever known to acquaintance, friend, or child, and yet both were persons of very strong feelings and strong wills, but also possessed of a strong sense of honor.

Some time in 1806-7, Luther and Amos Morse engaged in the manufacture of soap at Roxbury, and the family of Luther was removed from Ludlow to Sharon temporarily, but on Dec. 3, 1807, he bought a house and lot on Union (now Taber) Street, Roxbury, where the family was soon established, and there remained until 1836, except that during the war of 1812, when Boston was menaced by British war-ships, the children and their mother were at Sharon for a short time. But his investments at Ludlow and Granby were not disposed of at once, perhaps not for years. Indeed, he bought some seventy acres of land in Granby, probably as an investment, as late as 1821.

His brothers, Ezra and Lewis, were residing at Roxbury when he removed there, and his sister soon after married Timothy Gay, and located near them.

Their father, as before stated, died in 1807, and by his will left each of his elder children twenty dollars in money, but the rest of his estate, including his farm and whatever other property he left, was bequeathed to his youngest child, Harford, for the maintenance of his widow during the remainder of her life.

Harford was then about nineteen years old, and, being the youngest of the family, had been reared more tenderly than the elder children. He had not been put to work on the farm to an extent that qualified him to carry it on after it came into his hands. But he was a fair scholar, and had a natural bent for business, and a desire to be near and with his brother and sister. After a short trial of farming, he proposed to his brothers to turn in the farm as common stock, to be himself taught the business, and become a partner in their firm.

A satisfactory arrangement was made, and in time the firm-name appeared as Harford Morse & Co., of which, Luther, Harford, and Amos Morse were the members. Their factory was on Washington Street, on the lot adjoining the old burial-ground at the corner of Eustis Street. Their business was a growing one, and their trade extensive, they having customers in many of the States, and some foreign trade. A statement of accounts, including six months' transactions with a single firm at New Orleans, amounted to more than two thousand three hundred dollars. There were several cases where accounts were settled by receiving deeds of real estate, not only in Massachusetts, but also in other New England States.

In some cases they bought estates as investments when a good bargain was offered. As an instance, the Zeigler property, which had been converted into a public-house known as the Roxbury Hotel, and later, the City Hotel, at Roxbury, was bought by the firm in 1826, and held until the firm was dissolved by the death of Harford, in 1830, and when, in order to settle his estate, it was sold at auction in October, 1831. Luther and Amos Morse purchased it, and the former continued to hold a claim upon it until 1842-43.

The firm continued in business until 1829, when, in April, they sold the stock and tools on hand, and leased their works to Messrs. Ammon Rodgers and Benjamin F. Campbell for a term of five years.

From that time until 1836, Luther Morse was busy taking care of property of his own, and also of other property of which he was part owner. Beside this, he did some business as administrator upon estates.

In 1835, accompanied by his family, he spent several months in Sharon, and in the spring of 1836 removed there permanently, locating upon the old "Tom Randall Farm," situated about a mile from the village, on the road leading from Sharon to Foxboro', over Sharon Plain. This property, extending from Foxboro' road to Massapoag Pond, was a part of the original Randall purchase, and had been held by members of the Randall family from the first white owner down to that time, when it was in possession of Mr. Horatio Gates Ware, of Boston, a grandson of Benjamin Randall, Esq., builder of the present substantial and rather stately dwelling upon it, which was erected towards the end of the last century, but was renovated and furnished with the French roof and the piazza only a few years ago.

In 1842-43, Luther Morse—associated with his son Harvey—bought this estate, and there, in peaceful and comfortable retirement, he passed the remaining years of his life.

Mr. Morse was a man of rather stately presence, about six feet in height, somewhat portly, but exceedingly well-proportioned in figure, and of erect and dignified carriage. His features indicated the strength of character which distinguished the man. While his eyes were dark, he was not a dark-complexioned person. His hair was rather fine, very thick set, and stood out from his head as if to show the strong individuality of the wearer; but although it turned gray at an early date, it never grew thin in any part.

He enjoyed the pleasures of the table, and was what is called a liberal provider. His wife was his faithful supporter in all good works, and never failed to make his table command his approval. Their "Thanksgiving dinners" were feasts, including nearly all the standard dishes of the time, the turkey and plum pudding merely crowning the glory of the occasion.

Liberal to himself, he was equally so to his family, to his friends, and the community. He was ever ready to subscribe for the promotion of any good work, or to assist in defeating any project which he believed to be wrong.

While he was living at Roxbury, a movement was started at Sharon to establish a fund, the income of which was to be applied to extending the school advantages of that town. Mr. Morse and his brothers contributed to that object, and thus assisted in establishing what is known as the "Sharon Friends' School Fund."

At some time between 1825 and 1830, the business of conveying passengers between Boston and Roxbury was in the hands of a single company, who were charged with fixing too high a price for the service. Luther and Harford Morse, with a few others, united in establishing a competing line, which wrought a wholesome and a welcome change in both the cost and accommodation to the public.

Originally, his political affinities were with the old Republican party. In 1828 he supported Andrew Jackson for President, and from that time to the end of his participation in public affairs his sympathies and votes were given to and for the Democratic party of his time. He had no taste for public office, and so far as the writer has been able to learn, never held one; but he exerted his influence to secure the adoption of measures which he approved, and the election to office of men whose character, ability, integrity, and known sentiments gave assurance that they would conduct public business in the way he believed to be right.

In theology his views were more practical than theoretical in character. He never made any public profession of religion, but held decided opinions upon such matters. Prior to 1819-20 he, with his brother Harford, owned and occupied a pew in the church of the First Parish (afterwards Dr. Putnam's) at Roxbury. When the building of the Universalist Church at Roxbury was projected, Mr. Morse at once took shares in the stock, and, later, bought two pews, and from the time of the completion and occupation of that building until his removal from Roxbury, he was a regular attendant at the services.

During his long life he was singularly free from the oft-recurring terms of sickness which so generally afflict men, but, when a little past fifty years of age, he was stricken with paralysis, which, however, affected his limbs chiefly. He was soon able to walk again, but was ever after liable to fall over even a slight obstacle in his path. In the summer of 1846 another stroke of paralysis came upon him, after which he rarely attempted to walk, but he could read and converse, and enjoyed the calls of his friends until the end of the summer of 1848. On the first of December of that year he passed away, at the age of seventy-eight years, seven months, and twenty-eight days, and his remains were deposited in the family tomb in what was called the "New Burial Ground," just off Warren Street, above Dudley Street, Roxbury.

As before stated, Mr. Morse was twice married. The second wife survived him about five years.

His children were: Mary Holmes, Luther, Jr., and his twin, David Lewis, Ezra Dwight, Harvey, Leprelette, and Elizabeth Holmes, of whom Luther, Jr., and the last three survived their father.

Mary Holmes died Sept. 6, 1847; married Amos Cheney, of Cambridgeport, and had Mary Elizabeth (died early), Caroline Mason (now Mrs. A. S. Bunker, of Lawrence, Mass.), Artemas Fuller (Boston Highlands), and Amos Parker (South Natick, Mass.).

Luther, Jr., married Julia Stacy, of Belchertown, Mass., where he died, Oct. 28, 1850, without issue. His twin died at birth.

David Lewis married Meria¹ Jordan, of Dorchester, and had Luther David, who died at six months; Ammon Rodgers, now at Elmira, N. Y. Died at Sharon, Oct. 29, 1842.

Ezra Dwight died at Roxbury, Sept. 25, 1817, less than ten years of age.

Harvey died unmarried, at Sharon, Aug. 10, 1883.

Leprelette married Mrs. Eunice (Lowe) Nason; and, second, Mrs. Matilda (Colburn) Clark; and died without issue, July 7, 1882.

Elizabeth Holmes resides at Sharon, unmarried.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

WELLESLEY.

BY J. E. FISKE.

THE history of the town of Wellesley is necessarily brief, as the town was incorporated so late as April 6, 1881. It was until that time, from 1711, a part of the town of Needham, and previous to that time its territory was included within the limits of the town of Dedham.

From 1711 to 1774 there was but one parish in the town of Needham, but upon the continued growth of the westerly part of the town, and after a contest about the relocation of the meeting-house, which had been burned in 1773, it was finally voted to allow the people in the westerly part of the town to be free from further support of the church, "provided they do proceed in building a meeting-house and maintain preaching among them."

Two hundred pounds were at once raised by subscription, and a meeting-house was "built," though not finished for several years, and preaching was "maintained," though a settled ministry was not established for more than twenty years. In 1778 the West Precinct was incorporated by act of General Court.

Freedom in religious matters did not, however, entirely satisfy the inhabitants of the westerly part of the town, as very early efforts were made to obtain separate political rights. A strenuous effort was made in 1801, another in 1820, and other later and well-remembered attempts have been made at short intervals. In 1880 an appeal was made, with almost absolute unanimity, by the inhabitants of the west side, now grown to be a large and wealthy community, to the Legislature, and with so great force of reason and argument that the petition was granted, and the town was incorporated and named Wellesley.

Under the act of incorporation, Solomon Flagg, town clerk of Needham for thirty years, and a warm advocate of incorporation, called a meeting for the organization of the town, and the following officers were chosen (April 18, 1881): Moderator, George K. Daniell; Town Clerk, Solomon Flagg; Town Treasurer, Albert Jennings; Selectmen and Overseers of the Poor, Lyman K. Putney, Walter Hunnewell, John W. Shaw; Assessors, George K. Daniell, Joseph H. Dewing, Dexter Kingsbury; School Committee, Joseph E. Fiske (for three years), Benjamin H. Sanborn (for two years), Marshall L. Perrin (for one year).

At a subsequent meeting (April 30th) appropriations were made for expenses, among others, eight thousand dollars for schools, three thousand five hundred dollars for highways and sidewalks, and it voted that no licenses to sell intoxicating liquors should be granted.

These town officers have been retained in the elections which have followed, showing a very desirable harmony.

Under the act of incorporation, certain matters were left for adjustment and settlement between the parent town and Wellesley, which have all been satisfactorily arranged, except the provision with regard to the support of schools, which is now in the hands of a commission.

In the autumn of 1882 it was voted by the town to petition the Legislature to pass an act to allow the town to introduce water for domestic and other purposes, and a committee was chosen to examine into the matter of water-supply, and report to the town.

The Legislature passed the act asked for, and the committee, of which Judge George White was chairman, reported a plan to the town, advising pumping water from the borders of Charles River, near the northeasterly limit of the town, on or near land of Charles Rice, into a reservoir upon Maugus Hill, and thence distributing it substantially over the whole town. This report was accepted and full effect given to it at a subsequent meeting (Dec. 22, 1883), at which meeting Albion R. Clapp was chosen water commissioner for three years, William S. Ware, for two years, and Walter Hunnewell, for one year. This brings the political history of the town to the present writing at the close of the year 1883.

The name "Wellesley," pleasant from its euphony and agreeable from its association, is derived from the Welles family.

Samuel Welles, the maternal grandfather of Mrs. H. H. Hunnewell, bought the place at the corner of Washington Street and Pond road, then within the limits of Natick, possibly as soon as 1750. This place was occupied by him for many years as a farm and summer home. He owned much real-estate in the neighboring towns, and at one time the present town-farm of Wellesley.

He was succeeded in ownership by his nephew John Welles, who married his eldest daughter Abigail, whose maternal grandfather was Chief Justice Pratt, of New York, a native of Norfolk County. John Welles was the lineal descendant of Thomas Welles (of royal English descent), who came over with Lord Say and Sele, as private secretary, in 1636, and was afterwards chosen one of the magistrates of the Colony of Connecticut, its treasurer, Deputy Governor, and finally Governor.

Samuel Welles, a graduate of Yale College (1707), a descendant of Governor Welles, married Hannah Arnold, and removed to Boston, where his wife inherited large property, in the vicinity of Boylston Market, and where the State-House stands. The two sons of Samuel (Samuel and Arnold) graduated from Harvard College in 1745 and 1744, and appear first in the Triennial Catalogue of the college, indicating their very high social position.

The son of Arnold, Hon. John Welles, of the house of J. and B. Welles, of Boston, and Welles & Company, of Paris, bankers, was well known on both continents as a successful and honest business man, holding in Boston many responsible positions in banking, trust, and insurance organizations. Aside from his purely business pursuits he was interested in scientific farming and stock-raising, and in general agriculture.

He was a member of the Massachusetts House of Representatives and the Senate, and was one of the first presidents of the City Council of Boston. He was a pioneer in the importation of blooded stock from England, giving attention especially to Durham stock in cattle, being in this and other kindred ways of great value to his neighbors. He is remembered by the older natives of Wellesley and Natick as a very kindly neighbor, loaning them money in their needs, never pressing for payment nor charging them exorbitant interest, and encouraging them in the purchase of property, aiding them by his experience and means, having great resources in both.

He was a graduate of Harvard College of the class of 1782, and a clear writer in the field in which he was most interested,—agriculture. He died at the advanced age of ninety-one, Sept. 21, 1855, surviving his wife and cousin eleven years. His son-in-law H. H. Hunnewell, now owning the Welles' place, the son of Dr. Walter Hunnewell, a good and respectable doctor of Watertown, a graduate of Harvard University, 1787, was born in 1810, and very early went to Paris to engage in business in the firm of Welles & Company, of which firm he became a member, remaining in Paris till 1839, when he returned to Massachusetts, making his summer residence at Wellesley, in the "Morrill House," till 1852, when he erected his present house. His estate is so well known, and has been a prominent object of attraction in the town for so many years, especially with those who take an interest in horticultural matters, that any extended description of it would seem unnecessary. It consists of over four hundred acres of land, of which some thirty acres about the Mansion House, with as many more connected with the cottages, are under a high state of cultivation, and have been laid out and planted by the proprietor with such success as to attract the notice and receive the commendation of visitors from every part of the country. There will be found in the plantations all the choice new trees and shrubs that have been introduced of late years, both native and foreign, which have been found on trial to stand the rigor of our New England climate, and the sinetum on the easterly side of the place contains a large and valuable collection of coniferæ from California and Europe, some of which are of large size now and whose future growth will be watched with much interest by those interested in the introduction of ornamental trees into this part of the country for the improvement of private or public gardens. Much attention has been given to the cultivation of azaleas and rhododendrons, which have been grown most successfully in great numbers for many years, and are a marked feature in the place, attracting the attention of visitors, especially in early summer, by their gorgeous flowers.

TERRACE ON THE GROUNDS OF H. H. HUNNEWELL, WELLESLEY, MASS.

One of the most novel and interesting features of the place is probably the Italian garden, a very fine view of which is obtained from the upper terrace as seen in the illustration we give. The mode of treatment here adopted in growing trees is rarely seen to any extent in this country, though often met with in Europe, and can only be successfully used when circumstances are favorable and appropriate for its introduction in the decoration of gardens or public parks. Trees formally trained and clipped do not harmonize with those growing naturally, and when they are mingled together on a lawn they most decidedly mar any attempt to enhance the beauty of the landscape, but when seen as planted in the Italian garden at Wellesley, in connection with the grand water view, some most striking and interesting effects are produced by this style of gardening. Standing on the upper terrace, seventy feet above the lake, the spectator looks down on a sharp sloping piece of ground, of over two acres, thrown into six terraces four hundred feet long, each reaching down to the water's edge and planted with a large number of evergreen trees pruned into a great variety of forms and decorated with vases, balustrade and parapet walls.

The garden was prepared in 1854, and the planting has been going on ever since, as trees of the required character cannot be procured at the nurseries, and their growth is necessarily very slow, being cut back once or twice every season to give them a compact and dense appearance; but many of them have already attained a height of twenty to thirty feet, and are so high as to excite the interest and admiration of every visitor. The trees which have been used in this garden consist of white pines, Norway spruces, junipers, retinosporas, larches, hemlocks, and arbor-vitæ, and hedges of the two latter, one hundred and fifty feet long and ten to fifteen feet high, have not suffered in our coldest winters, though they have a northern exposure and the full force of our northwest winds over the lake. The labor in pruning is very great, stagings having to be constructed to reach the tops of the highest trees, and it must necessarily be largely increased when the next generation sees them double their present height.

The kindly generosity which has thrown open for so many years to an admiring and grateful people these beautiful gardens has shown itself in a more marked manner even in the gift to the town of a beautiful park, library building stocked with books, and a town hall by an indenture, of which the striking points may be briefly given, in which Mr. Hunnewell expresses his desire to "promote the prosperity of the town of Wellesley and the welfare and happiness of its inhabitants, and at the same time to advance the cause of sound learning, education, and letters," and therefore conveys to the inhabitants of the town of Wellesley a parcel of land of ten acres for a park, with buildings erected or to be erected thereon, to be used as a town hall and a public library, with the conditions that the grounds may be entered upon and improved by Mr. Hunnewell and the Wellesley Free Library Corporation, that the town shall keep in repair the buildings and the park in order, and that no additions or alterations shall be made without the consent of Mr. Hunnewell or the Wellesley Free Library after his death. There is a further provision that the inhabitants of the neighboring town of Needham may have access to the library under certain restrictions.

The library has been in operation through the year 1883; has now over seven thousand books on its shelves, and a list of eight hundred takers.

Mr. Hunnewell has also provided by his indenture a fund of twenty thousand dollars for the care of the grounds and library.

The town of Wellesley is rectangular in shape, though somewhat irregular, being about four and one-half miles in length and about two and one-quarter in width.

Its neighbors on the south are Needham and Dover, on the east the "Garden City," Newton, on the north Weston, and on the west Natick.

Charles River flows along its entire eastern boundary and for a short distance along its southwesterly limit.

The Boston and Albany Railroad runs through the town from east to west, with stations at Rice's Crossing, Wellesley Hills, Wellesley, and Lake Crossing, and at the terminus of the Newton Branch at the Lower Falls. The excellent service of this road, the cheap fares and quick transit, with promised improvements, combined with many natural attractions and advantages, make this a popular residential town for Boston business men and persons of literary tastes and refined leisure.

The town, and more particularly the village of Wellesley Hills, has a wide reputation for healthfulness, owing in great measure to its elevation, combined with the dryness of its soil and freedom from all malarial and other unhealthful tendencies, and has been the resort for many years, by the advice of the best physicians, for persons afflicted with pulmonary complaints. The charm of the town of Wellesley consists in its refined rural atmosphere, its pleasant homes, its delightful drives and its beautiful landscape scenery, and no enlarged description of its enchanting outlooks, its elegant residences, its public buildings, its hills and vales, its calm waters and rugged ledges can be otherwise than futile and unsatisfactory. The main street, named for our first President, and noticed with favor by Washington when he made his tour, in 1789, as a "good road," affords a notable drive, much of the way arched with trees, passing through our three villages, rising first to a view of the valley of the Charles, which all admire and artists love, by churches of various architecture and varied beliefs, with hills near and remote, crowned with villas of the wealthy, and woods stretching interminably apparently to the west and north, with Nonantum behind and Maugus by our side, to suggest to us romances of Indian life, and excite our sympathy for the sufferings of the red men, by the former home of W. G. T. Morton, the discoverer of that greatest of boons to human sufferers, sulphuric ether, by the colleges the monument more enduring than brass, of Henry F. Durant, by the beautiful Lake Waban, Lake of the Wind, named for Eliot's first convert, by the elegant villas of the Hunnewells to the limits of the busy town of Natick.

Two conduits of the Boston Water-Works mar the landscape in general, but in a few places, as the long viaduct across Waban Brook, the gate-houses at either end of the siphon on the new works, and the bridge across the Charles on the old, add beauties of architecture to the natural scenery.

Local historic associations are not numerous, and are mainly connected with Indian names and history.

Maugus Hill, named for an Indian called Magos, of whom but little is known, save that he deeded land about Maugus Hill to the town of Dedham in 1681. Nehoiden, the name of the post-office at Wellesley Hills for a short time, was also the name of an Indian who transferred his claim to the tract of land of which Wellesley was a part to the inhabitants of the town of Dedham, and many other names preserved in names of organizations and in names of farms and country-seats.

The "Hundreds," already become the fashionable location for residences, was named from the amount of land in the divisions of the country, including the present village of Wellesley Hills, the tract of woodland now known as the Hundreds, the school-farm of Dedham, and Needham Leg, about three thousand five hundred acres in all. What is now the village of Wellesley Hills was included almost wholly in the tract of land assigned to Capt. Daniel Fisher, of Dedham, who took Sir Edmund Andros by the collar and drew him from his place of refuge back to Fort Hill in the Rebellion of 1689. This division of land was made in 1699.

There are many local associations which in a town history would be in place as of interest which cannot find room here.

The historical associations with the names of the residents of Wellesley are numerous and interesting, and should they be freely chronicled would embrace in their narration the most important events in American history.

Probably Andrew Dewing was the first settler within the town limits of Wellesley, and erected a garrison-house about 1660. This name we find preserved in local and military history, the name is found in the list of Revolutionary soldiers, and one of the family was in the war of the Rebellion, the present assessor of that name.

The Fullers, always one of the most influential families of the place, derive their origin from Thomas Fuller (a member of whose family very early built a house near the town line), a representative to the General Court as early as 1686, whose son was wounded in the Narraganset war, and whose descendants were conspicuous in the earlier and later wars and in civil life as well,—William, Henry A., Warren, and Andrew serving in the war of the Rebellion.

The Wares, another well-known family, have always had their representatives in church, town, and military matters, one of whom has left a very valuable journal of his journey to Quebec under Arnold, in 1776.

The Kingsburys, descendants probably of Joseph Kingsbury, of Dedham, furnished one of their number as captain of a company which fought at the battle of Lexington, and a noble child of the house, William H., died in the last war, while Dexter has held town offices for many years.

The Mills, one of whom was killed (and the only one living within the limits of Wellesley who was killed) in the Lexington fight, and the Smiths freely represented in the Revolutionary and Rebellion contests; Daniel, the first deacon of the West Needham Church, represented in all places of honor and works, with a female ancestor captured and scalped by the Indians and the last with us well known as legislator, moderator, and assessor; the Flaggs, synonym for town officer; Fiskes, old residents of the Leg, and builders of our best old homes, now represented by the present chairman of the school committee, and a captain of artillery in the late war; the Stevens, faithful and true, one of whom died in the wretched Libby prison, at Richmond; the Jennings, ancestors of our present town treasurer, whose first American ancestor was killed in a Pequot fight, 1633; the Slacks, later but influential through the influence of Squire Benjamin Slack, the last generation represented by Capt. C. B. Slack in the war of the Rebellion; the Lyons, eminent as manufacturers and farmers, with two of the family on the muster-roll of the Forty-fourth Massachusetts Regiment; the Huntings, descendants of John Hunting, the first elder of the Dedham Church, with three of the last generation in the late war,—Willard dying in prison, all have done their share in honest faithful work to enhance the reputation of their town and make the world better for their living in it.

Though the town is not a manufacturing town, there are several factories of consequence from their antiquity as well as from the amount of business which they do. As long ago as 1704 Benjamin Mills located a saw-mill about where the Dudley Hosiery Mill now stands and below a natural dam which was enlarged by rude additions. His sons joined him, and other mills followed. Below, at the site of the shoddy mill of Richard Sullivan, Ephraim Jackson first established his business, followed by William Hoogs.

The present larger manufactories are the hosiery mills, the paper mills of Mr. Rice, the shoddy mill of Mr. Sullivan, and the chemical factory of Billings & Clapp at the Lower Falls, the shoe-factory of Tucker & Son at Wellesley, and the paint-factory of Mr. Woods, whose production of colors have increased from six pounds to six tons per day.

The Educational Institutions.—The earliest schools for many years were probably taught in private homes whenever it was most convenient, but the first house built for that purpose was probably erected in 1728 by William Chubb, by subscription, costing thirty-one pounds ten shillings, and stood about where Mrs. G. W. Shaw's house now stands, Wellesley Hills. The first school-house in Wellesley Village stood near where Mr. Solomon Flagg's barn now is, and several school-houses in succession have been built on the same site in the North District. At present there is one high school with forty-eight scholars and three teachers; three grammar schools, three intermediate, three primary, and one ungraded school at Unionville, all containing about three hundred and seventy-five scholars.

There have been several private schools in the history of the town, one kept by W. H. Adams, of more than local repute, about 1846 to 1852; one by Miss Thayer about 1820. The preparatory school of the Misses Eastman, with seventy scholars and a corps of fourteen teachers, with large accommodations, has a most promising career before it. A small private family school is kept at Wellesley Hills, by Miss Chesboro; but, of course, the crowning educational jewel and the pride of our town is Wellesley College, which deserves and receives an extended description.

Churches and Parishes.—After the incorporation of the "West Precinct," already alluded to, the poverty engendered by the war proved a serious impediment in the way of church advancement; and it was not till after 1797 when eighteen families were added to the parish by the annexation of a part of Natick by act of the Legislature, that the inhabitants felt strong enough to institute a church organization.

The church was formally "embodied" Sept. 6, 1798, with ten members. Mr. Thomas Noyes, a native of Acton, son of one of the Acton men in the Concord fight, a graduate of Harvard College (1795), was ordained July 10, 1799.

The only descendants of Mr. Noyes living in Wellesley are a granddaughter, Mrs. F. M. E. White, wife of Hon. George White, judge of probate of Norfolk County, with their three children. He was pastor till July 9, 1833. The first deacons were Joseph Daniell and William Bigelow. His successor was Joseph W. Sessions, ordained Oct. 2, 1833, dismissed May 31, 1842; succeeded, Oct. 6, 1842, by Rev. Harvey Newcomb, dismissed July 1, 1846; Andrew Bigelow, July 7, 1847, to Feb. 2, 1853; A. R. Baker, Jan. 1, 1856, dismissed 1861; George G. Phipps, Jan. 23, 1868, dismissed April 1, 1878; P. D. Cowan, April 9, 1879, the present pastor.

The church building was renewed and dedicated Jan. 1, 1835, and this building was sold and a new one erected in 1868, the old building having been moved and presented by Charles B. Dana to Wellesley College, and named Dana Hall.

The church at Wellesley Hills (Grantville) was built in 1847, and the church was organized Feb. 24, 1847, with thirty members. John Batchelder and Reuel Ware were chosen deacons, and Rev. Harvey Newcomb was installed as pastor Dec. 9, 1847, and dismissed Nov. 8, 1849; Rev. William Barrows, settled Aug. 22, 1850, dismissed Jan. 22, 1856; Edward S. Atwood, settled Oct. 23, 1856, dismissed Sept. 21, 1864; Charles H. Williams, settled July 25, 1867, dismissed Dec. 29, 1868; James M. Hubbard, settled Dec. 29, 1868, dismissed Jan. 13, 1874; J. L. Harris, settled June 18, 1874, dismissed Dec. 21, 1875; Jonathan Edwards, settled March 1, 1876, the present pastor. The church was remodeled in 1877.

The Grantville Unitarian Society was gathered in December, 1869, and engaged Rev. A. B. Vorse to preach to them. He has continued as their preacher to the present time.

In February, 1871, the society purchased Maugus Hall, and have continued its use as their chapel.

The Catholic Church, near the Lower Falls, was opened for services April 18, 1875, and dedicated by Archbishop Williams May 8, 1881. Rev. Michael Dolan has been its pastor to the present date.

A Methodist Church was built on Pine Plain, now known as Unionville, in 1800, and preaching, largely by circuit ministers, was had for over forty years. George Pickering was the first preacher, a man of power and fame in his later ministry. There are many reminiscences of preachers, sermons, and religious harmony and quarrels, which can find no room here.

The first post-office in the town was established in 1830, with Charles Noyes, son of Parson Noyes, as postmaster, in a little shop where the postmaster conducted his business, that of an optician. The mail was brought once in two days, by the Uxbridge stage, and known as West Needham Post-office. It is now known as Wellesley, and, with W. H. Flagg as postmaster, has an average of one thousand letters per day to deliver.

The post-office at Wellesley Hills was established as Grantville, in November, 1851, with W. H. Adams as postmaster, and was kept in his house, in which was also a school. It is now kept by Miss Mary P. Austin, with an average of two hundred letters distributed daily.

Meridian Lodge of Masons was organized at the Lower Falls, in a hall in a building owned by John Pulsifer; declined in anti-Masonic days; was removed to Natick, where it is now a flourishing lodge.

Sincerity Lodge of Odd-Fellows was organized in 1875 in Wellesley, and is now in excellent condition, with (1883) Freeman Phillips as chief officer and sixty-four members.

The Wellesley Soldiers' Club, George H. Robbins commander, composed of soldiers who served in the late war, succeeded Grand Army Post No. 62, and has about twenty-five members.

Very much matter which would naturally be looked for in a work like this respecting early history will be found in the history of the town of Needham, while numberless historical memoranda of great local interest and of great interest to families and individuals are necessarily shut out from want of space and the general character of the work.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

WELLESLEY—(Continued).

WELLESLEY COLLEGE.

BY REV. D. S. RODMAN.

As an illustration of one of the developments in the intellectual life of our country Wellesley College stands pre-eminent and worthy of note. It was founded by a single individual for the higher education of women. Its first corner-stone laid only thirteen years ago (1871), it already contains the largest number of students in any college for young women in the world.

It is in a location which, for suitableness and influence, it would be difficult to surpass; has buildings unexcelled for convenience and beauty; a body of trustees composed of some of the most prominent friends of education in the land; libraries containing more than twenty-five thousand volumes, to which large additions are constantly made; scientific apparatus and other appliances of most approved construction; and what is far more important, an able corps of professors and teachers; class-rooms affording illustrations of great principles and methods in education, and four hundred and eighty students eager to avail themselves of the highest advantages the institution can offer.

The Founder.—Henry Fowle Durant, the founder of the college, was born in Hanover, N. H., Feb. 20, 1822. He entered Harvard College at the age of fifteen, and was graduated in 1841. Having studied such business connections as might afford him means for beneficent objects, confronting the question, "How can I best serve God in my day and generation?"

In his wife he had a noble Christian inspirer, helper, and friend. Their wealth was consecrated to God. How best to use it in his service was the question. He now carefully studied the various forms of benevolent efforts, and moved among men an observer of society and its many needs.

The decision was finally made to found an institution of Christian learning for young women. With this new purpose Mr. Durant's native gifts, intense nature, energy of will, sound judgment, keen perception, persistency of purpose, his executive ability, law, he was admitted to the bar in 1843. Eminently gifted with the talents that insure success, he soon became a lawyer of lucrative practice and fame. In 1854 he was united in marriage to Pauline Adeline Fowle, daughter of Col. John Fowle, late of the United States Army.

While in the prime of life and in a career of brilliant achievement, his son, a boy eight years old, of fine promise and beautiful character, suddenly died (1863). This event, under the influence of God's Holy Spirit, changed the governing purpose and direction of his life. With characteristic decision he became the man of Christian spirit and endeavor. He relinquished his practice at the bar, and retained only literary and cultivated taste, all were brought into requisition, and indicated the man for the work, the work for the man. The magnificent institution at Wellesley is the result.

"Never," says Dr. Howard Crosby, "was any great institution more completely the work of one man. To Mr. Durant belongs the credit of the plan and the execution, as well as the pecuniary gift."

Location.—Wellesley College is situated on the banks of Lake Waban, in Wellesley, about one mile from the railway station. The grounds comprise three hundred and thirty-one acres of meadow and wood land, of lawn and glade, with a mile of frontage on the lake.

The commonly-used entrance, one-half a mile from the station, is marked by a lodge and gateway of great beauty. The lodge is of the Elizabethan style, built of irregular rubble work of granite in various colors, with trimmings of Nova Scotia freestone. Passing through the gateway, you enter an avenue bordered with elms. Sweeping through an evergreen grove by a circuitous way, you have glimpses of Simpson Cottage on an elevation upon the right; of Stone Hall, a massive pile of brick, upon the left. Skirting an old forest of oaks, you pass the College of Music, and soon reach the main building on a rising knoll, overlooking the waters of the lake.

On the 18th of August, 1871, the first stone of these foundations was laid at the extreme northeast corner by Mrs. Durant. On the 14th of September, Mrs. Durant also laid the corner-stone at the northwest corner. This was done without public ceremony, but in a manner characteristic of the spirit of the founders, and significant of the principles that actuated them and of the designs that were to be carried out.

The Main Building.—This, the first in construction, is in the form of a double Latin cross. The length is four hundred and seventy-four feet. To this is added a building containing gymnasium, laundries, and kitchens, extending one hundred and twenty-five feet. The width of the wings is one hundred and seventy feet. There are in the main four stories, at points extending into five, the whole crowned with a mansard roof, and set off with spires, towers, bays, porches, and pavilions. The architecture is in the style of the Renaissance.

The material is brick, laid in black mortar, with Nova Scotia freestone trimmings. The main partition walls throughout the building are of brick, with fire-proof floors in the library and chapel. The windows are varied in size and form; the window-heads semi-circular, with flat arches. The ends of the arms of the cross are carried up in pavilions and covered with French roofs, the whole producing an irregular but harmonious exterior that is beautiful but not finical, substantial but not unwieldy. Dignity, grace, and repose are the general effect.

The main entrance is through a porte-cochere, or portico of Nova Scotia freestone. This is supported by twelve massive pillars of the same material. Over the portal is the monogram, "I. H. S."

The central hall is one hundred and seventy feet in length and sixty feet in width. This is crossed at right angles by a corridor that extends a distance of four hundred and seventy-four feet, meeting a like corridor and opening in each wing. This hall, at the place of intersection, opens loftily up seventy feet to a glass roof that surmounts this central space, thus distributing the cheery light through all the corridors. Around this space at every story run galleries supported on the lowest floor by a colonnade of ten polished Hallowell granite columns, which are surmounted by foliated marble capitals, and on the floors above by fluted iron columns with Corinthian capitals.

Around this area at the several stories are balustrades of different ornamented patterns, and finished in a varied and attractive style. From above the observer looks down upon an immense jardinière on the lowest floor that rises from a mosaic of marble tilings. This is of graceful, irregular outline, filled with earth and planted with palms, tree-ferns, and tropical flora in rich luxuriance.

This entrance hall and the many corridors to the topmost story are enriched with paintings, engravings, sketches, casts, and statuary. Among these are the famous "Gibraltar" of R. Swain Gifford, a marine painting by Arthur Quartley, a flower piece by Mario Nuzzi (1603-1673), "The Cumæan Sybil" by Veder, and other paintings and sketches by Kennett, Bellows, Parsons, Magrath, Ellen Robbins, Edward Frere, Otto Gunther, Zangower, Keith, Bristol, Head, Smiley, Hart, Lambinet, and others.

It was the wish and good judgment of Mr. Durant not to seclude these in an art gallery only for special exhibition, but to place them where they would constantly educate taste, awaken thought, and render this temporary home more beautiful and attractive.

The broad and central stairways with their carved balustrades of ash and treads of oak, the floors of oiled cherry, are examples of the thoroughness of the construction of the whole building. The stairways in the east and west wings are similar to the central. The halls and corridors correspond on every floor. The whole arrangement is on the simplest plan and in the most convenient form for access.

The interior wood-finish is of western ash. The students' rooms are in suites of a bedroom and parlor, occupying a space about twenty by fourteen feet, and intended for two. They vary in form and size, are cheerful and pleasant, more than half looking out upon the lake and having a southern exposure, the others fronting the avenue that approaches the college. A few larger parlors with two bedrooms accommodate three or four pupils. There are also a few single rooms. Pretty carpets are upon the floors. The furniture is of black walnut.

On the right of the main entrance is the "Brown-ing room," and on the left are the "reception-room" and the general office. In the eastern end, upon the first floor, is the library. This room is fifty by seventy-seven feet in size. It is characterized by beauty of proportions, convenience for study, and wealth of material. To the scholar it is a most attractive room for treasures "both new and old."

It is estimated that there is shelf-room for fifty thousand volumes. It already contains twenty-five thousand, all easily accessible and well catalogued. The lower alcoves are furnished with chairs and tables, as in the main room. Those above are reached by three spiral stairways. The entire finish is in black walnut. This room is intended to be fire-proof, and is separated from the main building by doors of iron.

The suite of rooms belonging to the president, and the young ladies' parlor, are at this end of the building.

The chapel is a fine audience-room, directly over the library. There is seating capacity for six hundred and fifty. A gallery extending the width of the room is entered from third floor. This room is finished in black walnut, and richly frescoed. Ornamental trusses interlaced over the chancel support the roof. Transverse beams divide the ceiling into panels, which are handsomely frescoed.

In the rear of the platform is a memorial window, consisting of two pictures made by Berkhart, at Munich, and presented to the college by Governor and Mrs. William Claflin, in memory of a daughter who died in Rome.

In the western end, on the first floor, is the dining-hall. This will accommodate three hundred and fifty. It is finished in hard wood, and lighted by eighteen arched windows. It communicates with the domestic hall that is specially fitted to facilitate the domestic work. The appointments in this part of the building are of a complete and finished character. The laundry is furnished for cleansing and drying clothes by steam. Excellent facilities, in a separate room, are provided for young ladies who wish to do their own laundry-work.

The building is warmed by steam. Fresh air is constantly admitted into the basement; heated by contact with steam-radiators, charged with moisture by the addition of a prescribed quantity of steam, it is distributed through the building. Every study-parlor has its separate flue, and the register enables the occupant to regulate the heat at her pleasure. It is generally conceded that there is no public building in the country better warmed and ventilated. The building is lighted by gas, manufactured upon the college premises, and conducted into every room. German student-lamps are also furnished for every study-parlor. Water is supplied in great abundance from four artesian wells. Hot and cold water is provided in every part of the building. Bathing-rooms are at convenient points in every story. A steam passenger-elevator is in use day and evening. The drainage, natural and artificial, is faultless.

Four years were occupied in the erection of this building. All was done under the constant and scrutinizing supervision of Mr. Durant. He spared neither expense nor effort to secure the utmost possible degree of excellence in all its appointments. The best materials and the most thorough workmanship were everywhere made a first consideration.

More than seven millions of brick, and twenty miles of steam, water, and gas-pipes were used in the construction. Its fine proportions, exquisite symmetry, the response of the interior to the expectations awakened by the exterior, the excellence of its general plan, the refined nicety of its details, the elegance and simplicity that characterize it throughout the combination of so many fine qualities make the adaptation to its destined use almost perfect. It is justly considered the master-piece of Mr. Hammatt Billings, Boston's ablest architect.

On Sept. 8, 1875, this building was opened with three hundred students. This faculty was represented by Miss A. L. Howard as president, associated with twenty-nine professors and teachers.

A charter had been obtained, in 1870, from the State. The establishment of such an institution in this part of the country, unique in conception, high in aim, Christian and progressive in spirit, reasonable in expense, fully equipped by one individual, marked an era in the history of education. It proved a great incentive throughout the land, and indeed throughout the world.

The fifth year (1879-80) opened with three hundred and seventy-five students, and the sixth (1880-81) with three hundred and seventy-two. There were more applicants than could be received. It was evident that other buildings must be erected.

Dana Hall, a building in the village that had been presented to the college by C. B.

Dana, was filled by members of the teachers' class, and by graduates.

Stone Hall.—At this juncture Mrs. Valeria G. Stone, of Malden, Mass., gave one hundred thousand dollars to the college, to be expended in the erection of a building for teachers, to be called "Stone Hall."

The corner-stone was laid May 27, 1880; and in September, 1881, it was opened to the reception of students. This building is of three stories, its walls of brick, and ornamented with terra-cotta. The interior partitions are of brick without wood furrings. The external walls are vaulted with eight-inch spaces; and the corridor walls are built with flues for ventilation and heating; the latter communicating with hot-air chambers in the basement.

It is arranged for a family of one hundred students, all having separate apartments. There are four dining-rooms, a kitchen, and laundry. It has a parlor and reception-room, and is intended to provide all the requisites of a home. Stone Hall occupies the entire summit of a knoll overlooking the lake.

College of Music.—The increasing demands for greater facilities in the study and practice of music led to the erection of Music Hall. The expense was incurred by Mr. Durant. The corner-stone was laid June 10, 1880, and it was opened for use in June, 1881. It is of brick, contains thirty-eight music-rooms for practice, with a hall for choral singing. The floors are deafened: double partition-walls, with double doors, are designed to prevent the transmission of sound between the rooms.

The seventh year (1881-82) opened with four hundred and fifty students. The erection of Stone Hall and the College of Music, with the occupancy of Wabau College, rendered this number possible.

This year (1881) was rendered painfully memorable in the history of the college by the death of its founder. From the beginning of the undertaking his cares had been unremitting, his labors great and incessant. With untiring energy he had devoted himself night and day to the most minute details incident to the foundation and establishment of a great seat of learning. Not only during all the work of planning and construction, but for the six years between the opening of the college and his death, he gave the whole strength of soul, mind, and body to it. The result was inevitable, that so putting his life into the college, he should lay down his life for it. He died at Wellesley, Oct. 3, 1881, ten years after the laying of the first corner-stone. He had lived to see, if not the full accomplishment of his purpose, yet more than is given to most men to see of the fruit of his labors. He had seen an idea dear to him take root, gather material forces around it, emerge from the darkness, make itself known, recognized, felt, a power in the world for good. His loss was deeply felt in every department. The inspiration of his presence, his unwearied interest, his constant thoughtfulness are daily missed.

Miss Howard having resigned, Miss Alice E. Freeman was appointed president.

Cottage System.—It being the aim of the college to provide for its students the best environments as well as the best instruction within its power, two systems, each having peculiar advantages, were selected. The founder erected at great expense one of the most convenient and beautiful buildings for education in the world, within whose walls can be collected three hundred and fifty teachers and students, and as many conveniences for study and improvement as can well be grouped together under one roof. But knowing that some find the strain and tension incident to intercourse with so many too great, cottages have been designed, in which those who prefer may find quiet, and at the same time enjoy all the advantages of the institution.

COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

Simpson Cottage was erected on one of the fine sites within the grounds, at a cost of about twenty-five thousand dollars. It was the gift of Mr. M. H. Simpson, in memory of his wife, who was an earnest friend, and one of the trustees, of the college. It was opened in September, 1882; will accommodate twenty-three students and a teacher.

It is the design to group around the main building or in its vicinity—as soon as means are furnished—other similar cottages; each, as far as its home-life is concerned, to be a distinct establishment, with its dining-room, kitchen, and parlors; to be under the care of a lady of refinement and culture; where students will have even more than the quietness of an ordinary home.

The eighth year (1882-83) opened with four hundred and eighty-five students from thirty-nine States and countries.

The requirements for admission for the next year were greater than in any previous year. The preparation of applicants has been of better quality year by year.

The total number admitted this year (1883-84) is five hundred and four.

The college, during these nine years, has given instruction to eighteen hundred and six students.

They have been from every State in the Union except one (Nevada), and from Micronesia, Sandwich Islands, India, Turkey, Siam, Japan, Chili, Mexico, Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick.

There have been graduated in 1879, 18; 1880, 41; 1881, 23; 1882, 28; 1883, 50; total, 160.

Twenty-four students have entered upon work in the home and foreign mission fields, and many more are engaged in teaching or are holding other positions of influence in various parts of the world.

The price of board and tuition (including heating and light), at first two hundred and fifty dollars per annum, has been necessarily raised to two hundred and seventy-five dollars. There are twenty-four scholarships of five thousand dollars each, the income from which is appropriated to aid-deserving students, under the direction of the Students' Aid Society. More than ten thousand dollars were thus applied during the past year (1882-83). The library has a fund of fifty thousand dollars. Funds are needed to retain the present low rate of board and tuition, to endow professorships, to purchase apparatus, to erect cottages for homes, a laboratory building, and an observatory.

The property of the college and its administration are vested in a board of trustees, chartered as a perpetual legal corporation, under the name of Wellesley College. The trustees are selected from the various evangelical denominations, several universities, colleges, and theological seminaries, the leading foreign missionary societies in the country, laity and clergy, ladies and gentlemen.

Rev. Noah Porter, D.D., LL.D., is president of the board of trustees; Rev. Howard Crosby, D.D., LL.D., vice-president; Mrs. Henry F. Durant, treasurer; Professor E. N. Horsford is president of the board of visitors. The faculty consists of seventy-three officers of government and instruction. There are fifty-three resident professors and teachers. Alice E. Freeman, Ph.D., is the president.

The plan and methods of education pursued are based upon certain important features, the most prominent of which are:

1. The supreme importance of the moral character.
2. Health.
3. The highest development of the intellect compatible with health.
4. The practical usefulness of the individual.
5. The inexpensiveness of the course.

Christian Influence.—It was the unswerving determination of the founder that the college should be distinctively a Christian college. Its foundation would never have been laid by him if this object could not have been secured. The cross carved into the key-stone spanning the entrance, and that which rises above the highest pinnacle of the noble pile, are only slight evidences, among many, of this purpose.

It is still the aim of those who control that here art, science, and religion shall do their utmost to form Christian character, and impart to it wisdom, strength, and beauty.

The college therefore seeks Christian teachers, and the best Christian influences. It has arranged its curriculum so that, while it shall provide for the highest intellectual acquisition, it shall at the same time impart religious knowledge in a positive and practical manner, that its students may have something more than a sentimental basis for religious convictions.

Prominence is given to the study of the word and works of God as the true basis of the higher education.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

EMERY FISK.

Emery Fisk, born in Framingham, in the State of Massachusetts, Feb. 27, 1803, was a descendant of Robert and Sybil (Gold) Fiske or Fisk, who lived at Broad Gates, Loxfield, Framingham, Suffolk County, England, whose son or grandson, David, with two nephews and their mother, came to Watertown about 1636, and there settled. David went to Wenham, and his descendants are to be found in Northeastern Massachusetts and in New Hampshire towns.

Nathan, one of the nephews, married Susanna ——. He was one of the selectmen of Watertown in about 1674 or 1675. His fourth son, Nathaniel, was born July 12, 1653, and in 1677 married Mary Childs. Their son Nathaniel was born June 9, 1678, and married Hannah Adams at Sherborn. Their third son, Moses, born June 29, 1713, married Mehitable Broad, of Needham, April 11, 1745. Their son Moses, born 1746, married (1775) to Sally —, settled in Natick (Needham Leg) upon their marriage. Their son Moses, the father of Emery, was born Jan. 4, 1776, and married Sybil Jennison, of Hillsborough, N. H., May, 1801, and settled in Framingham, where they remained till Emery, their oldest son, was fourteen, when they removed to Weston, having purchased the Abijah Fisk farm. After remaining here one year the family removed to Natick, purchasing a farm, bordering upon Dug and Long Ponds, of Calvin Fisk, a cousin of the head of the family. When about eighteen years of age Emery left home to carry on the farm of Chester Adams, and, upon Col. Adams removing to Dedham, he left him for the purpose of entering into a business partnership with him. He remained in business in Dedham for several years.

He married, April 16, 1828, Eunice Morse, of Natick, daughter of Adam Morse, and great-granddaughter of John Bacon, of Needham, who, as lieutenant of a company, was killed near Menotomy, April 19, 1775, in the battle of Lexington. They removed to Needham (now Wellesley) in May, 1833, having purchased a farm of two hundred acres of Isaiah Fiske, a second cousin, and lived upon it the rest of his life. He was an honest, reliable citizen, of social, genial habits, of excellent judgment, cautious in business, more given to comfortable enjoyment of what he possessed than engaged in the acquirement of money, though his income always exceeded his expenditures.

He was greatly respected and his opinions were highly regarded by his neighbors and townsmen. He was selectman and overseer of the poor for several years of the town of Needham, and was representative of the town in the Massachusetts Legislature in the years of 1840 and 1841. He was elected and served as delegate to the convention for revising the Constitution of Massachusetts in 1853, and the acquaintance he there formed with such men as Choate, Wilson, Morton, Rantoul, Butler, Burlingame, and others was a source of great pleasure to him so long as he lived. He was a Democrat in politics, and always attended the conventions of his party, State and local.

He died May 17, 1868, leaving two children (six others having died in infancy),—the elder, Abigail Burgess, who married Augustus Eaton, and resides in Needham, and Joseph E., born Oct. 23, 1839, and living at the home place. He graduated at Harvard College in 1861, was in the war of the Rebellion (1862–65), a prisoner of war ten months, and discharged as captain of artillery. He has been for many years a town officer; was a representative in the Legislature in 1874, and a member of the Senate of Massachusetts in 1876–77.

SOLOMON FLAGG.

Solomon Flagg, a true product of Puritan stock, was born in Boston, Aug. 24, 1804. The next spring his father, who had kept one of the two victualing cellars then known in Boston, removed to Needham, his native place, and opened a public-house on the spot and in the house where the subject of this sketch resides.

He filled the office of town clerk and assessor for several years.

His wife was a Brown, who was sister of Betty Brown, who gave a large property to the West Needham Parish.

One of the early associates of Mr. Flagg speaks of him "as a spruce young man, full of fun and frolic," and adds, "he still retains these characteristics."

He assisted his father in keeping store and tending bar, but under guidance of friends and their own principles, himself and his brother totally abstained from the use of liquors, and very early joined the temperance movement championed by Hon. William Jackson, of Newton.

The grandfather of Mr. Flagg, also named Solomon, was present in the battle of Lexington, and served at other points during the war of the Revolution. He held offices in the town of Needham.

It is easy to trace the line of the family to Thomas Flagg, who came over from England before 1643, and settling at Watertown was selectman of that town in 1671, 1674–78, and died in 1697.

Mr. Solomon Flagg having married Eliza Hall, had three children,—Charles Henry, who was killed by a sad accident while very young; Charles Gay, who died, 1860, at the age of twenty-five; and George H. P., born March 12, 1830, who still survives, following the profession of dentistry with such skill and success that he has acquired an enviable reputation in his work, and amassed a fortune which enables him to indulge his father in every want and luxury in his declining years, and to place his familiar features in this history.

In mature life Mr. Flagg united with the church of which for over fifty years he has led the choir with a voice familiar, not to his townspeople only, but to the inhabitants of the neighboring towns, who turned out by hundreds to do him honor on the celebration of his seventy-fifth birthday, under the auspices of the musical club of which he was a member.

He was school-teacher for thirty-eight years in Needham, Dover, Natick, and Sherborn, and there are few of the old natives of these towns who do not know him and respect him.

Probably no person in Norfolk County, possibly in the State, has held public office so many years in the aggregate as Mr. Flagg, and it is well to put on record the facts of so remarkable a career in this respect.

Mr. Flagg presents in his life the peculiarity of a man always in office, never an office-seeker; a man of fixed opinions and beliefs, to which he always adhered, but by so doing never gave offense; religious in his bearing and habits, yet very fond of fun and good cheer; careful not to give offense or notice an affront, and yet keenly alive to word or look; appearing to be passive in public matters, but losing no opportunity to use his influence for the public weal. He has had and has much, very much, to do in shaping the affairs of his town, village, and church. He has lived to see many a faction die out and many a man of local influence shelved, genially smiling to himself at the failures, and filling oftentimes the gaps made by their subsidence.

He was selectman of the town of Needham in 1833, 1842, 1843, 1846-49, seven years in all; assessor of Needham, 1832, 1833, 1839, 1845, 1857-59, 1861-64, 1866-74, twenty years in all; member of the school committee, 1831, 1845-51, 1857-61, 1864-67, 1870-80, twenty-eight years in all. He was appointed town clerk Aug. 19, 1850, and held the office till the incorporation of Wellesley (1881), over thirty years, and was elected town clerk of Wellesley upon the organization of the town, and holds it to the present writing, his third year.

He was appointed treasurer of the town of Needham May 14, 1859, and elected every year till the incorporation of Wellesley, twenty-one years.

He was elected as representative to the General Court in 1834, and again in 1861, where he assisted in patriotic preparation for resistance to rebellion. He has thus aggregated one hundred and eight years of service in public elective office. Besides, he has for over twenty years been justice of the peace, has officiated as commissioner in disputed cases,—a record without a parallel, I believe.

No man will dispute Mr. Flagg's word or doubt his friendship, or find him treacherous or unfair. Even the bitterness following upon the division of the old town, and for which Mr. Flagg was an earnest worker, has not strained to the least degree the cords of friendship which had been so strong heretofore.

Mr. Flagg's accuracy as a town treasurer has been such that no suspicion of incorrectness has ever been brought against his accounts, and the neatness and elegance of his records, as town clerk, have excited the attention and admiration of experts and State officials. The hope finally may be expressed: May he live as long as his ancestors, and preserve his youth as long as he lives.

HENRY WOOD.

The first of this branch of the Wood family to settle in America was Ephraim Wood, who was born in Dunstable, Bedfordshire, England, Dec. 21, 1783. Ephraim was a tailor, and followed that business all his life. He was a very devout Christian, and a deacon in Dr. Sharp's church in Boston. He had three brothers,—William, John, and Charles,—the eldest of whom was for a period of over thirty years pastor of the Baptist Chapel, Toddington, England, and died in 1864 at the age of eighty-one years. Ephraim married for his first wife, Sophia Ann Whitbread, who bore him three children,—George, Ephraim, Jr., and Henry (the subject of this sketch). She died April 12, 1812. In 1814, Ephraim married Jane Trigg. The children by this marriage were William, Joseph, Thomas, Frederick, Jane, and Charlotte. Ephraim was buried in his family tomb under St. Paul's Church, Boston. Henry Wood was born in Dunstable, Bedfordshire, England, Feb. 6, 1811. His boyhood was passed at his home in England until the time the family came to America. His education was chiefly obtained in the common schools of Boston. He was early apprenticed to learn the paper-hanging and wall-staining business. During this apprenticeship he attended school in the winter at Ashby, Mass. Prior to the termination of his apprenticeship he bought his time from his employers and began the same business on his own account, and was successful. Becoming alarmed in the panic of 1837, he sold out his business and shortly after engaged in Philadelphia in the business of poultry-raising on an extensive scale, and by the use of an artificial incubator hatched out many chickens. This business proved to be a failure, for, while the hatching was a complete success, it was impossible to keep the chickens alive. Mr. Wood returned to Boston, and with characteristic enterprise started again in his old business. He also put to good use his knowledge of chemistry, as applied to the manufacture of colors, and found he could manufacture at a handsome profit. For the second time he sold out his paper-hanging business and commenced to make colors in a house on Middlesex Street, Boston, doing the work by hand, producing from six to ten pounds of colors per day. About this time he purchased a farm in Grantville, Mass., now Wellesley Hills, the same being a part of the property now owned by Judge Abbott. Here he continued the manufacture of colors, and as the business increased he found it necessary to procure a place where power could be used, and leased of Charles Rice, of Newton, Lower Falls, a building where there was a water-power, and here enlarged his business, which soon became extensive and profitable.

About this time Mr. Wood had a very severe sickness, but slowly recovered, and while yet hardly convalescent news came of the total destruction of his color-works by fire, and as there was no insurance on the property, in which nearly all of his money was invested, this loss was severely felt by him, bringing privations which were bravely borne by him and his family. It was at this time that the only cow was sold to furnish money to buy bread. Mr. Wood at once sought the aid of his friend, Curtis Haven, and by his timely assistance was able to establish himself again, by rebuilding on the site of the old works. In a short time, by reason of the increasing demand for his colors, Mr. Wood found it necessary to procure a more extensive place for manufacture, and selling his farm at Grantville, he purchased the water-power and grist-mill of Daniel Morse, at West Needham, now known as Lake Crossing, where the business so rapidly increased that it became necessary to make additions to the buildings from time to time. It was while manufacturing at Lake Crossing that Mr. Wood took into partnership his son, under the firm-name of Henry Wood & Son, and the business continued to be profitable and extensive. In 1866, Mr. Wood withdrew from the firm and his son continued, taking for a partner Horace Humphrey, the new firm paying a royalty per pound to Mr. Wood up to the time of his death.

Mr. Wood was the first man to make bricks of Portland cement and sand, with a slight mixture of lime, which bricks are now recognized to be more durable than most red bricks. He experimented with various machines for the manufacture of these bricks, and with varying success, and it was while making these experiments that he received a serious injury, occasioning the loss of three fingers of one hand and two of the other. Mr. Wood was thoroughly convinced of the value of these bricks, and the present condition of a chimney built of this cement mixture by him at Wellesley, in 1857, attests the correctness of his judgment. The value of this material for building has been further developed by the Middlesex Stone Brick Company, organized by his son, Edmund M. The Union Cottage of H. H. Hunnewell, the Heckle House, at Newton Lower Falls, the residences of R. M. Pulsifer and E. B. Haskell, of the Boston Herald, and many other buildings in the vicinity of Boston were built of this material. Henry Wood also started a flax industry in the western part of New York, which, however, did not prove to be a success. Mr. Wood was not active in politics. He was a Republican, and an admirer of William Lloyd Garrison, Charles Sumner, and Wendell Phillips. In religion Mr. Wood was reared a Baptist, as were his ancestors, and early in life made a study of the Bible. Later in life he became quite liberal in his views on religious subjects.

He was generous in his donations to charitable objects, even though they were directed by religious societies that did not hold the same views that he did. Early in life Mr. Wood developed a fondness for music, and often amused his schoolmates, and, in later life, his children with songs and stories. He used often to speak of his extravagance in having paid the sum of twelve dollars to hear Jenny Lind sing in the Fitchburg Railroad Hall during her first visit to America.

Henry Wood married for his first wife Lois B. Rice, who died leaving no children. His second wife was Catharine Frances Jennings, who died Feb. 23, 1836. By this marriage there were two children,—Catharine Frances, who died in infancy, and George Henry, who is still living. Aug. 14, 1836, Mr. Wood married Eliza Hanson Comsett, daughter of William and Mehitable Comsett. By this marriage there were born Edmund M. (1), Martial Duroy (2), Ephraim Albert (3), Sophia Ann Whitbread (4), Martial Franklin Horton (5), and Louis Francis (6).

The versatility of Mr. Wood is shown in the fact of the establishment of the various enterprises here named, and his determined and resolute manner helped him over many a hard spot in his business experiences. While for the early portion of his life he had used liquors and tobacco, on being solicited by a temperance friend to abolish their use he promised to do so, and throwing his tobacco and liquor out of the window, never again used either, and from this time became active in the cause of the Sons of Temperance.

Mr. Wood was generous to the poor and needy, but in a quiet, unostentatious way, as shown by papers found by his executor, which gave evidence of numerous charities of which even his own family were ignorant. He won the respect of all who knew him by his honesty, integrity, and goodness of heart.

Mr. Wood often alluded in a feeling manner to the self-sacrificing character of his beloved wife, Eliza (now living), to whose devotion was due much of the success of his life. Her gentleness of manner served as a counterpoise to his decided nature, and produced a pleasant harmony in household affairs. While doing all the household work for the large family, and practicing strict economy in management, still, with a happy heart and a melodious voice, she made many a dark day full of sunshine and happiness, and gave to her husband and children sympathetic and practical encouragement. Mr. Wood, after a short sickness, died suddenly, of gastritis, at his residence in Boston, May 2, 1881, at the age of seventy years, and was buried in the family lot in Mount Auburn Cemetery.

JUDGE WHITE, OF WELLESLEY.

Judge White, the subject of this sketch, was born in Quincy. He is a lineal descendant of Thomas White, of Weymouth, who was one of the earliest settlers in that town. This Thomas White was born in 1599. The time of his coming to this country is unknown, and his birthplace also, but probably Weymouth, England. In the allotment of land at Weymouth in 1636 he received twenty-one shares. He was admitted freeman in 1635. He was captain of a military company, and for several years a representative in the Legislature. He was a member of the memorable court of November, 1637, which voted to banish Mrs. Ann Hutchinson "from out of our jurisdiction as being a woman not fit for our society." He was often an appraiser of estates, and in a case of public interest he was appointed referee by the General Court. His autograph will, now on file in the Suffolk Registry of Wills, attests a legal turn of mind.

Among his posterity are found, Samuel White, of Taunton, who was born in Braintree and graduated from Harvard College in 1731. He was the first barrister-at-law in Taunton. He presided over the House of Representatives during the period of the Stamp Act. He was of his Majesty's (George III.) Council three years, "and a man of fine personal appearance, of great sagacity, an eloquent speaker, and of irreproachable morals." Francis Baylies, the historian, of Plymouth County, and William Baylies, his brother, an eminent lawyer, the compeer of Webster, and often pitted against him in the trial of causes, were the grandchildren of Samuel White.

Samuel Sumner Wilde (whose grandfather was born in Braintree), a justice of the Supreme Judicial Court of this State, "whose judicial career," says Judge Shaw, "was unexampled by its length, its brilliancy, and its purity."

Lemuel Shaw, chief justice of the same court for upwards of thirty years, whose grandmother, Silence White, was born in Braintree.

Jonathan White, the eminent lawyer of Plymouth County; Caleb B. White, D.D., president of Wabash College, Indiana; his son, Charles B. White, the learned sanitarian of New Orleans; and Thomas Crane, the founder of the Crane Memorial Hall and public library in Quincy, were also his descendants.

Dr. Nathaniel White, of Weymouth, was the great-grandson of the same Thomas White. He was graduated from Harvard College in 1725, was long a physician and surgeon in South Weymouth, and served as such in the French and Indian war.

Nathaniel White, father of Judge White, was the great-grandson of Dr. Nathaniel White, and the fourth of that name. He was born in Weymouth. His mother was Mary, daughter of Thomas Hollis, of Braintree. She lived to the great age of one hundred and three years. He married Mehitable Curtis, daughter of Theophilus Curtis, the fourth of that name, a descendant probably of Deodatus Curtis, of Braintree.

In early life Mr. Nathaniel White was engaged in the boot and shoe trade, and acquired a handsome fortune for those days. Later he entered the coal and lumber business, and lost heavily. This is mentioned merely for the reason that the cause of his loss bears evidence of the character of the man. The Native American party made its first appearance in our politics in the autumn of 1854, and ran its course in that and the two following years. During its ascendancy it brooked no opposition, and with a bigotry of its own, persecuted what it deemed bigotry in others. Mr. White fell under the ban of this secret organization, to his great pecuniary loss, his usual customers refusing to trade with him, thereby forcing him to carry for years, at constantly depreciating prices, a large stock of coal and lumber. Mr. White and his three sons, one of them the subject of this sketch, were of the few American-born voters of Quincy who stood up against that racial and religious persecution. In that small company were Charles Francis Adams, Sr., Gideon F. Thayer, Rev. William P. Lunt, Henry Wood, and Benjamin Curtis.

Mr. Nathaniel White was an active member for many years of the Universalist Society of Quincy, and contributed largely to its support, in personal labor and in money.

He was one of the first in Norfolk County to engage in floriculture and in horticulture. He was passionately fond of flowers and fruits; and on his few acres he cultivated the choicest species of flowering-plants and many varieties of trees, both fruit and forest.

He was a sportsman, skillful in the use of rod and gun. He knew well the fishing grounds on ponds and in the neighboring bays; he was familiar with the haunts of the plover and the brant; he owned a pack of hounds for hunting the fox and the deer. He kept a boat, and in quest of fish and water-fowl frequented the islands and headlands, the nooks and corners in Quincy, Weymouth, and Boston bays, imitating, probably, in these things his ancestor, Thomas White, who more than two centuries before lived hard by, and plied his rude boat over the same waters and for the same purposes.

Mr. White was known in the region round about for his fine horses, one of which was renowned for his fire and speed. With Deacon George Baxter and Ebenezer Bent, he represented Quincy in the House of Representatives in 1840.

Mr. White was a man of marked individuality, of deep convictions and passions. His natural intelligence was strong and masculine. He was utterly fearless in expressing his opinions, deferring very little to the opinions of others. He was a Democrat in sentiment and character as well as in a party sense. He voted for Gen. Jackson with all his heart, as his father did for Thomas Jefferson.

Judge White was the son of Nathaniel and Mehitabel (Curtis) White. He fitted for college at Phillips' Exeter Academy, then under Dr. Soule. He was graduated from Yale College in 1848, and from Harvard Law-School in 1850. He studied law with Hon. Robert Rantoul, Jr., and on his motion was admitted to the bar in the fall of 1851, and immediately after became his partner, with the firm-name of Rantoul & White.

In April, 1851, the trial of Thomas Simms, the fugitive slave, occurred in Boston,—a trial memorable for the argument of Mr. Rantoul on the constitutionality of the fugitive slave law, and also as one of the exciting causes of the civil war; and specially notable in the men who appeared in the case and the characteristic parts which each performed.

The court-house in which the trial took place had been converted into a prison for the custody of Simms, the State refusing the use of its jails for the confinement of fugitive slaves. A hundred police officers guarded it as if it were a Bastille; and Faneuil Hall was occupied for barracks by the police and soldiers, as was the old South Church by British soldiers in the Revolution. The judges and officers of the law, and the persons having business in the courts, were obliged to enter the temple of justice on lowly-bending knees beneath the chains which encompassed it.

Commissioner George Ticknor Curtis sat in the judgment seat. To the application of the counsel of Simms for time to examine the papers and prepare the case, the commissioner gave an emphatic refusal; and to the unanswerable argument of Mr. Rantoul he turned a deaf ear, brandishing in his eyes the Constitution as he understood it. In the mean time, petitions for a writ of habeas corpus were made by Charles Sumner, Richard H. Dana, and Samuel Sewall, and hearings were had on the same by Judges Shaw and Woodbury, but the prayers thereof were denied. Five days after this hearing Commissioner Curtis, first delivering an elaborate opinion on the constitutionality of the law, remitted Simms to slavery.

After the death of Mr. Rantoul, Mr. White formed a connection with Hon. Asa French, subsequently the district attorney for Norfolk and Plymouth Counties, and now one of the judges of the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims. This partnership continued until 1858.

Mr. White took an active interest in the schools of Quincy, serving on the school committee for several years; and also in the Unitarian Society of that town, acting on its parochial committees, and serving many years as teacher and superintendent of its Sunday-school.

In 1851, with Gideon F. Thayer, founder of the Chauncy Hall School, he purchased and edited the Quincy Patriot. Mr. Thayer retired in less than a year, and Mr. White remained sole proprietor and editor until April, 1853. The grateful thanks of a gifted authoress for a favorable editorial on her works, and the hearty commendation of the chief justice of our highest court of an editorial on Gen. Jackson's famous saying, "the constitution as I understand it," constitute the only pleasant memorials in the mind of Mr. White of this brief digression from his professional pursuits.

In 1853, Mr. White was elected a member of the Constitutional Convention from Quincy, with William S. Morton, Esq., as his associate. In this body he was author of the article in the proposed new constitution relating to the House of Representatives. This article with all the others proposed were rejected by the people at the election which passed upon the work of the Convention, yet, in its principle, a few years afterwards, it became a part of the Constitution of the State. The opponents of the new Constitution dwelt largely upon that part which changed the tenure of the judiciary from a life tenure to a period of ten years. Mr. White voted against this change, his opinion being that the judges should be elected by the people, but the tenure of their office should be during good behavior.

Mr. White was elected president of the Young Men's Convention held at Worcester in 1857, which nominated Nathaniel P. Banks for Governor. Mr. Banks had been elected Speaker of the House of Representatives, at Washington, the year before, which was the first civic triumph on a national arena of the anti-slavery party in this country. Mr. Banks was elected Governor by a large majority. The organization which nominated and elected him drew into its ranks the anti-slavery men of this State of all shades of political opinion, and became in subsequent years an integral part of that imperial party which elected Abraham Lincoln President.

From Mr. White's opening address at the Convention we make this extract:

"The ties of party, the recollection of defeats and triumphs, of common joys and common disappointments, in the service of party, have not bound young men together as with links of iron, nor have the generous sentiments of their youth and those dreams of liberty which their youthful studies cherished, died out of their hearts. This is a meeting of those who believe 'success is a duty,' of those who mean to achieve it, of those who believe what they have read is true, that our Constitution was ordained to protect and preserve the liberty of the people, and not to extinguish it; and that, as in ancient times, under Augustus, the spirit of absolute despotism became enthroned in the form of a Republic, so it may happen with us, if the men of this generation are unfaithful to their consciences and their high ideals of liberty.

"Mr. Banks has been tried on a national arena, and has gained one of the great honors of a national struggle. How well he discharged his duties we all know. He taught the country this useful lesson, that an ardent love of liberty is not incompatible with a full and faithful discharge of duty in national affairs, and how easy and safe will be the transition at a day, we trust, not very remote, when the administration of the national government shall pass into the hands of statesmen, whose sentiments and convictions shall be in consonance with those of the founders of the Constitution, and therefore fundamentally the reverse of those who now administer it."

In July, 1858, Mr. White was appointed judge of Probate and Insolvency for Norfolk County, which office he now holds. To become a judge of that court is, in many of its aspects, to become civiliter mortuus, to become a sort of father confessor, having to hear of broken fortunes and broken lives, of sorrow and distress, with a large authority to help the unfortunate. This, however, is not the chief of his functions. In the legislation of the last half-century there has been an ever-increasing tendency to extend the power of the Probate Court, so that now it has a larger jurisdiction than any like court in this country or in Great Britain, the object kept in view seeming to be to give that court exclusive original jurisdiction of all subjects of which it has cognizance, with right of appeal to the Supreme Court.

Aside from his judicial duties, the chief employment of Judge White is in the management of trust estates.

In politics, Judge White has followed, with unequal steps, his early friend, Robert Rantoul, Jr. Mr. Rantoul was taunted in his day with being a doctrinaire, which his friends construed as being a man in advance of his contemporaries on social and political questions. He was a strict constructionist. He had no respect for that mode of interpreting the Constitution which found in the incident a wider and more prolific authority than was given in the original grant of power.

He did not think the Constitution was a sacred ark for the preservation of slavery, nor did he agree with those who thought it a covenant with death and an agreement with hell.

He held that trade and commerce should be free as the winds and waves, and that a protective tariff was a hindrance to such freedom. That it was a system of monopolies, like in character to feudalism or slavery, kept up for the enrichment of the few at the sacrifice of interests of the many.

Judge White married Frances Mary Edwena Noyes, only child of Edward Noyes, druggist, of Boston, junior member of the firm of Maynard & Noyes, and one of the founders of the Central Congregational Church in that city. Mrs. White was a great-great-granddaughter of Rev. Oliver Peabody, a graduate from Harvard College in 1721, and the first settled minister in Natick, and successor to the Apostle Eliot, as preacher to the Indians. Mrs. White was a great-granddaughter of Dr. William Deming, of Wellesley. Her grandfather was Rev. Thomas Noyes, who was born at Acton, and was graduated from Harvard College in 1795. He was pastor, for thirty-four years, of the West Needham (now Wellesley) Congregational Church. His father was with the Acton men in the Concord fight, on the 19th of April, 1775. All his grandsons living at the breaking out of the Rebellion joined the Union army,—Frank, Charles, George, and Thomas,—all brave from a religious sense of duty. Every one was wounded in battle. George was permanently disabled by the hardships of war, Charles returned to his home to die from his wounds, Francis Henry was killed at Antietam, 1862, and lies there in an unknown grave.

The mother of Mrs. White was Clarissa, the youngest of seven children of Benjamin and Sarah (Kingsbury) Slack. The ancestors of Mr. Slack came from Yorkshire, England, and settled in Boston in 1660. On the 19th of April, 1775, when twelve years of age, Benjamin Slack was taken, with the other junior members of his father's family, amid the flying bullets of the British, to Needham (now Wellesley Falls), where his descendants have to this day continued to live. He was a gentleman of the old school, given to hospitality, active in town and church affairs, faithful to the many trusts committed to his care, a Unitarian in religion, and a Federalist in his politics.

His only grandson, Charles Benjamin Slack, son of Thomas W. Slack, served in the Union army in the civil war, was first lieutenant in the Thirteenth Massachusetts Battery, Capt. Nims, was at the siege of Port Hudson, under Gen. Banks, and was wounded at Shreveport, in the Red River campaign.

The children of Judge White are George Rantoul White (Harvard College, 1886), Mary Hawthorne White, Edward Noyes White.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

NORWOOD.

BY FRANCIS TINKER.

THE town of Norwood was originally the South or Second Precinct of Dedham. The Neponset River forms its eastern boundary, and from its broad meadows the land gently rises towards the west and north-west, forming a warm and sunny slope, which is decorated with tasteful and pleasant homes; with church spires, and turrets from the more stately mansions, rising above the leafy canopy, presents to the eye of the beholder a panorama of quiet peace and beauty; while the mind naturally turns back and asks who first smoothed these pleasant fields, and caused the "wilderness to blossom as the rose?" and the feeling springs up that the unrecorded history of one's town is like the unmarked graves of parents, evidences both the want of a proper respect and filial gratitude towards those who have gone before, and who may have sowed in tears where we reap in joy; and if I can but succeed in recalling the names of those who acted so well their part, who aided, however humbly, in laying the foundation of our civil and religious institutions, or rescue from oblivion the memory of even one who gave his life for his country, I shall feel amply rewarded. Whose axe first broke the stillness of the forests, or from whose humble cabin the smoke first rose and curled, it may be impossible to tell; and if I should attempt to enter this field of inquiry, I might trespass upon what perhaps rightfully belongs to another,¹ and will pass directly to the first attempts made to secure the organization of a precinct, in order to erect a meeting-house for the public worship of God. The first petitions to the "Great and General Court" were presented by John Everett and others, of Stoughton, and Joseph Smith and others, of Dedham, Dec. 23, 1726, and referred to a committee. The same bounds were described in these petitions as were subsequently granted. Orders of notice were served upon the towns mentioned; but remonstrance was made, and these petitions were dismissed. The next is a petition of Joseph Ellis and others, stating the great difficulties under which they labor in being so far from church, and that they have applied to the town for their consent to be set off as a distinct precinct, or that the meeting-house be moved nearer to the centre of the town, which they have refused to grant; and praying that a committee might be appointed by the court to consider their circumstances. This petition was referred to the next General Court, and Messrs. Peabody and Brown, with such as the honorable board shall appoint, were constituted a committee at the charge of the petitioners, to repair to the northerly part of the town of Dedham and view the same, and report to this court on Tuesday the fifth day of December next. On this petition, entered July 4, 1727, they report,— "That the Committee appointed by the Great and General Court, to take into consideration the circumstances of the Town of Dedham, and the petition of the southerly part of the said Town, having attended the said service, report as follows: That viewing the situation, and considering the circumstances, are of opinion that it will be inconvenient to grant the prayer of the petition at present; but for as much as it appears to the Committee that the major part of the petitioners labor under great difficulties in the winter season, in attending the Public Worship of God, by reason of their distance from the Meeting-House, the Committee propose that the Public Worship of God be performed by a Minister, to be provided by the petitioners, in some private house, as near the center as may be, for five months in the year, viz., November, December, January, February, and March, and that there be allowed thirty shillings per Sabbath for the said service, the charge to be borne by the whole Town, and to continue until the further order of the Court, all of which is humbly submitted by order of the Committee. In Council accepted, in the House concurred in, and consented to by the Governor."

From the records of the General Court it appears that sundry other petitions were received from John Everett, of Stoughton, Joseph Smith, John Guild, Samuel Everett, Samuel Bullard, James Fales, and Ebenezer Healy, of Dedham, and a committee appointed to report at the next session of the court, on what they think proper for the court to do in this whole affair. Nov. 19, 1729, the committee made the following report through their chairman, the Hon. William Dudley:

"The Committee appointed by this Court to take under consideration the several petitions (before referred to), and having been at ye Town of Dedham and Stoughton, and heard what ye several Parties had to say, as well as view the circumstances of ye inhabitants, and their situation, Humbly report on ye whole their opinion as follows, viz.: that all that part of Stoughton lying on ye westward of Neponset River, and to the Northward of Traphole Brook, to Walpole line, be added to, and incorporated into the Town of Dedham, with all ye inhabitants, which with the Southern part of Dedham, we humbly are of opinion, be made into a distinct Township, the boundaries of ye whole to be as follows: beginning at a place called Purgatory, on Neponset River, where it may most conveniently take ye house and home lot of Josiah Fisher, Jr.; from thence to a place called the Cross ways, taking in ye house and home lot of John House; from thence so as to take in ye house and home lot of Lusher Gay; from thence so as to take in ye house and home lot of John Baker; from thence to the line for the Precinct, at Springfield (now Dover), so as to take in the house and home lot of Amos Fisher; thence by ye said line to Bubbling Brook; and from thence to Walpole line; and by ye said line to Traphole Brook; and by ye said Brook to Neponset River; and by ye same to ye first mentioned station, and that ye petitioners have leave to bring in a bill accordingly. And whereas there has been, and still remains an unhappy difference among the inhabitants about placing a Meeting-House for the Public Worship of God, it is therefore humbly proposed that the said House may be ordered in such place and time as a Committee of this court shall appoint, so as to accommodate the inhabitants of Dedham, or of all the inhabitants of this proposed Town, and the Committee propose that the Western part of Dedham be set off by that Town for a Precinct, to be confirmed accordingly, and that the inhabitants thereof be allowed to congregate, as now they do, till the further order of this court, Provided, they do their proportion of the charge of supporting a minister where they leave."

This report was accepted, and ordered that Edmund Quincy, Esq., and such of the House of Representatives shall appoint, be a committee for placing the meeting-house of the proposed town.

"In Council October 3, 1730, Read and ordered that the Prayer of this petition be so far granted, as that the South-westerly part of the Town of Dedham, together with the westerly part of ye Town of Stoughton, according to the Bounds expressed in the Report of a Committee of this Court, in December last, be erected into a township, and that the Petitioners bring in a bill. By an additional act John Everett, "a principal inhabitant," was authorized to call the first "meeting of ye Precinct," and he served his warrant on each person qualified to vote, requiring them in his Majesty's name, to assemble at the house of John Ellis, Oct. 22, 1730, to choose precinct officers. At that meeting John Everett was chosen moderator; James Fales, Jr., clerk; John Everett, James Fales, Jr., Ebenezer Healy, assessors, and instructed to call the meetings of the precinct. Nov. 9, 1730, fifty pounds were raised and appropriated to secure a preacher for six months,—three months to be at the house of John Ellis,¹ and three months at the house of Nathaniel Guild, if it can be obtained; if not, the entire time at the house of John Ellis. Joseph Ellis and John Dean were chosen a committee, and instructed to procure an "orthodox minister to preach the gospel." Ebenezer Dean was chosen treasurer, and Samuel Holmes, collector. At this second meeting it was "voted to build a Meeting-House for ye Public Worship of God in this Precinct; to be forty feet in length and thirty-six in width, and erected at the centre of the Precinct; and Ebenezer Dean, Joseph Ellis, William Everett, Nathaniel Guild, and Ebenezer Healy were constituted a building committee, and instructed to procure a frame fit to set up, or raise," and one hundred pounds were granted for that purpose. Jan. 20, 1731, chose Joseph Ellis² and Samuel Bullard a committee to procure a sworn surveyor to find the centre of the precinct. Ebenezer Dean was selected to hold the box on Sabbath days, so that any one might have a chance to contribute something for the support of the gospel, and if one chose, he could write on a slip of paper the amount he would give, with his name, and pay the same some other time, and have it "allowed on his Precinct rate." The time for holding their annual meeting for the choice of officers was fixed for the second Monday in March, and has been continued to the present time. May 31, 1731, "the Precinct being regularly assembled at the house of John Ellis," John Everett was chosen moderator, and then "it was put to vote to see if it be ye mind of ye Precinct to have a loving and friendly conference together; passed in the affirmative period June ye 7th." It was voted to leave the placing of a meeting-house for this precinct to a committee of the General Court, and instructed William Bullard and John Everett "to address the General Court, and Petition for a Committee to place ye Meeting-House for this Precinct." In answer to the petition presented by the gentlemen named, a committee from the General Court visited the precinct, and reported through their chairman, the Hon. Joseph Wadsworth, of the council:

"The committee that was appointed at this session of the General Court, on the 11th day of this June, to repair to the precinct set off some time the last year from Dedham and Stoughton, to view and consider the situation and circumstances thereof, and report what may be proper to be done, do report as follows, viz.: That we have viewed the precinct, considered the circumstances of the land, and heard the pleas and allegations of the people, and find them very unsatisfied among themselves as to a place for the meeting-house to stand on. Then nominated four places several, or separate each from the other, on which, as to ourselves, we would report on any of them. But to make them unite if possible, desired that they would fix on that particular spot of the four, they liked best, on which they called a Precinct meeting, and on the 21st of this June, 1731, voted that it was the mind of the Precinct to fix the meeting-house on the south end of the common land lying between John Cobb's and Dr. Richards; and we considering the circumstances of the whole, as to highways, Judge the Southermost part of said Common Land, that is, that part of it as may be convenient for the Building and accommodation for the Meeting-House itself, is the best place to set it on; all of which is humbly submitted.

"JOSEPH WADSWORTH,¹ in name of the Committee.

"In Council read and ordered, That this report be accepted, and that the Meeting-House in the New Precinct in Dedham and Stoughton be placed accordingly, and the amount of the Committee's time and expense, amounting to the sum of four pounds four shillings be allowed; and be paid by the said Precinct to the Committee.

"In the House of Representatives read and concurred.

"Consented to J. BELCHER, Governor."

Representative this year from Dedham, Joseph Ellis; Representative this year from Stoughton, Moses Gill.

From the records of the meeting held June 21st, to which reference is made by the Committee of the General Court, it appears the places they selected were Onion's Knoll, Onion's Bars,² the rye field so called, and the south end of the common land, near the house of Dr. Richards. This spot they selected as the least objectionable of the four, either of which would take the majority of the inhabitants of the precinct nearly half a mile beyond the unfinished house which was erected at a vote passed at the second meeting of the precinct, ordering it to be placed at the centre of the precinct, as ascertained by a sworn surveyor, and for which one hundred pounds were granted July 14th, twenty-one days later, they vote they will not grant money to build a meeting-house near the land of Dr. Richards, "and it was put to vote; if it be the mind of the Precinct to grant a sum of money to defray the charge of ye Committee lately with us from the General Court, and it passed in the negative;" at this meeting they again refused to grant any money to build a meeting-house on the place ordered by the General Court, and confirmed the same again September 3d. During this year the precinct was convened twelve times, and a house for the public worship of God was the burden of their thoughts. A meeting, March 10, 1732, opened with a proposition "to support preaching by contribution till the Precinct were better agreed," which was rejected, and December 5th, one hundred and twenty pounds were granted "to support preaching six months in a house erected near Joseph Ellis,³ and no longer, and then six months at the house near Benjamin Fairbanks. This was called the centre meeting-house, and was erected upon the spot ordered at the second meeting of the precinct, in 1730. Feb. 26, 1733, William Bullard, William Everett, Ebenezer Dean, Ebenezer Healy, and James Fales, Jr., were chosen a committee, and instructed to petition the General Court to reverse their former order for building a meeting-house on the common land near the house of John Cobb, and to establish ye place according to the vote of the precinct, and to order the three hundred pounds already granted, to be laid out on the said centre meeting-house. This called forth the following order from the General Court, on the petition of Joseph Ellis and others from the northerly part of the precinct, presented April 13, 1734:

"Ordered," on the said Petition, "That the prayer of the Petition be so far granted, as that the Inhabitants of the Precinct within-mentioned, do within the space of twelve months from the date hereof, erect and finish a Meeting-House at the place stated by a committee of this Court, the 24th day of June, 1731, the Petitioners with their Estates be hereby, and are set off from said Precinct, and again laid to the first Precinct, in the Town of Dedham, whereunto they originally belonged; in the House of Representatives Read and concurred. Consented to, J. Belcher, Gov." Three other Petitions were presented to the General Court by Joseph Ellis and his Friends, enumerating their grievances, and the determination of the Inhabitants not to depart from the place first marked out by the surveyor as the Centre of the Precinct; and the controversy was only closed by the Precinct Petitioning the General Court for a "Committee to come and view the situation, and circumstances of the Precinct, and more especially of the Northerly Petitioners, and to set off to the old Precinct in Dedham, as many of said northerly Petitioners as upon their view they shall judge most for ye peace and advantage of both Precincts, and the Honorable support of ye gospel in them; and to State a place for a Meeting-House for the remaining Precinct; and Ebenezer Dean, William Everett, William Bullard, and James Fales were appointed a Committee to manage the affairs, and to answer the Petitions of the Clapboard-tree People. In answer to the Northerly Petitioners the Court Say That Joseph Ellis and others, with the two Fishers, and Aaron Ellis with their Estates, be laid back to the Old Precinct; the others to remain in the South Precinct." In response to the Committee from the Precinct the Committee from the General Court Report, "Having naturally considered the same, as well as that of the other Inhabitants that are gone from said Precinct are of opinion that the place for a Precinct Meeting House be between the Houses of Ebenezer Dean and Nathaniel Guild, on the Northwest side of the way to Walpole, about nine rods from said Guild's fence, in the quarter of an acre of land given and granted to the Said Precinct, by the said Dean, under his hand and seal acknowledged, as may appear; all of which is submitted by the order of the Committee. SAMUEL THAXTER.

"In Council read and accepted.

"In the House of Representatives read and concurred.

"Consented to, J. BELCHER, Governor."

Sept. 12, 1734, the precinct instructed William Bullard and Ebenezer Dean to petition the General Court "for liberty to rate all the meadows which lie in Stoughton, but are within the bounds of the South Precinct in Dedham. On this petition, Samuel Thaxter, from the committee, reported that having considered the within petition, are of opinion that the meadow and other lands lying in the South Precinct, and which is in that part thereof, which was and now is Stoughton, be liable to pay their just proportion of all precinct rates, also all the owners of those lands that live in, and may be inhabitants of, Dedham, which report was accepted by the Council and House of Representatives, and approved by the Governor.

It is a matter of record that during this long and perplexing controversy, the southerly part of the precinct never for once asked their brethren from the northerly part to even cross the centre of the precinct.

The number of persons taxed by the town in 1736, two years later, in the Second or South Precinct was seventy-eight, and in the Third, or Clapboard-tree, fifty-two.

Jan. 4, 1735, the precinct "voted to build a meeting-house on the land formerly Ebenezer Dean's, which is the place a committee of the Great and General Court has ordered a meeting-house to be erected" for said precinct; and John Everett, William Bacon, John Dean, and Daniel Draper were constituted a committee to carry the above vote into effect, and the balance of the one hundred pounds granted Nov. 9, 1730, were appropriated for that purpose. February 6th a further grant of one hundred and fifty pounds was made, and Nathaniel Lewis and John Farrington were added to the committee. September 11th, voted "to give a minister a call to settle with them," and agreed to hear three gentlemen in order to come to a choice, namely, Mr. Balch, Mr. Loring, and Mr. Skinner. February 9th, made choice of the Rev. Thomas Balch for their pastor and teacher, and granted him as a settlement two hundred pounds, and an annual salary of one hundred and twenty pounds, and sixteen cords of wood, so long as he should continue with them in the gospel ministry. Daniel Draper, Nathaniel Colburn, Richard Ellis, Ebenezer

Kingsbury, Daniel Draper, Jr., Timothy Draper, Hugh Dixon, and William Clark entered their protest "because they have a petition in the General Court in hopes to be released from the precinct. On this petition, which was entered Jan. 16, 1735, and on March 26, 1736, the General Court passed the following order:

"That the petitioners with their estates, from and after the term of three years from this time, be and hereby are dismissed from the South Precinct and are annexed to their neighbors at the Clapboard-tree, and pay charges there. John Cobb, William Bullard, Nathaniel Lewis, Samuel Farrington, who belong to the South Precinct, are still to be continued to do duty and receive privilege with them as heretofore. The obligation to Draper continued.

April 25th, an affirmative answer was received from Mr. Balch, and June 2d, "agreed to keep a day of fasting and prayer, in order to have an ordination, and granted twenty pounds to meet the expenses of the same. A committee was chosen to procure ministers to carry on the work of the day," also a committee to issue letters missive convening an ordaining council, and provide entertainment for the same. In compliance with the foregoing vote, June 23d was solemnly observed as a day of fasting and prayer. The Rev. Messrs. Dexter, of Dedham, Cotton, of Providence, Dunbar, of Stoughton, and Payson, of Walpole, assisted on the occasion, and the church was organized and a covenant adopted which remains to the present day.

"Jan. ye 9, 1738. By an act of the General Court, Capt. Ezra Morse and his sons, Ezra, Jr. and Joseph, with their estates, were set off from Walpole and annexed to Dedham, and to the Second Precinct. Also that part of Stoughton which was within the limits of the South Precinct is annexed to Dedham, and the Neponset River is made the dividing line between the towns of Dedham and Stoughton. The original line being about one mile west of that river; and a few years later a considerable portion of the estate of Nathaniel Summer, Esq., was set off from Sharon and annexed to Dedham to do duty and enjoy privileges with the second precinct. 1740, at the annual meeting voted to build a school-house twenty-one feet in length, and seventeen in breadth, near the house or frame of James Thorp, on the southwesterly side of the same; and forty pounds were appropriated for that purpose.

"In 1740 the British Government fitted out an expedition against the Spanish West India Islands, and Massachusetts was called upon to furnish five hundred troops. Samuel Haven, Esq., in the second Centennial address at Dedham, tells us that 'six men from the south parish in Dedham alone, of this town were among those that perished.' The names of only two have been preserved, Eleazer Farrington and Walter Hixon."

² Holmes, in his Annals, says the sickness seems to have been almost as mortal as the plague; of the five hundred only fifty ever returned.

June 2, 1744, war, which had previously broken out between England and France, was proclaimed in Boston. Jan. 26, 1745, the General Court, after debating the subject all day, approved of the expedition against Louisburg, on the island of Cape Breton, as planned by Governor Shirley; and Col. William Pepperell, of Kittery, Me., then a part of Massachusetts, was appointed to the command. Says the Rev. Thomas Balch, pastor of this church, "Having an inclination, and being desired by the Committee of War, to attend the army as one of the chaplains in the expedition against Cape Breton, I accordingly obtained the consent of my people on March 11, 1745, and on the 13th took my leave of my family and people. Arrived in safety and health at Canso, on the 2d day of April, sailed from Canso to Cape Breton, on April 29th, entered into Chapeaurouge Bay the next morning, and soon after went on shore. The siege of Louisburg continued until June 17th, on which day we entered and took possession of that strong and important place, upon terms of capitulation. Sailed from Louisburg for New England July 11th. Arrived in safety at Boston on the 27th of said month, 1745, Laus Deo."¹

Rev. Benjamin Balch acted as chaplain in our small navy, at some time during the same war.

Quite a number of Mr. Balch's parishioners (if not a company) must have accompanied him in this expedition, for we find that Capt. Eleazer Fisher² died at Boston, on his way home, and was buried there.

Lieut. Ebenezer Sumner died soon after his return, aged twenty-three years. Mr. Balch says he was his brother-in-law, and a young man of much promise. John Thorp lived to reach Boston, and died there. Nathaniel Coney, aged forty years, and Samuel Thorp, aged thirty-three years, died at Cape Breton. Hugh Delap, a skillful gunner and engineer, was killed at the siege, by the bursting of a cannon. Michael Bright of this precinct returned, also Samuel and William Wetherbee's names are given by Mrs. Ellis as members of this expedition.

Sir William in one of his letters to Governor Shirley says two men were killed by the bursting of a forty-two-pounder, and one wounded.

The success which crowned the enterprise was purchased at a fearful loss of life; six worthy citizens from this little community fell victims to the hardships and privations they were forced to endure.

In 1743, from a contribution made by sundry individuals a lot of land was purchased of Mr. David Fales for the use of the precinct. In 1745 voted to take down the hindermost body seats, in order to accommodate the women that bring children to meeting. November of this year chose Nathaniel Sumner precinct clerk, and assessor in place of Capt. Eleazer Fisher, who died in Boston, on his way home from Cape Breton. In 1751 twelve persons were chosen to oversee the boys on the Lord's day,³ and their official acts must have met with an approval, for the same number were chosen for four succeeding years.

Again the sound of war is heard in our little community, the hosts of England and France are contending for the supremacy in North America. Massachusetts, ever faithful to the mother-country, calls her sons to arms, and Capt. Eliphalet Fales with his company treads his way through the wilderness to the shores of Lake George, with First Sergt. Moses Fisher, Corp. Benjamin Holden, William Woodcock, John Hawse, John Scott, Ebenezer Everett, and David Fairbanks from the South Precinct; Sergt. Timothy Ellis, Samuel Richards, and five others from Dedham; Lieut. Ephraim Wesson and eleven men from Groton; James Fales, clerk, from Littleton; Samuel Boyden, drummer, and three men from Medfield; three from Walpole; four from Boston, two of whom were negro servants, and Samuel Pogent, an Indian, from Natick. Capt. Fales' enlistment dates April 5, 1745, and his term of service was thirty-nine weeks and three days. The Massachusetts troops were placed under the command of Gen. William Johnson, of New York, and were engaged in the bloody battles of September 8th, in which the French under Baron Dieskau were defeated, and their commander mortally wounded and taken prisoner. Of Capt. Fales' company First Sergt. Moses Fisher and John Scott from our little community and Isaac Patch, Joseph Richards, and Nathaniel Pollard from Groton were killed.⁴

Before taking leave of Capt. Fales, allow me to copy the following, showing the care with which things were passed upon in those days:

² Capt. Fisher was one of the fifteen original members of the church, and precinct clerk at the time of his decease.

From Capt. William Bacon's² muster-roll, made Oct. 11, 1756, by the muster master-general of the provincial army, we copy the following in order that we may see through what fearful trials the blessings we enjoy were secured. We can trace their toilsome march even now by the trail of the sick and departed ones. At the date of this return two had fallen in battle or been taken prisoners, namely, Josiah Lyon and Ebenezer Pratt; six had died,—George Cleveland, William Smith, Benjamin Leidiot, Joseph Ephraim, Hosea Abraham; and twenty-three were sick, and from these we must add to the fatal roll Thomas Balch, son of the Rev. Thomas Balch, who died at Albany; Solomon Bullard, at Leicester, on his return; Timothy Lewis, at Lake George; John Woodcock, at Fort Edward; Joseph Lyon, sergeant, at Stillwater; William Lewis and Joseph Whitemore,³ at Albany. June 22, 1759, Eleazer Everett died at Fort Cumberland; Nov. 20, 1760, Simon Pittee, on his return from Crown Point; and December 10th, James Weatherbee, soon after his return from Montreal.⁴ Other soldiers were undoubtedly drawn from our precinct, but I have not succeeded in securing their names.

With the conquest of Canada the lilies of France disappeared, and peace and prosperity returned to the colonies.

March 9, 1758, chose Ebenezer Dean, Jr., Lieut. Fales, Benjamin Fuller, and Aaron Guild to set the ² Capt. William Bacon was one of the fifteen original members who formed the church in this place, and probably never fully recovered from the sickness contracted in this campaign. Died May 21, 1761, in the forty-fifth year of his age. Capt. Bacon's company was mostly from the towns of Dedham, Roxbury, and Walpole.

Psalms, and "voted that all the school money should be laid out in women schooling." 1762, March 4th, "voted to build a new meeting-house, and chose a committee of twelve to select a suitable place, and report at some future meeting." March 14, 1763, "voted ten choiresters to lead in the singing the Psalms on the Lord's day; and in order to prevent discord and secure harmony, nine more by vote were added" to the musical number. 1763 the bounds between the two parishes were renewed and defined as follows:

"The line beginning from ye center⁵ between ye meeting Houses; then runs North 50 degrees East to the place where the House of Ebenezer Ellis stood; from thence North one degree west to the Cross ways. The distance between ye meeting Houses is one and a half mile and thirty three rods.

Wm. Avery; thence more northerly to the eastwardly corner of land now belonging to Capt. Daniel Gay; thence more westerly to the Cross ways near the house of Jeremiah Dean; and are of opinion that said line ought to be the dividing line between said Precincts, and for the future to be esteemed as such, excepting such lands as have since the setting off the South Precinct been by the General Court laid to the First Parish in Dedham, which is humbly submitted.

March, 1762, voted to build a meeting-house, and chose twelve to select and secure a suitable place to erect the same; but objection was made to the several sites that were reported, and it was not till March 25,

⁵ On the division of the parish the committee of the General Court fixed the dividing line midway between the two parishes; then placed the estate of Benjamin Fairbanks which lay entirely south and east of that line to the West Parish, and he was a member of that church; but upon the records connected with this church the following occurs: "December 18, 1757, died Mr. Benjamin Fairbanks of Clapboard-tree a constant hearer in this Parish aged sixty three years;" and his remains rest in the yard his kindness gave to the parish. All his estate lay in this parish.

"It is not only a disgrace to this Parish, but a reproach to the Christian Religion, to suffer the house of public worship to lie in so ruinous a condition; besides, unless we come into measures soon to build one, public worship must soon be laid aside amongst us for want of a place to meet in, as the old meeting-house cannot stand long in its present ruinous condition. We all readily grant that a better meeting-house is wanted, and efforts have been made to come into peaceable methods so as to build one; but they have proved ineffectual on account of differing sentiments as to the place on which to build it. However, we would not altogether give over the matter, being persuaded that a little moderation, candor, and condescension would so compromise things as that so good and necessary a work might go on. We, therefore, the subscribers, inhabitants on the northerly side of Neponset River, will, and do, hereby agree that a meeting-house should be erected on the land of the heirs of Benjamin Fuller, deceased, at the head of Penniman's Lane, so called, as near the corner of his orchard as the land will allow, if our brethren and friends on the southerly side of said river will meet us there; and we can go on united in love and peace, and we desire that a meeting may be called to see if such a union may be effected." This invitation was signed by thirty members of the parish, and received the following response from fifteen members: "We who live on the southerly side of said river agree thereto."

"Voted to dig a hole 15 inches deep under every Post of the Meeting-House, To which Mr. David Fisher desired that his protest might be entered." Nov. 17, 1768, commenced their preparation to build, and June 26, 1769, was fixed upon for putting up the frame of the new and second meeting-house. Each person who desired was permitted to furnish his proportional part of the materials. The clapboards were to be split and purchased in Boston. An order was adopted "directing the committee to provide a dinner, and sufficient drink for the men that did the work."

Jan. 5, 1770, it was "voted to sell the old meeting-house at auction, reserving the right to use the same till October 1." March the 12th, in the disposal of the pews of the new church, it was voted, "to set the highest pew at five pounds, lawful money, and then to abate one shilling and four pence on every several choice, falling one shilling and four pence upon every pew till the whole were sold; and that he that was highest on the rate should have his first choice, and that every one should have his choice according to the tax he paid." And thus the fathers in their time dignified the pews. From the records of the many following years it appears that they walked together in peace and harmony to the house of God; the deacons still reading the hymns,¹ and "Bangor" sung as it hath hitherto been, by continuing the bass.

March 20, 1774, granted the sum of £73 8s. 6d. towards paying the funeral expenses of the Rev. Mr. Balch. On the death of Mr. Balch the precinct chose John Ellis, David Fisher, and Aaron Guild a committee to supply the desk. April 16, 1776, "voted to concur with the church in extending a call to the Rev. Jabez Chickering. Two hundred pounds were granted as a settlement, and a salary of sixty-six pounds, thirteen shillings, and four pence, so long as he shall continue to minister to the Precinct, also Fifteen Cords of wood, and the use of the Church Meadow² given by Dea. Ezra Morse."

We will now for a moment turn to the opening scenes of the Revolutionary war, to Samuel Adams' "ever-glorious morning," and repeat the roll-call of our little band who hurried towards the scene of action on the 19th of April, 1775:

There were others from this parish who hurried forward. Mr. Israel Everètt, who lived where Mr. Rooney now lives, and in memory of whom Everètt Street was named, was wounded, but the names are so similar in the several parishes of the town I shall only give the names of some few, of whose residence there is no doubt, leaving the remainder for some future time. In Capt. Joseph Guild's company, First Parish, in the Northern campaign of 1775 and 1776, we find three sons of Zebediah Clark (Archelus and Samuel, who died at or near Ticonderoga), Robert Little and Benjamin Fisher, Jr. (who died at the same place), Daniel Clark, Sergt. Eliphalet Thorp, Edward Bullard, Ebenezer Sumner, John Smith, Aaron Guild, John Rugles, Abner Pettee, John Smith. In Capt. John Gay's company, from the West Parish, occur the names of Sergt. William Everètt, Silas Morse, Josiah Everètt, Hezekiah Turner. Of Capt. Aaron Guild's company of three months' men a large number were from this parish. Some persons made several campaigns, and there is but little doubt that every able-bodied person of suitable age was called upon to do military duty at some period during the war of the Revolution. In the spring of 1776 two soldiers on the march for New York died, one at Capt. Ebenezer Everètt's and one at the house of Mr. Benjamin Fisher. No record reveals to us their names. Peacefully they rest with our honored dead.

It is hardly possible for us at the present day to conceive of the hardships and sufferings the Revolutionary fathers were called to endure. The province tax of the town of Dedham in 1775 was three hundred and seventy pounds, six shillings, nine pence, and one farthing; in 1778, eighteen hundred and fifty-seven pounds, thirteen shillings, and ten pence, and it was required to be collected and paid into the State treasury by the first day of October. In addition to this increased taxation, frequent requisitions were made for beef, blankets, shirts, shoes, and stockings, enough at least to supply the town's quota in the Continental army.¹ By a vote of the town the quota of men from each precinct was to be in proportion to the taxes paid by each, and the several precincts assumed the business of paying such soldiers as were members of their own body or employed by them.² In 1777, the Second Precinct having raised their quota of men for the Continental service without the town's bounty or any part of it, their proportion of the taxes assessed for paying this bounty is committed to the constable of that precinct to be disposed of as the precinct shall see fit. But if the precinct was prompt in filling its quota, they were most negligent in preserving the names of those who took their lives in their hands, and went forth to do battle for their country.³ On the books of the church we find the names of some few who died in the service; but if no other record existed except that preserved in the parish, it might truly be said, "the dead live, and the living die." From a report made by a committee constituted in 1787 to examine the accounts of the collector and treasurer of the war rates: that the whole amount committed to Eliphalet Fales was nine hundred and thirty-six pounds, twelve shillings, nine pence, and three farthings; that the treasurer had paid out seven hundred and seventy-two pounds, seventeen shillings, eight pence, and three farthings. One hundred and forty-five pounds, four shillings, and seven pence remain in the hands of the treasurer, and one hundred and sixty-three pounds, fifteen shillings, and one penny uncollected, which they value at seventy-seven pounds and eighteen shillings. Allowing the same depreciation as was made by the committee on what was paid by the treasurer, it would not vary much from twelve hundred dollars in our present currency. When we reflect upon their scanty means, their small numbers,⁴ and the greatness of that power which they defied, we bow in reverence before their lofty heroism and devotion to those great principles which they held God had established, and which no human legislation had power to abridge or destroy. insurrection in 1787 caused not a ripple here; men who stood with Washington in the trenches around Boston, or trod the frozen snows of Canada, were too loyal to revolt against the constituted authorities of the State, and promptly responded to the requisition upon¹ Capt. Gay, for twelve men for thirty days, to march in midwinter to Worcester, to protect the courts and disperse the deluded followers of Capt. Daniel Shays. In the division of the school money in 1796 we find the following: For the South Branch $52.60; tax on dogs,² $8.00. For the Middle Branch, $98.12; tax on dogs, $18.00. For the North Branch, $15.32; tax on dogs, $2.00; so that the taxation of dogs for the instruction of children is no new thing.

That the parish sought to make the most of what means they had may be seen by the following:

"That the money of the Parish be let out for three years, to them that will make the Parish the best present on each one hundred dollars;" which was done, the bids varying from four dollars and fifty cents to five dollars and twenty-five cents.

March 12th died the Rev. Jabez Chickering, for thirty-six years the pastor and teacher of this parish. April 26, 1815, Rev. William Cogswell was ordained as his successor. March 13, 1826, voted to build a new meeting-house, and chose a committee of fifteen to select a suitable place to locate the same. At a subsequent meeting they reported they could not agree. Seven were then chosen, and their report was the same. Up to this period their expenses had been met by direct taxation upon the polls and estates of the members of the parish. They now vote to secure the same by subscription. March 28, 1828, thirty-five members close their connection with the first society and connect themselves with the religious society called Universalist. April 25th of this year they renew their vote to build, and again constituted a committee of fifteen, who reported that the place where the house of Mrs. Abigail Everett stands is the most suitable for the said meeting-house, and that the land can be obtained at a reasonable price, and that individuals agree to clear the land of the buildings free of expense to the society," which report was accepted, and it was voted to build the said house "by a subscription of shares." The land was valued at one hundred and fifty dollars, and the shares, sixty in number, were placed at two dollars and fifty cents each and conveyed by deed to the several proprietors jointly, and they were at the expense of erecting the meeting-house and were owners of the pews.³ The old meeting-house was taken down and the materials used in the construction of the new one. The pews on the lower floor, thirty-three in number, were appraised at one dollar each, and the sixteen on the second floor at seventy-five cents each, amounting to forty-five dollars.⁴ Mr. Homer Fales was killed by the falling of some timbers, and Mr. Leonard Fisher was slightly injured, May 14, 1828. Dec. 16, 1829, the Rev. William Cogswell, D.D., was dismissed, to take the general agency of the American Education Society, and the Rev. H. G. Park was ordained the next day, and continued the pastor until Sept. 23, 1835. March 2, 1836, Mr. Calvin Durfee was installed, and tendered his resignation Feb. 23, 1851, which was accepted, and July 15th the pastoral relations were closed by a mutual council.⁵ October 3, 1851, Rev. M. M. Colburn was installed pastor and teacher, and dismissed Aug. 11, 1866.

Oct. 1, 1866, Rev. Joseph P. Bixby commenced his labors as acting pastor. May, 1878, after twelve years of active and useful labor, tendered his resignation, to take effect in accordance with the terms of the contract.

Rev. Ellis Mendell, the present pastor, was ordained June 4, 1879, and with his society will soon take possession of their new and tasteful edifice, which is erected on the spot marked out by a committee of the "Great and General Court" in 1734, and where the fathers of the church covenanted to walk together in peace and love. Says Mr. Worthington in his history of Dedham, published in 1827, "No church quarrel or discord has been known to have existed worthy of notice," and the same may be said of it to-day.

The Universalist Society.—The petition for its incorporation bears date Oct. 8, 1827, and was signed by Jeremiah Draper⁶ and thirteen others. On the 22d, Lewis Rhoads was chosen clerk (which office he continued to hold for thirteen years), and Jeremiah Draper, Joseph Sumner, and Daniel Stone, committee of the society. The first sermon was preached prior to this time in the hall of the hotel by the Rev. Thomas Whittemore, then twenty-seven years of age. The Rev. Messrs. T. B. Thayer, Hosea Ballou, Balfour, and Streeter supplied the society occasionally. The Rev. J. C. Waldo occupied the desk from March 30th to July 20th. Says the Rev. Mr. Hill, to whose kindness I am indebted for the items connected with his society, we find it entered upon the records:

⁴ The appraisers were Messrs. George Haws, of Wrentham, Gen. Josiah S. Fisher, and John Goulding, of Dedham.

"The building this day erected (June 18, 1829) by the Universalist Society in the Second Parish in Dedham is designed to be a temple for the worship of the one living and true God, as the universal Parent of mankind, who will have all men to be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth."

June 14, 1830, their meeting-house was dedicated, Rev. Thomas Whittemore preaching the sermon. He was assisted in the services by the Rev. Messrs. Ballou, Streeter, and Frieze. June 17th, of this year, Rev. Alfred V. Bassett was ordained as pastor and teacher of the society. He was a young man of fine talents and an able preacher. His pastorate was closed by death Dec. 26, 1831, and clothed his people in the habiliments of mourning. His successor, the Rev. Rufus S. Pope, supplied the desk some three years from September, 1833, and left many warm friends. His name should be cherished for his noble and manly stand in the cause of temperance. It is told that he was the man who opened the crusade against intemperance in South Dedham, delivering a lecture on that subject. Says Mr. Hill, "It raised such a storm that it blew him out of town;" but unlike the tornado, its sweep brought joy and gladness where sorrow had reigned. Messrs. J. D. Pierce and E. Partridge supplied for a time in the interval which followed. Rev. Edwin Thompson began his labors in 1840. In 1841 he was ordained, and at once opened upon the liquor traffic. Two of his parishioners sympathized and acted with him. "He commenced at headquarters, the hotel of Joseph Sumner, and continued his persuasive arguments, in which Mrs. Sumner joined, and a few others, till Mr. Sumner finally offered to stop rum-selling forever if any one would buy his stock on hand. Mr. Thompson was a poor man, receiving but three hundred dollars a year, but he bought the liquor, pledging his little salary in payment. Mr. Sumner kept his word, and entered the Washingtonian movement, and became president of the society in this place." When Mr. Thompson closed his labors here he could look back and see that the society had more than doubled its numbers during his ministry and its moral power greatly increased. His faithful and untiring labors in the cause of temperance have made his name an honored one, and enrolled him among the benefactors of mankind.

Rev. Charles H. Webster was settled June 25, 1846, and remained four years. Rev. N. C. Hodgdon, who came in 1850, remained but a short time. Rev. Ebenezer Fisher commenced his labors in 1853. The five years of his pastorate were periods of special enterprise and prosperity.

In June, 1856, the Universalist Church was organized, and J. E. Hartshorn and Willard Gay, Esq., were chosen deacons. Mr. Fisher resigned his charge to accept of a professorship in the Canton Theological Seminary, New York. His successor in the ministry, Rev. A. R. Abbott, remained two years. Rev. J. H. Farnsworth occupied the pulpit for a short time, and was succeeded by Rev. M. R. Leonard, who was ordained June 30, 1861. Mr. Leonard was a graduate of the first class of the Canton Seminary under the charge of Dr. Fisher.

In 1863 a meeting of the society was called to take into consideration the subject of enlarging, selling, or building a new meeting-house, and the Hon. Joseph Day, George B. Talbot, and Lyman Smith constituted a committee to take all legal steps necessary to sell the old house and build a new one. They each subscribed two thousand dollars, and others united with them according to their means, and raised their subscription list to sixteen thousand dollars. The house was completed in less than one year from the time the committee received their instructions, and dedicated to the worship of God. Mr. Leonard resigned on account of ill health. His successor, the Rev. George Hill, was installed February, 1865, and for seventeen years ministered to this people; resigned his charge July, 1881.

Mr. Hill, at the close of his pastorate, can see his society, which less than fifty years ago was few in numbers and forced its pastor to depart because he spoke against the greatest moral pestilence that ever rested upon this community, now stands forth strong in numbers, influence, and power in this noble cause.

The Rev. Mr. Sellick, the present pastor, commenced his labors in April of 1883.

The Baptist Society.—The first public meeting of the Baptist people was held in Union Hall, Aug. 8, 1858,—sermon by Rev. Joseph B. Breed, of Woon-line. Joseph Sumner, son of Nathaniel and grandson of Deacon Nathaniel Sumner, born April 28, 1797; died Sept. 13, 1877. Of Mr. Stone nothing is left on record.

socket, R. I. In November of the same year Mr. Breed was constituted their pastor according to their established usages. Jan. 2, 1859, the record says, "Brother Messer was to-day baptized; this is probably the first time that the ordinance of baptism by immersion was ever administered in South Dedham." Dec. 1, 1859, their church was dedicated.

Introductory prayer by Rev. M. M. Colburn, of the Congregational Church; reading of the Scripture by Rev. M. Lincoln, of Jamaica Plains; prayer by the Rev. J. W. Lothrop, of Medfield; sermon by the pastor, J. B. Breed; dedicatory prayer by the Rev. B. W. Gardner; reading of a hymn by Rev. J. R. Abbot, of the Universalist society; benediction by the pastor.

May 4, 1860, Mr. Breed preached his farewell discourse. August 8th an invitation was extended to the Rev. James J. Tucker, of Worcester, to become their pastor. Sept. 1, 1860, he commenced his labors. His health failing, leave of absence was granted him, but death closed his pastorate Jan. 13, 1864.¹

His successor, the Rev. C. Osburn, of West Troy, N. Y., became pastor March 20, 1864. Aug. 20, 1865, he tendered his resignation, to take effect the last day of September. From Aug. 1, 1866, the Rev. George G. Fairbanks, of Somerville, occupied the pulpit till March 7, 1869, when he was dismissed to accept a call from the Baptist Church in Middleboro', where he still officiates. May 3d a call was given to the Rev. Edwin Bromley, of West Boylston, which was accepted, and he continued pastor until April 6, 1876, when he was dismissed. Sept. 29, 1876, Rev. I. H. Gilbert, of Hyde Park, assumed the duties of the pastorate. March 13th, at the annual meeting of the church, it was "resolved to take all legal steps to renew the existence of the society in connection with the church," which was consummated April 9, 1877. Oct. 12, 1878, Rev. Mr. Gilbert's resignation was accepted, that he might take the pastorate of the Baptist Church in Medfield. Rev. W. A. Worthington supplied the desk from May 4, 1879, to Sept. 12, 1880, when he tendered his resignation. The present pastor, B. W. Barrows, commenced his labors immediately after Mr. Worthington's departure.

The St. Catherine Church being connected with the St. Mary's Church, Dedham, and forming one pastorate, I can say but little. For the few facts recorded I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Edwin Fahy.

Services were held in private houses several times a year by the Rev. P. O. Beirne, of Roxbury, as early as 1852. Union Hall was used occasionally till the completion of Village Hall, when they gathered there about once a month till the purchase of their church, April 22, 1863, from a committee of the Universalist society. After remodeling, it was dedicated with appropriate ceremonies August 3d of the same year. Soon after it was transferred from the pastoral care of the Rev. P. O. Beirne, of Roxbury, to the care of Rev. John B. Brennon, of Dedham. Not far from 1874, Mr. Brennon was placed at Medfield, and Rev. D. J. O. Donovan assumed the pastorate, and their church edifice was enlarged and rededicated. On account of failing health, and being unable to perform the duties of so large a pastorate, he closed his labors, and was succeeded by the Rev. R. J. Johnson, the present pastor. In 1854 the congregation connected with this church numbered about one hundred, at the present time (1884) some eight hundred.

First Congregational Church.—June 23, 1736, after a day of fasting and prayer, the following persons entered into the church covenant: Thomas Balch, Samuel Bullard, John Everett, John Dean, James Fales, Jr., Samuel Fuller, William Bacon, Eleazer Fisher, Samuel Holmes, Jeremiah Kingsbury, Ezra Morse, William Everett, Nathaniel Guild, Ebenezer Dean, and Nathaniel Lewis. It would be pleasant to transcribe in full the covenant into which they entered, because it gives so perfect an idea of the character of the men who founded this ancient church, but its length precludes the idea. It remains a precious memento of their faith and piety. June 30, 1736, Rev. Thomas Balch was ordained over this infant church and precinct as its pastor and teacher. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Walter, of Roxbury, from John xvii. 10, "All mine are thine, and thine are mine, and I am glorified in them." The exercises were concluded by singing two stanzas from the Eighty-ninth Psalm, commencing at the nineteenth verse:

"Then thou spakest in vision to thy holy one, and saidst, I have laid help upon one that is mighty; I have exalted one chosen out of the people.

"I have found David my servant; with my holy oil have I anointed him:

"With whom my hand shall be established."

Mr. Balch was a native of Charleston, born Oct. 17, 1711, graduated at Harvard, 1733, married to Miss Mary Sumner, of Roxbury, Oct. 11, 1737; died Jan. 8, 1774, aged sixty-two years, two months, and eleven days, making his ministry thirty-seven years, six months, and eight days. From all the testimony that can be found, it appears that Mr.

¹ He died in Chicago.

Balch was honored and beloved by his people in an unusual degree, and in return gave them his warmest affections, and labored assiduously for their temporal and spiritual welfare. From the records of the church during his ministry one hundred and seventy-one persons were received "into full communion," ninety-three recognized or owned the covenant, nine adults and six hundred and twenty-eight children were baptized. One hundred and forty-eight couples were united in marriage, and he officiated at two hundred and forty-five funerals, some of which were out of the limits of the precinct. A large number of collections were made for persons on account of losses by fire, and for those suffering from poverty and sickness; one for the completion of an unfinished Congregational meeting-house on Tower Hill, in South Kingston; another, of considerable an amount, for the poor Acadians when forced from their homes by the royal mandate, procured through the influence of Governor Shirley. Some, over one thousand, were brought to Boston, and the other seven thousand or more scattered from Massachusetts to Georgia.¹

By his ministerial brethren Mr. Balch was highly esteemed, says the Rev. Jason Haven, of the First Parish, in this town. In 1796, forty years from his ordination, he remarks that "he had often recollected that profusion of Christian friendship and brotherly love expressed in the right hand of fellowship given by the Rev. Mr. Balch, of the South Parish; all which friendship and brotherly love he continued to exemplify while his valuable life was spared, towards the person then ordained and towards his brethren in the gospel ministry in general."

He took a deep interest in the young people of his charge, and delivered a series of lectures for their improvement, which were repeated by request in Roxbury and Charlestown.

Mr. Balch as a preacher must have ranked much above mediocrity; and allow me to give a few extracts from a sermon delivered before the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company in Boston, 1763, and then we will pass from the patriarch of this church to his successors.²

Daniel iv. 35: "He doeth according to his will in the army of Heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth." After referring to the occasion which called forth these words from the once proud, but now humbled king of Babylon, he continues, "He that commanded the world into being has caused it to continue unto this day, and as all things are preserved by Him, so he rules and governs them according to his will. This doctrine of universal dominion and providence of God is here laid down. He doeth according to his will in the army of Heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth. A subject well worthy of our contemplation, and not inappropriate at this time."³ God exercises his absolute dominion and sovereign providence over men on earth. The affairs of the world in general are ordered and determined by Him. His is the kingdom, and He is the Governor among the nations, and his mandate reaches the utmost bounds of creation. "What an exalted idea does this give us of the divine majesty, and how glorious and adorable must that God be." "War must be managed with a view to peace. So a time of peace must be improved to prepare for war." "Have we not seen the importance of well-disciplined troops in the late war?" "Well-accomplished and skillful soldiers will be more than ever necessary for us in the future." "The time may come even in our days, such is the instability of human affairs, when those who envy our growing greatness may form deep plots against us, and endeavor to put them in execution by the point of the sword."⁴ Then, "Is it not wisdom to cherish a martial spirit, and in time of peace prepare for war?"⁵ "Let us look to Him in whom it pleased the Father that all fullness should dwell, for grace and strength to enable us to prosecute our Christian warfare, till death shall discharge us from the fatigues and turmoils of this transitory life, and we put on the garlands of immortality to reign with our victorious Redeemer in the realms of a glorious and undisturbed peace, through the endless ages of eternity."

After the death of Mr. Balch it was about two years and a half before the settlement of the Rev. Jabez Chickering, on July 3, 1776, the day before the declaration of independence. Mr. Chickering was a native of Dover, and was born Nov. 4, 1753; graduated from Harvard University in 1774; studied theology with the Rev. Benjamin Caryl; married Miss Hannah Balch, April 22, 1777, a daughter of his predecessor. Seventy-eight were added to the church, two hundred and three couples were joined in marriage, and two hundred and eighty-two were borne to their last resting-place during his pastorate. It is told by aged people who remember him, that he was remarkably fond of children, and they too, in turn, were equally attached to him. It is asserted, in the discourse delivered at his funeral, that for some of the last years of his life he expended the whole of his salary in relieving objects of distress in his vicinity, and in subscribing money for religious and literary purposes. The youth of to-day should hold him in kind remembrance, for he really laid the foundation of our public library, and the income from his gift annually gives them the means to add to their stock of knowledge.

It is said that Mr. Chickering left no printed discourses except a charge given at the ordination of the Rev. Mr. Richey, of Canton, and the right hand of fellowship at the ordination of the Rev. Joshua Bates, of the First Church, Dedham, which for beauty of sentiment and expression is seldom equaled, and allow me to quote a few sentences: "Before the morning stars sang together, or all the sons of God shouted for joy, God was happy in the perfection of his own nature. But in his manifestation to man he has revealed himself, communicating happiness to his creatures, through the medium of love; for God is love, and the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ exhibits the divine benevolence, causing mercy and truth to meet together, and righteousness and peace to embrace each other. The great end of our holy religion, next to reconciling us to God, is to reconcile us to each other. Glory to God for peace on earth, and good-will to man, was the song of the multitude of the heavenly hosts at the birth of the Saviour, whose life was one great example of benevolence and love. At death, what had he to bequeath? Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you." . . . "Love to God and man, was by the Saviour made the criterion of our relation to Him, and interest in the blessings of his purchase. He left in charge this new commandment, 'As I have loved you, that ye also love one another.'" . . . "Dear brother, I cordially give you my right hand, as a public declaration that you are embraced in our fellowship, in taking a part in the ministry of reconciliation. 'We have one master, even Christ, and all we are brethren.'" . . . "Brethren of this church of Christ, we, the elders and messengers of the churches salute you, and with you rejoice that the eminent abilities and usefulness of your senior pastor have been so long continued. Need we exhort you to remember and honor the aged priest so long as he liveth; we also rejoice that the pastor now inducted to office was so highly esteemed for his work's sake, as to be the man of your unanimous choice. May your mutual affections be as the dew of Hermon, and as the dew that descended upon the mountains of Zion, for there the Lord commanded the blessing, even life for ever more." Mr. Chickering died March 12, 1812, in the fifty-eighth year of his age, and the thirty-fifth year of his pastorate; and his remains lie entombed near his people, and the children he loved so well. His successor, the Rev. William Cogswell, was born at Atkinson, N. H., June 5, 1787; graduated at Dartmouth College in 1811, and was principally guided in his theological studies by the Rev. Dr. Worcester, of Salem. During his ministry seventy-four became members of the church, sixty-eight were united in marriage, and for one hundred and sixteen he performed the last sad rite. Dr. Cogswell was a ready writer, and one of the ablest divines in the State. Many of his published sermons and addresses can be found in the parish, and so will make no quotations.

His "Assistant to Family Religion," a duodecimo volume of four hundred and four pages, in a few years passed three editions, and his "Theological Class Book," published and stereotyped in 1833, was republished in England. "A Catechism on the Doctrines and Duties of Religion," in two parts, passed through several editions. He was dismissed that he might take the general agency of the American Education Society.¹

His successor in the ministry, Rev. Harrison G. Park, was ordained by the same council which dismissed Dr. Cogswell. Mr. Park was born at Providence, R. I., July 26, 1806; was graduated at Brown University in 1824. After leaving college he studied law two years with the Hon. Mr. Fisk, of Wrentham, and Bradford Sumner, Esq., of Boston. He studied theology with Dr. Wisner, of Boston, and at the Theological Seminary, Princeton, N. J. His pastorate continued about six years. Mr. Park was a good sermonizer and an able man. After his removal from this place he was settled over the Second Society in Danvers,² and subsequently at Burlington, and at

² While at Danvers he was called to deliver a funeral discourse in memory of the Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Cowles, pastor of the First Church, who, with his wife, was lost at sea by the Burnardston. The last years of his life were passed in this town, where he took a deep interest in all that pertained to its welfare.

His successor, the Rev. Calvin Durfee, was born in Pittsfield, Mass., Oct. 6, 1797; graduated from Williams College; studied theology with the Rev. Dr. Woodbridge, of Hadley; ordained at Hunter, New York; resigned in 1835; installed March 6, 1836, over the Second Parish in Dedham; resigned in 1857; spent three years in Brookline, Ohio; and on the resignation of the Rev. Dr. Peters was appointed financial agent of Williams College. Some of his sermons are preserved in the parish or pastors' library. Dr. Durfee's principal work is the "Annals of Williams," on which it is said he spent a quarter of a century. Dr. Irenæus Prime, in his introduction, speaks of it as one of the most extraordinary literary compilations of the present day. He died in 1879, aged eighty-two years.

Rev. Moses M. Colburn, sixth pastor of the First Church, was born at Fair Haven, Vt., Sept. 17, 1819; graduated from the University of Vermont; studied theology at the Andover Seminary; spent fourteen years of pastoral life in South Dedham; removed to Waukegan, Ill., where he labored four years. In 1870 we find him at St. Joseph, Mich., where death closed his pastorate in 1876, in the fifty-seventh year of his age.

Mr. Colburn is spoken of as a faithful pastor and a good man, as one deeply interested in the youth of the town and parish, and admirably adapted to guide them in the way to honor and respectability. One printed discourse, the "Comfortless Christian," remains in the society.

Rev. Ebenezer Fisher was born in Charlotte, Me. (then a part of Massachusetts), Feb. 15, 1815. It is said he was a lineal descendant of David Fisher, who was here as early as 1730, and died in 1791, aged seventy-four years. Mr. Fisher was licensed to preach in 1840; in 1841 was settled at Addison Point, Me.; May 18, 1747, was installed over the Universalist Church in Salem. This pastorate continued about six years. Oct. 7, 1853, resigned his charge on account of ill health; November, 1853, was installed in due form over the Universalist Society in South Dedham. As a temperance man he pushed forward the good work Mr. Thompson had begun, and exerted a wholesome influence wherever he moved. April 15, 1858, Dr. Fisher was inaugurated professor and head of the Theological Seminary in Canton, N. Y. During his connection of twenty-one years with that institution he had seen more than one hundred students, whose minds he had in a great measure moulded and fashioned, settled in the Universalist pulpits in our land. He died suddenly Feb. 21, 1879, on his way to his recitation-rooms in the seminary.

Deacon John Everett, son of Capt. John Everett, and grandson of Richard Everett, one of the original founders of Dedham, settled in that part of Stoughton which was annexed to Dedham. He married Mercy Brown, Jan. 3, 1700. In the act of incorporation of the precinct, he is named as a "principal inhabitant." On the organization of the church, in 1736, he was elected the first deacon. From the records of the church and parish, he appears to have been an active, intelligent, and pious man, laboring for the good of all. He died March 20, 1751, aged seventy-five years.

Deacon Ebenezer Everett, son of Deacon John, was born Aug. 5, 1707; married Joanna Stevens; was chosen deacon Nov. 30, 1760; died June 19, 1778. He was the father of the Rev. Moses Everett, ninth minister of Dorchester, and the Rev. Oliver Everett, fourth pastor of the New South Church, Boston, and grandfather of the Hon. Alexander H., and the illustrious orator and statesman, Governor Edward Everett.

Capt. and Deacon Ebenezer Everett was born Oct. 7, 1734; Dec. 16, 1756, married Abigail Bacon. He was a veteran of the French war; enlisted May 7, 1755; marched with Capt. Fales through the wilderness to Albany, from thence to Lake George, and was undoubtedly in the battle of September 8th, as his company was engaged and lost heavily. He was chosen deacon July 30, 1778; died Oct. 1, 1808.

Willard Everett, grandson of Deacon Ebenezer (2), was chosen deacon Jan. 14, 1834; died March 17, 1851, aged fifty-six years.

Willard Everett (2) was chosen deacon Oct. 28, 1852; died Nov. 27, 1857, aged thirty-five years. In the midst of an active and highly useful life he passes from us; "but the righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance."

When Ezra Morse was driven from his mill-seat, on Mother Brook, the town "gave him a grant of forty acres of land near the Neponset River, or at the old saw-mill,¹ or at Everett plain, where he might find it most to his satisfaction." He also had leave to erect a saw-mill on Hawes Brook on the way leading foundering of the "Hope," which was published by request and is still preserved in this parish.

to the south meadow. His son Ezra was born Jan. 28, 1671. On the formation of the church, 1736, he was chosen deacon, and subsequently gave to the church the meadow-land they now hold, and died Oct. 17, 1760, aged ninety years, honored and respected.

Mr. Jonathan Dean, chosen deacon July 18, 1736, continued to fill that office till March 28, 1870, at which time he passed away in the fullness of a ripe old age, numbering ninety-three years.

Deacon Nathaniel Sumner, son of Edward Sumner, of Roxbury, born April 10, 1720, was a graduate of Harvard, class of 1739. Studied theology, but never took upon himself the ministerial office; Oct. 18, 1752, was chosen deacon; 1768, was sent as a delegate to the convention held in Faneuil Hall. Representative to the General Court for the sessions of 1756-57, 1762, 1769, and 1770, and a member of the Board of the Selectmen for nineteen years. Died Dec. 23, 1802, aged eighty-two years.

Willard Gay, Esq., was born Jan. 3, 1818, appointed justice of the peace in 1858, postmaster in 1861. These offices he continued to hold to the close of life. Assistant assessor United States from 1861 till the district was abolished; after that, assistant collector till a further alteration was made, and the number of officials reduced. A member of the Board of Selectmen of Dedham for several years, and also of Norwood during the first three years of its existence. On the organization of the Universalist Church, in 1856, he was chosen deacon and treasurer, which offices he continued to hold while his valuable life was spared.

Hon. Joseph Day was born in Walpole July 25, 1807. His education was such as the common district school afforded sixty years ago. At the age of sixteen years he left home to learn the currier's trade. When twenty, he came to South Dedham and engaged as a journeyman in that same business for the late John Smith. He was absent some four years, engaged in the same business, and then returned to South Dedham, and joined Isaac Ellis in erecting a paper-mill for the manufacturing of wrapping-paper, on the spot where Isaac Ellis' mill now stands. In two years he returned to his old business of tanning, and opened a shop, where he continued ten or eleven years. In 1844 or 1845 he established, in connection with Mr. A. L. White, the house in Boston now known as Day, Wilcox & Co. In about eight years Mr. White withdrew from the firm, and Mr. Day received as partners D. W. Wilcox, Lyman Rhoads, and his son Lewis. In 1864 he withdrew from the firm. He served some years as one of the assessors of Dedham, a director in the Dedham National Bank, a representative to the General Court in 1843-44, a senator from Norfolk County in 1856-57 (serving as a member of the Committee on Prisons and Reformatory Institutions).

Deacon Curtis G. Moore, born Dec. 18, 1805, contributed seventeen hundred and seventy dollars towards the erection of the Baptist meeting-house, but as his left hand knew not what his right hand did, it is impossible to make any estimate of his benefactions. On the organization of the church, in 1858, he was chosen deacon, and continued in office till his death. He left by will two thousand dollars to the church, the income to be used for the support of the gospel.

Joel M. Baker, born Sept. 9, 1808, was connected with the Baptist Society, and was largely instrumental in building up the same. His gifts, when their meeting-house was in process of construction, amounted to two thousand eight hundred and ninety-five dollars, and from 1858 till the time of his death (May 21, 1878) he must, at least, have contributed, besides the above gifts, twenty-five hundred dollars more, for his hands were always open and ready to balance the accounts of the society at the end of the year.

We will now pause in our narrative and turn back to the time when the cohorts of slavery unfurled the black flag of treason and marshaled their untaught hordes for carnage and strife, and to the gathering of freemen to save the Union and the priceless heritage for which our fathers fought.

To Mr. William J. Wallace I am indebted for foregoing names of soldiers who went from this parish.

The town of Norwood contains some six thousand two hundred and thirty acres of land fit for cultivation, with a population of about twenty-five hundred; distant from Boston fourteen and a quarter miles, with easy communication by the New York and New England Railroad. It has four churches already defined, one hotel, three dry-goods stores, six grocery stores, apothecary-shop, three markets, a bakery, and everything to make it a desirable place for residence.

The first meeting of the citizens of the South Parish, in Dedham, interested in the formation of a town was held in Village Hall, Dec. 22, 1871, at which measures were adopted to secure that end; and a committee was chosen to appear before the Legislative Committee on Towns, and support the petition of George B. Talbot, and two hundred and fifty-one other legal voters within the limits of the old parish lines, which were adopted with but little variation, for the boundaries of the new town of Norwood, except the reception of a small territory, and a few persons from Walpole, whose business and family interests connect them with us. Feb. 23, 1872, the act was approved, and March 6th, the citizens celebrated the birth of their town. His Excellency, Governor Washburn, graced the occasion, and remarked that he thought it unnecessary to call upon any one outside of their number to give them advice. On looking around the room he saw among the mottoes, "Economy, Responsibility," and he thought by the report of the Committee that that motto was very appropriate.¹ He said "each one partook of the reputation of his town, and the character of a town partook of the character of its individuals. It becomes of the greatest importance that whatever we possess, whether of wealth or education, should all be consecrated to work for the community's good." Senator Thomas L. Wakefield, of Dedham, "spoke of the relations of the old town of Dedham to the new town of Norwood." He said, "since the year 1635 they had lived together in harmony, and now they parted without a disagreement. There had been no objection on the part of Dedham, not because they wished for the separation, but because they thought it due to the new community."

The Board of Selectmen of Dedham were represented by A. B. Endicott and Benjamin Weatherbee, Esqs. The warrant for the first meeting of the town was drawn by Willard Gay, Esq., and made returnable March 11th. Mr. Gay presided till the clerk was chosen and qualified. Deacon George Lovis was chosen moderator, and the following board of town officers were elected: Samuel E. Pond, J. Edward Everett, Willard Gay, Esq., selectmen; Tyler Thayer, Caleb Ellis, George H. Morse, assessors; Francis Tinker, clerk; L. Waldo Bigelow, treasurer; Hon. J. C. Park, Francis O. Winslow, Rev. E. A. Wyman, school committee; Capt. C. W. Strout, James Engles, constables,—and Norwood's legal life commenced; and their first act, after expressing their grateful acknowledgment to the committee who had served them faithfully (Hon. John C. Park, J. Warren Talbot, and Caleb Ellis), was the following: "Resolved, That the citizens of Norwood, in town-meeting assembled, recognize with grateful pleasure the readiness and courtesy with which the citizens of Dedham and Walpole have assisted us in the inauguration of our new Town; and that the clerk be instructed to present a copy of this resolution to the selectmen of Dedham and Walpole." In 1769 the town of Dedham appropriated to the South Parish, as their proportion of the school money for that year, the sum of eighteen pounds and ten shillings (or fifty-five dollars and sixty-seven cents), which was divided by the parish assessors between the five schools, according to the number of scholars in each. The first appropriation of money made by the town of Norwood was six thousand dollars for the support of her schools; and, during the twelve years of her existence as a town, she has taxed herself for the benefit of her children and youth the sum of seventy-eight thousand six hundred and fifty dollars, besides erecting two new school-houses, which, with the alterations and improvements in and around the others, and supporting a public library of some three thousand volumes, swells the sum to one hundred thousand dollars. Her poor have been well cared for, and comfortable tenements provided, and so clothed that none would suppose they were the wards of the town. Thirty-two thousand two hundred dollars have handsomely smoothed her streets, and seventeen thousand more have opened ways for new and happy homes. Highland Cemetery, containing some seventeen acres, has been consecrated as the last resting-place for her departed ones. One hundred and fifty-five new dwellings have been erected, and three hundred and seventy-two thousand dollars added to the value of her estate. Six hundred and twelve have joined her population by birth, two hundred couples united in marriage, while the icy hand of death has robbed us of some four hundred, many of whom welcomed with us the birth of our town, and with whom we took sweet counsel in all the way of life, and whose names will be long cherished and remembered.

Agricultural Products.—1200 tons of hay, 7074 bushels of potatoes, 5997 bushels Indian corn, 127,905 gallons of milk, 300 pounds of butter, 32,514 dozen eggs valued at some over $60,000, besides garden vegetables, berries, and fruits, of which considerable quantities are sold.

Industries.—The New York and New England Machine- and Car-Shops, five in number, built in the most substantial manner, give employment to about three hundred men, and send forth some very fine and comfortable cars. The land—some seventeen acres—upon which they are built, was presented to the company by the citizens of the town.

George H. Morrill & Co., manufacturers of printers' ink. This business was founded by Samuel Morrill, a native of Salisbury, born April 4, 1804. He was a printer, and saw an opening existing for a manufactory of this kind. His original establishment was very small, having nothing more than one kettle and a small wooden building for making lampblack. When he removed to South Dedham his two sons (George H. and Samuel S.) became partners. About 1869 this firm was dissolved, and the business continued under the name of George H. Morrill & Co. There are fourteen buildings used in the business, some of them of considerable size, water-wheel, thirty-five horse-power, and is supplemented by a one hundred and twenty-five horse-power Harris-Corliss steam-engine, steam-pumps, which throw either water or oil, a rotary pump, capable of throwing sixteen hundred gallons per hour, fourteen large Bogardus eccentric- and six Rooler mills, used for grinding ink, and kept constantly employed from the beginning to the end of the week, four iron mixers, capable of mixing fifteen hundred pounds each, numerous reservoirs and tanks, the largest of which is made of heavy boiler-iron and is twenty-five by thirty feet, and has a capacity of fifty thousand gallons, or fifteen hundred barrels, and one other of nearly the same size. At 220 Commercial Street, San Francisco, Cal., may be found a branch house, which supplies seven-eighths of all the ink used on the Pacific slope and in Mexico. They also export largely to South America, India, China, and Japan. Office, 34 Hawley Street, Boston. By the census of 1880, the value of the ink manufactured by this house was stated at eighty thousand dollars, but since that time it has been largely increased.

The manufacturing of raw hides into leather was one of the early industries of South Dedham, and was commenced as early as 1776 by a Mr. Guild, and the business was continued by his family for more than half a century. In 1791, Mr. John Smith, a poor boy of seven years of age, was hired out to Mr. Guild, and, by indomitable will and perseverance under great disadvantages, became successful in business and prominent in town affairs. Mr. George Winslow was born in Brewster in 1800, and at eighteen learned the tanner's and currier's trade with Samuel Guild, of Roxbury. He came to South Dedham in 1826, married the only daughter of John Smith, and founded the business which has been continued with increasing capacity ever since. In 1831 Lyman Smith, son of John, was admitted to the firm, and continued with George Winslow up to 1853, when they dissolved. George Winslow and sons (Elisha and George) at the old place, and Lyman Smith & Sons (John E. and Charles L.) removed to the present location of that firm, and builded anew. In 1860, George Winslow retired, and the firm-name became Winslow Brothers, who still manage the extensive establishment upon the old site. Tanning law-book leather, roller skins, linings for the boot and shoe trade, and a variety of sheep-leather of different finish and colors adapted to an almost endless diversity of uses. There has been a steady growth of the business, new buildings have been added, steam-power substituted for water-power, and labor-saving machinery invented and introduced, until a capacity of tanning more than a million skins annually has been attained, giving employment to about one hundred and fifty men, with a monthly pay-roll of from five to six thousand dollars.

between George Winslow and Lyman Smith; the firm then doing business at the present location of Winslow Brothers. Dissolved in 1853. Mr. Smith and his sons (John E. and Charles L.) occupied their present location and commenced business under the firm-name of Lyman Smith & Sons. In 1856, Mr. Smith, Sr., retired from the firm, and his sons continued the business under the same firm-name. In 1853 there was but one building erected, and the skins simply tanned and sold in the rough; and the capacity of the establishment was but thirty thousand skins per year, and only four men employed. Their buildings at the present time cover more than one acre of land, and range from one story to five, and give employment to one hundred and forty-three men, with a capacity to finish some twenty thousand skins per week, or one million forty thousand per year.

The Norwood Iron Foundry was established in 1854 by Spencer Fuller and Isaac Colburn, under the firm-name of Fuller & Colburn. Mr. Colburn withdrew from the firm in 1858. On the death of Mr. Fuller the estate passed into the hands of E. D. Draper & Sons. They give employment to some thirty-five hands, and furnish some seven hundred and forty-two thousand three hundred and seventy-nine pounds of fine iron castings.

F. A. Fales, proprietor of the steam-mill for grinding grains, disposes of 18,000 bushels of corn and as many bushels of oats, 130 tons of bran, 200 tons of ground feed, 150 tons of corn-meal, besides finer grains and flour.

The carpet works, for printing floor and carriage oil-cloths, was established about thirty years ago by E. Fisher Talbot. On the death of Mr. Talbot, in 1882, these works passed into the hands of E. E. Pratt & Son. They employ twenty men, and produce one hundred and eighty thousand yards of carpeting annually; their pay-roll averaging eight hundred dollars per month.

The manufacture of wrapping paper was commenced in 1832 by Isaac Ellis and Joseph Day, under the firm-name of Ellis, Day & Co. In about two years Mr. Day withdrew from the firm, and in a few years the establishment passed into the hands of Paul Ellis, who continued the manufacture of paper and trunk boards some fifteen years, when his sons became partners. In 1864 the mill was burned and Mr. Ellis, Sr., retired from the business. The mill was rebuilt by Charles, John, and Isaac Ellis, and the business continued under the firm-name of Ellis Brothers until 1876, when the firm was dissolved, and Isaac continued the business. In 1878 it was again burned; the premises were now purchased by Isaac Ellis, and rebuilt in the most substantial manner, and now gives employment to some fifteen persons, and sends to market one hundred and eighty tons of paper annually.

Tyler Thayer, builder, has been engaged in business thirty-five years, and has erected two of the four churches, and more than one-half of all the dwelling-houses in the town, besides many in the adjoining towns, all of which his own hands have marked out and prepared for his workmen to frame. The past year he has used 555,500 feet of long lumber, 530,000 shingles, 230,000 laths, at a cost of some $14,600, giving constant employment to eighteen men with a pay-roll of some $8000, and this amount falls below the yearly average.

Milton H. Howard, builder, has been engaged in business some five years or more. Owns the steam-planing- and saw-mill, uses some three hundred thousand or more feet of long lumber, and a like proportion of laths and shingles, gives employment to eighteen or twenty hands, and has put up some of the finest dwellings in the town.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

LYMAN SMITH.

Lyman Smith was born Oct. 22, 1808, in that part of Dedham now Norwood. He was the son of John Smith and Anna Rhoades, and grandson of John Smith and Abigail Morse. On the maternal side his grandparents were Eliphlet Rhoades and Mercy Holland.

John Smith, father of Lyman, established himself in a small way as a tanner in his native town, first, in connection with, and afterwards succeeding, Abner Guild. The shops were located where the larger establishment of the Winslows now stands. Lyman Smith, like most boys of his day and circumstances, was early taught to labor. His parents were unable to give him other educational advantages than those afforded by the schools of the village. He was possessed of a bright, active mind, however, and a retentive memory, with a decided talent for mathematics, and by attention to his studies during the early years of his boyhood, which constituted his only school-days, he familiarized himself with those fundamental elements of an education so necessary to the successful business man.

At the age of fifteen he entered his father's tannery, to learn the business, and that year in particular it is said that he used to cart, with ox-teams, bark from Boston to his father's tannery. He applied himself earnestly to his work, and thoroughly familiarized himself with all the minutiae of the business, so that a few years later, when he succeeded to the business, he had that thorough knowledge of practical detail which, together with the acumen and business ability necessary, enabled him to make more than an ordinary success. When he began business for himself, in 1831, he formed a copartnership with his brother-in-law, the late George Winslow, which copartnership continued until 1853, when his sons becoming of age, and the tanning business largely increasing, Mr. Smith disposed of his interest to Mr. Winslow and erected the large establishment in the village near the railroad station now occupied by his sons. Having seen his sons successfully started in a business career, Mr. Smith, after about three years, withdrew from active partnership in the firm, retaining only a silent interest in the business, which was conducted under the firm-name of Lyman Smith & Sons.

Although he was thus freed from the cares of active business, yet he still retained to the close of his life an unabated interest in all that pertained to his old work, and it was his custom to daily visit the tanneries, inspect the processes, and converse with the workmen, among whom he was universally respected.

Mr. Smith was a man of strong individuality. The sterling integrity and high moral standard of his character is acknowledged by all who knew him. In manner he was genial, courteous, and kind; possessed of a happy, hopeful turn of mind, he carried a cheerful face, and was ever ready with a pleasant word. Successful himself in the business affairs of life, he was never unmindful of the fact that many who were deserving were not equally successful, and his benevolence, while unostentatious, was constantly exercised. He was a man of warm heart, calm judgment, strong in his convictions of right and wrong, and in his likes and dislikes. He was the friend of temperance, freedom, justice, and truth, and the bitter, uncompromising foe of whatever tended to debase or degrade mankind. He took an active interest, both before and after he retired from the duties of business, in all measures which would benefit his native town. He assisted largely in the erection of a new and more commodious school-building for the benefit of the youth of the town. He was chosen a director of the Norfolk Mutual Fire Insurance Company in 1862, and a director of Dedham National Bank in 1877. He gave his counsel and pecuniary assistance to the Universalist Society in the building of a new church edifice, and assisted in laying out the streets and extending the limits of the growing village.

He married Malinda E. Guild. Their children were John E., born Aug. 7, 1830; Charles L., born May 15, 1833; Anna M. R. (now the wife of Lewis Day), born Aug. 17, 1836. Mrs. Smith died Oct. 5, 1845.

Mr. Smith married, as his second wife, Sept. 8, 1846, Ann M. Joy. By this marriage there was no issue.

He died May 23, 1883, in his seventy-fifth year. On the day of his funeral, which was very largely attended, all places of business in his native town were closed out of respect to his memory.

GEORGE EVERETT.

George Everett, son of Deacon Willard and Lucy (Dean) Everett, and grandson of Ebenezer and Sarah Everett, was born in that part of Dedham since set apart as Norwood, Feb. 5, 1826. He is descended through eight generations from Richard Everett, who was one of the original founders of Dedham in 1636. There were two generations of Johns, and three of Ebenezers, Deacon Willard being the son of the last Ebenezer. Willard learned his trade as a cabinet-maker, of the late Jabes Boyden, and succeeded him in that business about the year 1820. He began in a small way, but by dint of earnest application, coupled with a good business talent, he succeeded in building up a large manufactory, and accumulated quite a property for those days. In 1850 his two eldest sons—Willard and George—were admitted to partnership with him, under the firm-name of Willard Everett & Co. Nov. 27, 1851, Deacon Willard died. The business was conducted then by his sons, and the original style of firm-name was retained until the dissolution of the firm, in 1868, at which time it consisted of George, J. Edward, and Francis E. Everett. The firm was an enterprising one, and did a large and profitable business. The first extension tables that came into general use were manufactured and placed on the market by this house. Deacon Willard, Jr., another son, was a member of the firm to the time of his death, Nov. 27, 1857. They had a large, well-appointed factory, located near Norwood Central Depot, and large warerooms in Boston. They made a specialty of tables of all kinds, hat-racks, etc. They made only good goods, and commanded the best prices. Upon the dissolution of the firm (1868), George retired from active business pursuits, but such was the native energy of his nature that he continued to be an active man, both mentally and physically, to the day of his death, which occurred suddenly of heart-disease, in Boston, Jan. 6, 1881, in his fifty-fifth year. He married, July 27, 1847, Julia D., daughter of Jesse and Julia (Dean) Ellis. Their children were Alice J., born Aug. 6, 1848, died in infancy; Laura C., born Nov. 10, 1850, died in infancy; Willard E., born June 13, 1853; George F., born Aug. 7, 1855, died Aug. 23, 1863; Herbert, born July 23, 1859; Richard B., born Jan. 6, 1864. Of these, Willard E. married Ida E. Woodbury, of Ashburnham, Mass., Oct. 2, 1878. They have one child,—Bernice J. They reside in Turner's Falls, Mass., where he is a paper manufacturer. Herbert is a mineralogist, and located in Denver, Col. Richard is with his elder brother, at Turner's Falls, learning paper making.

George Everett was benevolent and public-spirited, liberal in all his ideas, and kindly disposed. He always manifested much interest in the welfare of those employed by him, or with whom he was brought in contact by business relations. He was a moral man, and was interested in all reform movements; he was a liberal supporter of the church, though not a member. While he was always ready with material aid to help further any enterprise tending to the building up or improvement of his town, yet he would never accept any office, preferring to leave the honors and cares of official life to those whose fancy or tastes led them in that direction, while he faithfully discharged the duties devolving upon him as a private citizen.

He was a man of large physique and commanding personal appearance. His untimely death was a grievous surprise to the community in which he lived, all of whom he could claim as his friends. He came of an honorable and worthy ancestry, and was a fair type of New England's sturdy manhood, which faltering at no obstacles, daunted at no discouragement, but earnest, active, and intelligent, marks out a course and object in life, and follows that course until the object be attained.

(For additional history of Everett family, see history of Norwood in this volume, by Francis Tinker.)

FRANCIS TINKER.

If the reader has ever been at Plymouth and visited Pilgrim Hall, he may have noticed, on the paling which incloses a fragment of the rock on which the Pilgrim Fathers landed, the names of those who came passengers in the "Mayflower," and among those names he may have observed that of Thomas Tinker. From other records it appears "that the said Thomas Tinker brought with him a wife and two children," and that he died a short time after his arrival. From this humble and short-lived pilgrim our family claim to be descended. The writer of the sketch of the town of Norwood was born Jan. 3, 1816, at Worthington, Hampshire Co., Mass., of pious parents, and it will suffice for him to say that in every place in which he has been called to reside, he has received every favor from his fellow-citizens to which he was entitled.

DAVID SYLVESTER FOGG, M.D.

David Sylvester Fogg is descended from two of the pioneer families of New England. He was born in Meredith, N. H., March 30, 1821, and was the fourth son of Joseph and Judeth (Gilman) Fogg. The Fogg family in this country are descended from a younger son of a family of that name still existing in the south of England. The family estates in England are entailed, and are now held—or were lately—by Sir Charles Fogg. The name of Gilman is found in the early chronicles of Wales. Representatives of these two families came to America in the early part of the seventeenth century, and settled at Exeter, N. H., where were born both the paternal and maternal grandfathers of Dr. Fogg, Stephen Fogg and Bradbury Gilman. When the war of the Revolution came both these gentlemen offered their services to their country; they were in the battle of Bunker Hill and served subsequently in that war. Soon after the close of the war they each married, and together moved to Meredith, N. H., where they took up contiguous tracts of wild land on the shore of Lake Winnipiseogee, which they cultivated and developed into valuable farms, and which are now in the possession of their descendants. They were among the early settlers of that part of New Hampshire. Joseph Fogg, son of Stephen and father of Dr. David S., held a commission as captain of New Hampshire militia in the war of 1812-14.

David S. Fogg obtained his academical education at Holmes' Plymouth Academy and Dartmouth College. He studied medicine with Josiah Cosbey, M.D., of Manchester, N. H., and took the degree of doctor in medicine at Dartmouth Medical School in 1845. The subsequent year he spent in the medical schools and hospitals of Philadelphia,—then the centre of medical learning in this country. In 1846 he settled in the south parish of Dedham (now the town of Norwood), in Norfolk Co., Mass. He soon obtained an extensive practice in this and surrounding towns, which he has sustained from that time to the present, when at the age of sixty-three he is still in active practice, and is among the oldest and most successful practitioners of the county. During the course of his practice he has received repeated professional calls from almost every town in the county. He is a member of the Norfolk Medical Society, Massachusetts Medical Society, and the American Medical Association. In 1861 he was a volunteer surgeon in the Peninsular campaign. On the organization of the boards of enrollment, he was appointed by President Lincoln surgeon of the board for the Seventh Massachusetts Division, headquarters at Concord, Mass., and served in that office till the close of the war, when he returned home and resumed his practice in Dedham and adjacent towns. Dr. Fogg enjoys in an eminent degree the confidence of those who know him, not only as a skillful medical practitioner, but as an honest, honorable, earnest man; he is distinguished for his sobriety, integrity, and love of right, for his gentle demeanor and kindly feeling.

He married, 1847, Mary B., youngest daughter of Rev. Thomas W. Tucker, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, who was at that time stationed at Dorchester, Lower Mills. Mr. Tucker, father of Thomas, was born in England; came when a young man to America, settled in Boston, and married Hannah Wait, of Medford. Thomas was the youngest of several children; received his education at the public schools, joined the Bromfield Street Methodist Church, and at the age of nineteen was licensed to preach. At the age of twenty-one he became a regularly ordained minister of that denomination, and continued in active service more than sixty years. On his ordination he joined the New England Conference, was appointed one of its itinerant preachers, and assigned to the circuit of New Hampshire and Vermont. He married Mary Orn, of Charleston, N. H., a woman of very superior qualities of mind and heart, and who became a true helpmeet to him and a sharer of all his joys and sorrows, and was honored in the church and conference as a "mother in Israel." As a preacher, Mr. Tucker was eminently successful, and as a faithful worker in the cause of his Master he had few, if any, equals; winning large numbers to a belief in and practice of the principles of religion, and greatly augmenting the membership of the church. Among his early and special converts was E. T. Taylor, the well-known and celebrated "sailor preacher" of Boston. Mr. Tucker died in Chelsea in 1871, aged eighty years. Thus passed from earth one whose whole life exemplified the highest Christian virtues. Following in the footsteps of his Master, he has doubtless received the welcome plaudit, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

Dr. Fogg's children—four sons and two daughters—were all born in Dedham (now Norwood). The eldest son, Irving S., M.D., is a graduate of Harvard, and is now practicing medicine with his father. Ralph M. is a dentist in Boston. The younger children are still pursuing their education. Mrs. Fogg is quite skillful as a landscape artist, as the many productions of her brush which adorn the walls of their pleasant home will attest.

OTIS MORSE.

Otis Morse, of Norwood, is ninth in descent from Samuel, the first of the American line, who was born in England in 1585, emigrated to New England in 1635, settled at Dedham in 1637, died in Medfield, April 5, 1654. The line of descent is Samuel¹, John², Ezra³, David⁴, David⁵, Samuel⁶, Oliver⁷, Oliver⁸ (who married Azubah Gay), Otis⁹, born in Norwood (then South Dedham), March 12, 1809. When about twelve years of age, as was usual with boys in the early days of our country, being one of a family of nine children and with limited means, Otis left home and went to work on the farm of one of the most progressive farmers in the section, Benjamin Wetherbee; there he remained four years, fixing himself in those habits of industry and perseverance which have been his help to success. Mr. Wetherbee, prizing his services, endeavored to retain him until he was twenty-one. But Otis was determined to be a blacksmith, and learned the trade at a shop about two miles east of his present residence; stayed there until he was nearly twenty-two, then was employed by his cousin in a shop near the present Norwood Hotel. About six months after that he went in business for himself and erected a shop near his present house, purchasing the land and an uncompleted house, which he finished and made his home, and shortly starting for himself, bought the business of his cousin, thus having two establishments to occupy him. He ran these two shops for three years. His health at that time was much impaired; he had injured himself shoeing stage horses, and was obliged to cease work for a year before he built his shop. He came of a consumptive family, three of his brothers dying of that disease, but in Mr. Morse that tendency developed into stomach trouble, dyspepsia, and continued until he was fifty-two years old. After his health failed he formed a partnership with Nathaniel Noyes, of Dedham, to make carriages and do blacksmith's work, as Morse &

Otis Morse.

Noyes, in 1833. He still holds an interest in the business, which has been carried on under the name of "Otis Morse" for nearly forty years. He manufactured and built iron fence for twenty-five years, and for thirty years has conducted the undertaking business. He owns several tenements which he lets. As an evidence of his industry, during the year of his illness he ran a fish-cart for several months. Mr. Morse married, first, Frances L. Boyden, by whom he had one child who attained maturity, Edward B.; he is a resident of Boston, and an active business man. Mrs. Frances Morse died Oct. 10, 1838, aged twenty-three years, and Nov. 20, 1839, Mr. Morse married, second, Hannah (Day) Polleys (daughter of John and Hannah (Day) Polleys; she was born July 25, 1809. Otis Morse is a man of modest character, of high integrity, indefatigable and close in his application to his work, honest and prudent. From nothing he has won success and a competency for his old age in the community where his goings out and comings in have been known to all men. Faithful in all his relations, none speak of him but in praise of the worthiness of his character as a man, and of the skill he displayed as a workman in anything he undertook.

Mr. Morse has done much to build up his native town, has assisted many people in starting business, built several houses and shops, was interested in the foundry that was built, and to him, with a few others, the prosperity of Norwood is largely due to-day. Politically he is a Republican. His religious belief is that of the Orthodox Congregationalists. In the home circle his labors have been ably and warmly seconded by his cheerful wife, the companion of more than forty years. Truly it may be said of Mr. Morse, "having put his hand to the plow, he looketh not back," and in his old age enjoys the results of industry and perseverance.

CHAPTER XL.

NEEDHAM.

Indian Occupation—Original Purchase in 1680—Consideration—First Settlements—Petition for Preaching in 1709—Petition for Act of Incorporation—Opposed by Dedham—Lands for Support of Ministry—Incorporation of Town—Named after Needham in England—The First Town-Meeting—Selectmen Elected—Burying-Ground—The First Minister—First Meeting-House—Westerly Precinct Set Off—The First Church Bell—Early Educational Interests—Social Library.

THE territory embraced within the bounds of the present town of Needham originally formed a portion of Dedham, and belonged to an Indian by the name of William Nehoiden, of whom it was purchased by the inhabitants of Dedham on the 13th of April, 1680. The consideration being ten pounds in money, fifty acres of land, and a quantity of Indian corn to the value of forty shillings.

The first settlements were made in the northeastern part of the town, but the precise period cannot be ascertained. It is probable, however, that it was not long after the purchase from Nehoiden. The ancient records of Dedham show that a settlement existed here in March, 1694, and July 2, 1705, the selectmen of the mother town granted a license to Benjamin Mills to keep a public-house near the Lower Falls.

It is evident that quite a number had located here prior to 1709, for on the 9th of March, of that year, the inhabitants petitioned the town of Dedham for a grant of eight pounds to defray the expense of three months' preaching among themselves, which was granted.

Incorporation of Town.—The settlement having now increased to a considerable extent, in May, 1710, a petition for incorporation as a separate town was presented to the General Court. This petition was signed by the following persons: Benjamin Mills, Andrew Dewing, John Fisher, Ephraim Ware, Richard More, Robert Cook, Jeremiah Woodcock, Henry Alden, Thomas Metcalf, Benjamin Mills, Jr., Eleazer Kingsbury, Ebenezer Ware, James Kingsbury, Josiah Kingsbury, Joseph Hawes, Jonathan Dewing, John Smith, Jr., Thomas Fuller, Robert Fuller, Christopher Smith, John Gill, John Parker, Jr., John McIntire, Isaac Parker, Hezekiah Broad, Matthias Ockinton, Andrew Dewing, Jr., William Mills, Zechariah Mills, Jonathan Parker, Timothy Kingsbury, Samuel Bacon, Andrew Wadkins, Joshua Smith, Samuel Parker, John Fisher, Jr., John Woodcock, Edward Cook, Stephen Hunting, John Parker.

This petition, however, was opposed by the town of Dedham, and a committee was chosen by that town to appear at the October session of the General Court and remonstrate against the division. The General Court did not immediately grant the prayer of the petitioners, but advised the inhabitants of Dedham to exempt the petitioners from paying taxes for the support of the minister then settled in their town, provided they would have preaching among themselves. This advice was complied with by a vote of the town November 13th following.

In addition to this, March 19, 1711, the proprietors of undivided land in Dedham granted to the settlers here two lots of land, containing about one hundred and thirty-three acres, for the support of the ministry.

Although the situation of the inhabitants was now virtually that of a separate precinct, yet they persevered in their efforts for incorporation as a town, and on the 5th of November, 1711, the General Court granted an order incorporating that portion of Dedham north of the Charles River under the name of Needham.

What gave the new town the name of Needham is not definitely known, but Rev. Stephen Palmer, who was an authority on the local history of this town, in a note to an historical address delivered by him in 1811, says, "The author has been informed by one of the descendants of the venerable Timothy Dwight, of Dedham, who was a member of the Legislature when this town was incorporated, that it was named Needham at the request of Governor Dudley after Needham in England, and because that town is near to Dedham, although in a different county."

The first town-meeting was held Dec. 4, 1711, when the following selectmen were chosen: John Fisher, John Smith, Benjamin Mills, and Robert Cook. Timothy Kingsbury was chosen town clerk. Robert Cook was also the first representative to the General Court, May 19, 1712.

At the same meeting (Dec. 4, 1711) the selectmen, with Jonathan Gay, Jeremiah Woodcock, Thomas Metcalf, and Eleazer Kingsbury, were made a committee to select a suitable place for burying the dead.

In less than two months from the incorporation of the town (Dec. 25, 1711) the inhabitants voted to build a house for public worship. This house was raised in 1712, and in 1713-15 money was granted for finishing various parts of it; "but," says Mr. Palmer, "it does not appear that the house was entirely finished, nor is there any account that it was ever dedicated." The first candidate to preach to them was a Mr. Dewing, March 16, 1713, but the first regular pastor was Rev. Jonathan Townsend, ordained March 23, 1720. The church chose Mr. Townsend, Thomas Metcalf, and Josiah Newell as deacons, all of whom declined, when Jeremiah Woodcock and Timothy Kingsbury were chosen, and accepted.

The first baptism was Ruth, child of Deacon Timothy Kingsbury, July 3, 1720.

The Westerly Precinct was set off Oct. 3, 1774, and in 1778 was made a separate society.

"A church bell was for the first rung in this town" Nov. 15, 1811.

The educational interest of the town received the early attention of the first settlers, and in their petition for incorporation they expressed a concern for the education of their children.

In 1796 a social library was established in the town.

NEEDHAM—(Continued).

War of the Revolution.—In the first battle of the war of the Revolution five citizens of Needham sacrificed their lives, and "cemented with their blood the foundation of American liberty." In proportion to its population Needham suffered more severely than any other town except Lexington. Three companies with full ranks hastened to the combat. Capt. Kingsbury's company numbered forty men, Capt. Aaron Smith's seventy men, Capt. Robert Smith's seventy-five men, one hundred and eighty-five in all. It is probable that few, if any, able-bodied men remained at home. The news of the battle reached Needham about nine o'clock in the morning, the messenger passing through the town to Dover and Dedham. The East Company, commanded by Capt. Robert Smith, immediately assembled at the meeting-house, and marched to Watertown, where refreshments were furnished. They then hastened on to the scene of action, where they did efficient service in harassing the British troops in their hurried retreat from Lexington and Concord.

There is a tradition that the alarm was given at the west part of the town by a man who rode through the place bare-headed. At that time Ephraim Bullard kept a tavern on the Sherborn road. This house stood near where the stone lodge at the entrance to the college grounds now stands.

Bullard went up on the hill near by, and discharged a gun three times as a signal. Great fires were made in the house and bullets moulded, the women assisting in the work. The men were supplied and sent off as fast as possible. It is said that the West Needham men reached the scene of conflict a little in advance of the East Company, having received the alarm earlier.

The following is a list of the names of the men composing the Needham companies, copied from the original muster-rolls on file in the State archives:

"In Council March 19th, 1776. Read and allowed, thereupon ordered that a Warrant be drawn on the Treas'r for £67 17s. 1½d. in full discharge of the same."

The following particulars have been gathered, relating to the men who were killed. They were all natives of Needham except Chamberlain.

Sergeant Elisha Mills was the son of Zechariah and Margaret (Kenrick) Mills, and was born in 1735; married Deborah Lyon on May 10, 1759. Children,—Elisha, Debby, Elizabeth, Nathaniel, Paul, and George. He was by occupation a blacksmith. He owned the farm on the south road which some few years ago belonged to Mr. Horace Felton. The Mills house was taken down in 1862, by Mr. Felton, who erected a new house a short distance from the old site. It is said that Mills came to his death in the following manner: He with others were in a barn as the main body of the red-coats were passing, the flank guard being close by. Mills stepped out, raised his gun to his shoulder and fired. He instantly fell pierced by a half-dozen balls. His body was brought home the next day in a cart, driven by Aaron Smith, Jr., who afterwards married the widow.

Amos Mills, son of Isaac and Abigail (Ward) Mills, was born June 29, 1732. He left a widow and six children. He was a cousin of Elisha Mills. He lived at the west part of the town, on what is now called Blossom Street. His home has since been known as the Abijah Stevens place.

Jonathan Parker was born April 19, 1747, and was, therefore, just twenty-eight years of age at the time of his death. He was the son of Jonathan and Anna (Wight) Parker. Married Jemima Allen June 1, 1769. They had one son, Jonathan. There may have been other children, but their births are not on record. He owned a dwelling-house, barn, and about thirty-six acres of land, appraised in 1776 at one hundred and sixty-five pounds. The house he occupied was taken down some years ago by the late Spencer Fuller. It stood within a few rods of the residence of Mr. William Pierce. His widow married Deacon Isaac Shepard. According to tradition, Parker and one Aaron Fisher, also of Needham, had sheltered themselves behind a barn to get a shot at the enemy, when they were surprised by the flank guard. Parker was shot making for the woods. Fisher escaped.

Lieut. John Bacon lived in that part of Needham set off to Natick in 1797. Born in 1721; married Abigail Sawin, 1744. They had nine children. Austin Bacon, Esq., a great-grandson of Lieut. Bacon, gives the following interesting account of the circumstances attending the death of his ancestor: "In the night or near morning the alarm was given, and he set off on horseback to join his comrades at the more eastern part of the town, and sent his horse back when they got nearly to the Lower Falls. Soon after he had gone a trumpet sounded, and some Framingham men came along with one Nero Benson, a negro, for a trumpeter, and every house they passed had a blast. I think it was early the next morning before they heard from him, when one Hawes, they used to call 'Old Hawes,' came home (he was a soldier in the French and Indian war), and gave the following account: 'That Bacon and himself were on a ledge of rocks in Menotomy behind a stone wall, trying to get a good shot at the red-coats. Hawes was fearful lest the flank guard should surprise them, and kept a lookout. Bacon, with his powder in his hat, was lying behind the wall with another, when Hawes said, 'Run or you are dead, here's the side guard.' They tried to get over the wall, but Bacon was shot through near the third button on his vest. Immediately on receiving the news my grandfather (son of Lieut. Bacon) went off to see how it was, and near night, April 20, came home with his clothes, the body having been buried at West Cambridge. The clothes were found in the school-house, and the moment grandfather entered the room he knew the old striped hat which was put on top of the roll of clothes."

Bacon was described as a great worker, and would oftentimes have eight or ten Indians, negroes, and four yoke of oxen in his field.

He went to Annapolis Royal in the French war, between 1745 and 1748.

Nathaniel Chamberlain was a soldier in the French war. His name appears on a "Return of men Inlisted for his Majesty's Service for the Total Reduction of Canada." He is there stated to be a resident of Needham, born in Roxbury, enlisted March 20, 1760, at that time forty-one years of age. From the town records we learn that Nathaniel and Jane Chamberlain had four children,—Abijah, Jane, Nathaniel, and Anne.

John Tolman was severely wounded. "He was so nearly shot through the body that the ball was extracted from the opposite side." He recovered, and afterwards served a term in the war.

Lieut. Eleazer Kingsbery was wounded. "It is said that he was struck in the leg by a musket-ball, which was prevented from penetrating the flesh by his leather breeches."

In 1851 a granite obelisk was erected in a slightly position in the old cemetery. Upon the side of the monument facing the public street appears the following inscription :

" In memory of John Bacon,
Amos Mills,
Elisha Mills,
Jona' Parker, and N. Chamberlain, who fell at Lexington
April 19, 1775.
For Liberty they died."

The following narrative of Revolutionary events is taken from an unpublished autobiography kept by Rev. Samuel West, who was the minister of the town in 1775 :¹

"Clouds and thick darkness at this period threatened an impending storm to these American colonies. Every week and almost every day produced something new, either to manifest or to increase the irritation of the people. Mobs were continually rising, and some of our best men were dragged from their houses, arraigned before the basest and meanest members of society, and treated with every mark of indignity. In a boiling cauldron, the scum and filth naturally rose to the top, while that which was most valuable as naturally sunk to the bottom. The measures pursued by the government in Great Britain were precisely such as to keep up the former, without any tendency to accomplish their purpose.

"On the 19th of April, 1775, the storm burst upon us in such a manner as to produce the utmost consternation and distress, both to the British and Americans who witnessed the scene. I shall not detail the circumstances which attended the tragic affair any further than as they are immediately connected with the object of the memoirs, which is not to give a history of the times any further than as events relate to or immediately affect myself and family. In the night after the 18th of April, a detachment of the British troops marched out of Boston for the purpose of securing to themselves or destroying the provisions, etc., which had been deposited at Concord by order of the provincial government. They in part effected their purpose, but were soon attacked by our people, and a continual skirmish was kept up during the march from Concord to Boston. About one hundred on both sides were killed, and many were wounded. The news reached us about nine o'clock A.M. The East Company in Needham met at my house, as part of the military stores were deposited with me; they then supplied themselves, and by ten o'clock all marched for the place of action, with as much spirit and resolution as the most zealous friend to the cause could have wished for. We could easily trace the march of the troops from the smoke which arose over them, and could hear from my house the report of the cannon and the platoons fired by the British. The Needham company were soon on the ground, but, unhappily, being ignorant of what are called flank guards, they inserted themselves between them and the main body of the British troops. In consequence of which they suffered more severely than their neighbors, who kept at a greater distance.

"Never did I know a more anxious day than this, not so much on account of what was taking place, although that was solemn and deeply affecting, but I considered it as no more than the beginning of sorrows, and a prelude to infinitely more distressing scenes which we expected would follow. We even anticipated the enemy, enraged as they were, at our doors and in our houses, acting over all the horrors which usually attend the progress of an exasperated victorious army, especially in civil wars like this. Whatever I had read on the subject now came fresh to my mind, and produced the most painful apprehensions. All this actually took place, though not as I expected with respect to my family and neighbors, yet in other and many parts of America. But it was a happy circumstance that the people in general, and even our principal leaders, had none of these gloomy apprehensions, and flattered themselves that the contest would soon be over. That if we could but dispose of the British force already here, that government would never think of pursuing the affair any further, but come to some compromise with the colonies to mutual advantages. In the evening we had intelligence that several of the Needham inhabitants were among the slain, and the next morning it was confirmed that five had fallen in the action and that several others had been wounded. It was remarkable that the five who fell had families and several of them very numerous families, so there were about forty widows and fatherless children made in consequence of their death. I visited those families immediately, and with a sympathetic sense of their affliction I gave to some the first intelligence which they had of the dreadful event,—the death of a husband and a parent. The very different manner in which the tidings were received discovered the different dispositions of the sufferers. While some were almost frantic in their grief, others received the news in profound silence, as if in a consternation of grief they were incapable of shedding tears or uttering sighs or groans. I shall only add further, with respect to this memorable day, that it appeared to have a surprising effect on the spirit of the people in general, and, from being, as I had supposed them, and as they were actually, mild and gentle, they became at once ferocious and cruel, at least towards all those whom they suspected as unfriendly to their cause. Their treatment of such as the British had left dead on the road was such as I never could have supposed. They were stripped for the sake of their clothes, and left naked on the highway until buried by order of our government."

We may fittingly close this chapter with the language of Mr. Charles C. Greenwood, being the closing words of an able article by him entitled "Needham in 1775:" "Few towns can present a nobler record for 'patriotism and devotion to the cause of civil liberty' than the good old town of Needham."

Votes During the Revolutionary Period.¹—The muster-rolls in the State archives give the names of upwards of three hundred Needham men who served in the war of the Revolution. A large number marched to Lexington, and others assisted in the fortification of Dorchester Heights, or did guard duty on Castle Island and at other places about Boston. The town had its quota of soldiers at Ticonderoga, and in the Rhode Island campaign, and of the "three years' men," many served their full time and some even more, and doubtless participated in the principal battles and witnessed the great historical events of the war. Men were raised to recruit the "Northern army" and that on Hudson's River, and prominent citizens of Needham, of whom Col. William McIntosh was the most conspicuous, served as officers in distant places.

There were doubtless other soldiers from this town whose names are either not found upon the rolls, or could only be found by an exhaustive search. When it is considered that in 1775 the population of the town was less than a thousand, and that the people were farmers with but little personal property or ready money, it will be possible to form some idea of the great sacrifices made by the patriots. Few towns were more prompt in furnishing the required supplies, or in raising their quota of men. The public action taken by the town during the great struggle for a national existence cannot be better illustrated than by the following extracts from the town records, which furnish ample evidence how nobly Needham did her part in the war, and what privations her sturdy yeomen must have borne to meet the constant drain of money and supplies which they cheerfully voted.

Aug. 31, 1774, the town chose Capt. Eleazer Kingsbery, Capt. Lemuel Pratt, Mr. Jonathan Deming, Mr. Samuel Daggett, and Capt. Caleb Kingsbery a committee "To attend a County Convention at the House of Mr. Woodward, Inn-holder in Dedham, on Tuesday the Sixth Day of September Next at Ten o'clock, before Noon, To Deliberate and Determine upon all matters as the Distressed Circumstances of this Province may Require."

Sept. 30, 1774, Capt. Eleazer Kingsbery was chosen a delegate to the Provincial Congress, to meet at Concord "the Second Tuesday of October next," and January 26th following he was again chosen agreeably to a recommendation by the Congress, Dec. 10, 1774, to the towns to choose members.

March 23, 1775, the town voted that the collectors of province taxes, who had not already paid over the money to Hon. Harrison Gray, Esq., should pay it to Henry Gardner, Esq., of Stow. Gray was the agent of the crown, and Gardner of the Congress.

May 29, 1775, Col. William McIntosh was chosen a delegate to the Provincial Congress to be held at Watertown, 31st instant, and Capt. Robert Smith, a "Committee of Correspondence."

March 11, 1776, Mr. John Slack, Mr. Michael Metcalf, and Mr. William Smith were chosen a "Committee of Correspondence, Inspection, and Safety," and June 24, 1776, the town voted to instruct and advise their present Representative, "That if the Honourable Congress for the Safety of the United Colonies Declare them Independent of the Kingdom of Great Britain, that they, the Said Inhabitants, will Solemnly Engage with their Lives and fortunes to Support them in ye measure."

July 15, 1776, the town voted to choose a committee "to Consult what Method to Raise the money to Incourage the Men that are to be Raised to Go to Canady:" Col. William McIntosh, Capt. Aaron Smith, Mr. Michael Metcalf, Capt. Robert Smith, and Mr. John Slack were chosen, and reported as follows: "That the Town Should Raise Seven Pounds in addition to the Bounty already Granted by the General Court, to Every Non-Commissioned Officer and Soldier, that should Enlist for Canady. We further Report, as our opinion that the men that were Out Last Summer in the Eight Months Service should be allowed half a turn, and if any of the Eight Months Men Should turn out and Inlist and take the Fourteen pounds shall be allowed half a turn more which will make a whole turn. We further Report as our opinion that if any Should Inlist that were Not in the Last Years' Service and take up the seven pounds Granted by the General Court Shall be allowed a whole turn; and if they take the Fourteen Pounds shall be allowed half a turn." The town also voted to grant seven pounds to each non-commissioned officer and soldier who should enlist for Canada.

Oct. 29, 1776, the town voted that the Council and House of Representatives should act as a "Joynt Body" to form a new Constitution to be published in every town in the State, and to be acted upon by the electors.

Feb. 17, 1777, it was voted to pay a bounty of fourteen pounds to each man who should enlist in the Continental army for three years, or for the war. This bounty was raised by a tax, and the town also chose a committee of seven to learn what had been paid to reinforce the army, "and who has Done a turn or part of a turn Personally," and voted to raise money by a tax to pay these claims.

February, 1777, the following persons who enlisted for service in Canada were paid their bounty of seven pounds each: Nathaniel Fisher, Aaron Fisher, Isaac Goodenow, John Kittley, Josiah Upham (for his negro's enlisting), Benjamin Mills, Jr., Benjamin Mills (3d), Ebenezer Huntting, Jonathan Huntting, Israel Huntting, Moses Eaton, Lemuel Eaton, Jonathan Whittemore, Jr., Jeremiah Woodcock (paid to his father), John Beaverstock, and John Smith, Sr.

The Declaration of Independence is spread in full upon the records in the clear and bold handwriting of Lieut. Robert Fuller, the town clerk, and is followed by an order of Council that the same be "Printed, and a Copy Sent to the Ministers of each Parish, of every Denomination within this State, and that they Severally be Required to read the Same to their Respective Congregations, as Soon as divine Service is Ended, in the afternoon, On the first Lord's Day after they shall have Received it. And after Such Publication thereof to Deliver the Said Declaration to the Clerks of their Several Towns, or Districts; who are hereby Required to Record the Same in their Respective Town, or District's Books, there to remain as a Perpetual Memorial thereof."

March 10, 1777, Mr. William Smith, Lieut. Ebenezer Fuller, and Mr. Joseph Daniell, Jr., were chosen a "Committee of Correspondence, Inspection, and Safety."

May 26, 1777, the town expressed their opinion that the Council and House of Representatives should "postpone Coming into a New form of Government at present" because of the "War Still Raging."

August 15, 1777, voted to pay a bounty of twenty pounds each to those enlisting to reinforce the Northern army.

Dec. 15, 1777, Thomas Fuller, John Bird, and Josiah Ware were chosen a committee to provide for the families of those men who had enlisted for three years, or for the war. The town also accepted the reports of committees relating to soldiers who had served near Boston in 1775 and 1776, at Ticonderoga in 1776, at York, and at Castle Island, and voted eight shillings per month to those men who went to the islands near Boston in 1776, and four pounds each to those who went to Providence in May, 1777. Lieut. Moses Bullard was allowed £6 13s. 4d. "for his Going to Ticonderoga," Lieut. Oliver Mills the same for going to York in December, 1776, and Lieut. Enoch Kingsbery £3 6s. 8d. for going to York.

Feb. 6 and 9, 1778, the selectmen granted orders on the town treasurer to two hundred and twenty-nine persons for services or money paid during the war. The amounts averaged about £6. March 9th, Josiah Eaton, Henry Dewing, and Ebenezer Newell were chosen a "Committee of Correspondence, Inspection, and Safety."

In 1778 the town paid for clothes, shoes, etc., furnished the army, and May 6th of that year a committee was chosen to hire men "at the best method they can," to reinforce Gen. Washington and the army at Hudson's River. Col. William McIntosh, Capt. Aaron Smith, Capt. Eleazer Kingsbery, Sergt. Jonathan Gay, and Mr. Aaron Smith, Jr., were chosen, and the necessary money voted.

May 22, 1778, Benjamin Mills, Jeremiah Daniel, and Jonathan Smith were added to the committee to care for soldiers' families, and May 28th the town voted £154 to pay for the clothing sent as a gift to the Continental soldiers that went from Needham. March 11, 1779, the committee of "Correspondence," etc., chosen the last year was re-elected.

In the winter of 1779 numerous payments were made for clothing etc., for the army, and March 19, 1779, the town accepted the reports of several committees relating to soldiers who had served in various localities. Elmun Tolman and Nathan Dewing, "that were in the Year's Service," were voted each £6 13s. 4d., and 20s. per day, with their wages, was voted to those who went, or sent others, to Rhode Island "in August Last." Also £11 per month to those who "went to Boston in September, 1778, or hired men in their Room for three months." A committee of five, consisting of Mr. John Slack, Capt. Caleb Kingsbery, Capt. Aaron Smith, Capt. Robert Smith, and Mr. Jeremiah Daniel, were chosen "to Set what Sum of money the town Shall Allow to a man that may be Drafted or Goes Voluntary into the Publick Service of the War for the Town of Needham." Aaron Smith, Jr., Jonathan Gay, and Isaac Goodenow were added the next July.

The town voted £3000 "to pay the charge of the War the Last Year," and Josiah Newell, Jr., Josiah Upham, Ensign Timothy Kingsbery, Josiah Newell, Esq., Deacon John Fisher, Moses Kingsbery, and Col. William McIntosh were chosen a committee to take care of the families of the Continental soldiers. May 24th, Jonathan Gay was added to the committee.

July 26, 1779, voted to pay £17 to those men "that went to Gard at Boston in Sep^r, 1778."

Oct. 19, 1779, the town voted to increase the appropriation of £4000 for the support of the war to £7000.

Oct. 15, 1779, the selectmen granted orders to ninety-five persons for services and money paid on account of the war, and during the first three months of 1780 many similar orders were granted.

March 13, 1780, Moses Man, Aaron Smith, Jr., and Eleazer Fuller were chosen a committee of "Correspondence, Inspection, and Safety," and March 17, 1780, Capt. Eleazer Kingsbery, Mr. Nathaniel Fisher, Mr. Ephraim Pain, Capt. Caleb Kingsbery, Mr. Ebenezer Day, Mr. Timothy Newell, and Lieut. Timothy Kingsbery were chosen a committee to "Supply the Continental Soldiers' Families."

May 29, 1780, the town voted to choose a committee of five "to hire men in the Publick Service of the War if any Shall be Wanting," and Aaron Smith, Jr., Eleazer Fuller, Josiah Newell, Jr., Enoch Parker, and Amos Fuller were chosen. It was also voted to empower the committee to hire money if necessary.

June 6, 1780, Rev. Mr. Samuel West, Nathaniel Fisher, Michael Metcalf, Capt. Aaron Smith, Josiah Newell, Esq., Samuel Daggett, Jonathan Smith, Robert Fuller, Jr., and Moses Fisk, the committee chosen to report on the acceptance of the "Form of Government" proposed for the State, reported favorably on all the articles but the third, which in their opinion was inconsistent with religious liberty. They also expressed the opinion that the writ of habeas corpus ought to be suspended in time of war only, and for not more than six months.

June 16, 1780, it was voted to raise by a tax the necessary money to hire men for the war, and Samuel Alden, John Slack, Jr., and Robert Fuller, Jr., were added to the committee chosen May 29th.

July 17, 1780, the town voted a "Tax of Thirty Thousand pounds in addition to the Thirty thousand pounds already granted to be raised this Year to hire men."

December, 1780, a tax of £23,000 was voted "to Purchase the Beef that is now Called for from the town of Needham by order of the General Court." Lieut. Oliver Mills, Samuel Daggett, and Timothy Hunting were chosen to hire men for the war. Aaron Smith, Jr., Capt. Moses Bullard, John Ayers, and Capt. John Bacon were added to this committee Jan. 15, 1781.

January 29th another committee, consisting of Capt. Moses Bullard, Moses Man, Capt. John Bacon, Samuel Fisher, Isaac Goodenow, Jr., Lieut. Enoch Kingsbery, and Capt. Robert Smith, were chosen for the same purpose.

Feb. 26, 1781, it was voted to add £250 hard money to the £300 already granted by the town "to raise ye men that are now Called for."

April 5, 1781, "Crown" Nathaniel Fisher, Capt. Robert Smith, and Capt. William Smith were chosen a committee of "Correspondence, Inspection, and Safety."

July 9, 1781, £220 hard money was voted to purchase the beef required of the town by the General Court, and Timothy Newell, Ensign Josiah Upham, and Capt. Isaac Goodenow were chosen to make the purchase. The committee to hire soldiers was re-elected. Aaron Smith, Jr., was added thereto, and £180 hard money or the equivalent in paper money was voted for the use of the committee.

March 18, 1782, it was voted to raise by tax £550 to pay the bounty of the three-years' men.

Col. William McIntosh¹ was born in Dedham, June 16, 1722. His father died when he was but two years old. He lived in his native town¹ till he attained to the age of fourteen, when he went to the State of Connecticut with the view of learning the trade of a carpenter. But, pursuing this occupation about a year, he became dissatisfied with it, and relinquishing the idea of being a mechanic he returned and lived a number of years in Roxbury. In that town he entered the marriage state Aug. 26, 1745.

It has been remarked by an eminent writer that "it is necessary for a great or useful man to be born at a proper time." The time in which he was called to act was eventful to our country, when much energy and many important duties were imperiously required. In the public and momentous concerns of this period he took an active and occasionally a perilous part.

His public career was commenced in what is called the French war. When forces were raised to repel the incursions of the enemy at Crown Point and Lake Champlain he received an ensign's commission Sept. 9, 1755, and soon after joined the army at Fort Edward. This was about two months after the memorable defeat of Gen. Braddock, when public affairs assumed a gloomy and threatening aspect. But the dangers of the enterprise did not prevent him from engaging in the defense of his country. In conflicts with the enemy he displayed much personal bravery, and though his life at times was brought into jeopardy, yet he showed no disposition to shrink from duty or desert his post. At one time in particular his situation was such that either capture or death seemed inevitable, but by the God of armies he was preserved from both.²

During this war and in testimony of his faithful services he was promoted to the office of first lieutenant. This commission, dated March 13, 1758, he received at Lake George, where he was then stationed. This higher trust he executed with his accustomed fidelity in further defending the rights of his country.

On leaving the army he returned to his family and to the duties of a private citizen in Roxbury. He continued in that town till May 23, 1764, when he removed to Needham. Here he has steadily resided to the end of his days, a period of nearly forty-nine years, and has been much esteemed and respected among us. About the year 1774, when the militia in this town was divided into two companies, he was chosen the first captain of the company in this part of the town. Soon after this appointment he was raised to the office of lieutenant-colonel. This office he held at the commencement of the Revolution and discharged the duties of it in the first action of the war, that well-known action which took place in this vicinity.

On the 14th of February, 1776, by the Council of this State he was appointed colonel of the first regiment of militia in the county of Suffolk. Under this appointment he went into the army at different stages of the war, and was engaged in some of the important battles which were fought. In time of engagement he was noted for his coolness, fortitude, and bravery. While he was guarded and prudent in his measures, he was also courageous and firm in his conduct. His military talents and services caused him to be noticed and respected. By his companions in arms he was much approved; commanders of a higher grade paid him a tribute; and even by the great Washington, according to correct information, he was called a good officer and a brave man. It is, therefore, no more than justice to his memory that he should be enrolled in that catalogue of worthies whose patriotism and heroic exertions, under the auspices of Providence, secured the freedom and independence of our country.

But the public services of our friend were not confined to the field; he was also much employed in the cabinet. The public concerns of this town and of this parish have been often committed to his trust. For twelve years he served the town in the capacity of a selectman, and five years he was a representative of it in General Court, during which periods he was occasionally appointed on many important committees, and was esteemed a valuable member of the Legislature.

We have yet to add, and what may be ranked among the more important acts of his public life, that in the year 1779 he was chosen and acted as a member of the convention which formed the Constitution of this commonwealth. And in the year 1788 he was also a member of the convention in this State appointed for the purpose of taking into consideration the national Constitution, and voted for its adoption.

Col. McIntosh was naturally a man of firmness and stability. Possessing a well-poised constitution, he was remarkably even and uniform in his deportment, small things did not move him; though he was by no means destitute of passion, and was susceptible of strong feelings, yet he had the government of himself. He mixed prudence with fortitude, and was habitually guarded and exemplary in what he said and did.

² At this time he was deserted by his men, and within pistol-shot of the enemy was fired upon singly by five hundred Indians. But being on descending ground, they shot over him, and through divine protection he was enabled to escape.

Congregational Church.¹—The town of Needham, originally a part of Dedham, was incorporated Nov. 5, 1711. The first Congregational Church was organized March 20, 1720, on the Sabbath, and Mr. Jonathan Townsend, the first minister, was ordained March 23, 1720. He was born in Lynn in 1698, and was graduated from Harvard College in 1716. He continued with this church forty-two years and a half. The Rev. Samuel West, D.D., succeeded him, his settlement occurring April 25, 1764. He resigned Nov. 15, 1788, and was installed over the Hollis Street Church, in Boston, the next year, where he remained until his death, April 10, 1808. Mr. West was born in Martha's Vineyard, 1738, and was graduated at Harvard in 1761. Four years after Mr. West's resignation Mr. Stephen Palmer was ordained. His pastorate continued until his death, Oct. 31, 1821. Mr. Palmer was born in Norton, 1766, and was graduated at Harvard, 1789.

Mr. William Ritchie was installed Dec. 12, 1821. He was born in Peterborough, N. H., 1781, and was graduated at Dartmouth in 1804.

For more than a century was this church firm in its belief in the cardinal doctrines of the evangelical churches of New England. There came a time of spiritual apathy which resulted in an almost entire departure from the early faith, and the church passed out of the hands of Congregationalism.

The year 1855 marks the beginning of the later history of Congregationalism in the eastern part of the town of Needham. There were at that time a number of persons who had no opportunity to worship with the church of their choice. There were others who attended services in some of the adjoining towns. There had been for some time a desire to have Congregational preaching in their midst. This feeling becoming known to the Rev. Ebenezer Burgess, then pastor of the Congregational Church in Dedham, he offered to preach for them. His offer was gladly accepted, and the first service was held on the first Sunday in April, 1855, in Nehoiden Hall, at the Centre. The building is now used as a tenement house. Dr. Burgess gave his services to this people for thirteen months. He paid all the expenses of the meetings during this time, furnished the Bible which was used, often bringing singers with him to the services, and not being pleased with the condition of the walls of the hall, he had them papered at his own expense. This church, as well as at least two others in the neighborhood, owes very much to Dr. Burgess' kindness and labor freely bestowed. He was the father of the enterprise here, and is gratefully remembered.

In 1856, on the last Monday of April, a meeting was called of those interested in these services to see what should be done for the future. They decided to continue the services at their own expense, and since that time they have been independent, never having received aid from any missionary society. Many of the people living at a distance from Nehoiden Hall, it was thought best to hold the meetings in a more central place. Village Hall, near the depot, was hired for this purpose, and was fitted up in an appropriate manner. This hall was burned in the spring of 1882. The first service was held in this new place of worship on the first Sunday of July, 1856. Dr. Burgess preached the first sermon. The pulpit was supplied by various ministers until Feb. 8, 1857, when the Rev. Lucius R. Eastman was engaged as stated supply, being the first minister to reside among this people.

The time had evidently arrived when a church organization was needed, and a council was called to advise and aid in such organization. The council met on May 6, 1857. The Dedham, Dover, Medfield, West Needham, Grantville, and Newton Congregational Churches were represented in the council. The church was at this time regularly organized, under the name of the Evangelical Congregational Church. The exercises consisted of reading of the Scriptures and prayer by the Rev. U. Haskell, of Dover; sermon, from Eph. ii. 20, by the venerable Dr. Burgess, of Dedham; reading of the church creed and covenant by the Rev. Lucius R. Eastman, acting pastor; charge and baptism of children by the Rev. A. R. Baker, of West Needham; fellowship of the churches, by the Rev. E. S. Atwood, of Grantville; address to the people, by the Rev. J. H. Fairchild, of South Boston; concluding prayer, by the Rev. Andrew Bigelow, of Medfield. The church formed consisted of twenty-eight persons, ten of them males and eighteen females. The following is the list of names of the original members:

Mrs. Sarah W. Nay.

Mrs. Jane W. Pickering.

Ten of the original members are now (Feb. 27, 1884) living.

The Rev. Mr. Eastman continued with the church until Jan. 1, 1859.

The Rev. William B. Greene became acting pastor Sept. 1, 1859. He was ordained in Waterville, Me., in 1855, and came from that place to Needham. His relation to the church extended over fourteen years, a period which witnessed considerable growth and prosperity. The society at the close of his term of service was more prosperous than at any previous time.

On the 6th of July, 1859, a Sunday-school was formed in connection with the church. For nearly three years the people assembled in Village Hall, when it was felt that the desire for a house of worship might be gratified. On the 23d of May, 1859, the society voted to build a chapel. The site for the new building was given to the society by Mr. Charles E. Keith. Measures were at once taken to forward this project, and so vigorously was it pushed that before the close of the year the chapel was completed. It was originally intended that this chapel should in a few years give way to a church building, but although able to build, not many years later, financial troubles coming in the midst of preparations to that end, the plan has never been carried out. The chapel was dedicated, free from debt, Dec. 28, 1859. The dedication sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. E. N. Kirk, of Mount Vernon Church, Boston. Jan. 1, 1860, the first Sunday services were held, Mr. Greene preaching the first sermon. The congregation at this time did not fill the house, but it increased steadily for many years. Mr. Greene's connection with the church ceased April 1, 1873.

The first settled pastor was the Rev. Augustus C. Swain, who was ordained and installed June 25, 1873. He remained with the church less than a year, being dismissed by council April 22, 1874.

The Rev. J. L. Wheeler commenced preaching here in April, 1874, as stated supply, till April 1, 1875. He was ordained in 1869, and came here from Gardiner, Mass.

The Rev. J. E. M. Wright became acting pastor July 7, 1875. He was ordained in 1852. He came from the church in Upton, Mass. The five years of his labors with this church saw the membership of the society reach its largest number, and afterwards suffer from removals. Nearly thirty families in a short period removed from the town, among the number some of the most helpful members and officers of the church. A revival during the latter part of Mr. Wright's ministry here resulted in considerable gain in the membership of the church. Mr. Wright closed his relation April 1, 1880.

For nearly two years the pulpit was supplied by different ministers. In the spring of 1882 it was determined to secure a pastor for the church. In the mean time the chapel was frescoed, the expense being borne by the Ladies' Friendly Society, which from the first has been abundant in labors for the good of the church.

The Rev. Lewis W. Morey was ordained and installed pastor of the church Sept. 6, 1882.

The First Parish of Needham¹ has an existence coeval with that of the town. Early in the eighteenth century a few houses with outlying farms dotted the section now embraced in the towns of Needham and Wellesley. These settlers, prompted by that inborn instinct for local civil organization which is a marked feature of the Anglo-Saxon, and feeling the need of religious ministrations so characteristic of the New England Puritans, soon began to take measures for the organization of a separate town and worship. In 1710, they petitioned the General Court for an act to set apart their precinct and make it a town. In consequence of an energetic opposition on the part of Dedham the petition was refused, but the General Court advised the inhabitants of Dedham to exempt the petitioners from paying taxes for the support of the Dedham minister, provided they would have preaching in their own precinct. The next year, at the March meeting, Dedham voted a grant to these settlers of two lots of land containing one hundred and thirty-three acres, for the support of the ministry among them. This was the germ out of which grew the First Parish Church and society. A portion of this land, including the cemetery, is still owned by the parish.

For the sake of definiteness and precision, we will divide the sketch of this ancient parish into separate heads.

I. The Meeting-House.—The town of Needham, on Dec. 25, 1711, voted to build a house for public worship and granted eighty pounds for this purpose, one-half to be paid in money, the other half in labor.

When we consider all the circumstances, this enterprise evidenced both courage and faith. It was a costly undertaking. The inhabitants were scattered and lived by dint of the utmost frugality and economy. The real difficulties were increased by a sharp division in respect to the site of the edifice. The contest became so hot that an appeal was made to the General Court, and this august body appointed a committee to fix the location. The various parties acquiesced in the decision, even if they were not fully satisfied. The work of building went on very slowly. The frame was raised in the summer of 1712, but it was not until the next year that money was voted by the town for glazing. Meanwhile services were held in the unfinished meeting-house. There is no record of its being either finished or dedicated. These earnest worshipers were not dependent on cushioned seats, frescoed walls, and heated furnaces. They went in and out of this meeting-house until Sunday, Oct. 17, 1773. On this day a child was christened, and the pastor, the Rev. Mr. West, preached a sermon from Psalm iv. 5: "Offer the sacrifice of righteousness, and put your trust in the Lord." During the night following the neighbors were startled as they saw the meeting-house in flames. As the town voted a reward for the discovery of the person who set it on fire, we infer it was the act of an incendiary, but the culprit was never found. These frugal and hardy pioneers met their loss with stout hearts and voted in town meeting two hundred pounds towards rebuilding, and chose a committee of five to proceed at once with the work. The old feud about location again broke out, and the disagreement led to a division of the town into two precincts. The frame of the new house was raised either on the 3d or 4th of August, 1774, and in three weeks the services in the unfinished building were resumed. Gradually, though slowly, the house was finished and remained until 1811, when it was repaired with the addition of a "handsome tower," and on Nov. 15, 1811, a bell was hung and for the first time rung in the town. The same bell is used in the edifice of the First Parish now on "the plains."

As an illustration of the reputation of this bell, the story is told that the meeting-house at Newton Upper Falls having had the bells, both proving unsatisfactory, the bell-makers maintained that the defect in tone was caused either by the location of the building or the construction of the tower. To test this the First Parish bell was loaned, and, as it rang out its clear, rich tones in Newton Upper Falls, the judgment was that the two bells were at fault.

The old meeting-house was taken down in 1835, and out of its timbers a new frame was made, and the building was finished. Gradually there came a change over the town. Two villages grew up around the railroad stations,—one at Needham Plains and the other at Grantville. The worshipers of the latter place organized another parish and dedicated a church. Thus the old meeting-house was away from the larger part of the congregation. It was, therefore, necessary to move it to the centre of population. So it was taken bodily on wheels in 1879 and rolled along the outskirts of the village and placed on its present location near the railroad station. It was entirely refitted, and is now an ornament and a thing of use and beauty in the centre of the village on "the plain."

II. The Ministers.—The First Parish has had a succession of faithful and devout ministers. As soon as the parish was organized, the people began to look out for a pastor. A large number of candidates were heard and five received calls to settle, but declined. But, nothing daunted, the people continued their quest. They held special days of fasting and prayer for guidance, and sought advice from the leading ministers of Boston and their neighborhood. After more than eight years of effort, on Dec. 29, 1719, they gave a unanimous call to Mr. Jonathan Townsend, whose acceptance, dated Jan. 25, 1720, was read in town-meeting, "to the great satisfaction of the people." Mr. Townsend was ordained March 23, 1720, and continued his ministry till Sept. 30, 1762, covering a period of forty-two years. The Rev. Stephen Palmer, in his "Century Sermon," thus draws his portrait: "Possessing strong powers of mind, cultivated and improved by education and study, he was enabled to think deeply and correctly." His accurate knowledge of dates, candor, and judgment were so marked that his advice was often sought both by his own parishioners and for the settlement of controversies and difficulties in the neighboring churches. His ministry as a whole was peaceful till, about 1746, the church was plunged into controversy about the employment of "illiterate teachers" and the right to have separate meetings among themselves. Mr. Townsend, like most of his ministerial brethren, regarded the ministry as an "appointed order of men who are separated unto the gospel of God." He also placed special stress on the importance and value of an educated ministry, so he set his face with firmness against the teaching and practice of the New Lights upon these matters. This led to a split, and some of the disaffected withdrew from the parish. "In the main," says Mr. Palmer, "he was happy with his people, sharing much in their affection and esteem."

After an interval of two years and seven months, during which period the people in a day of fasting and prayer sought for divine direction, Mr. Samuel West received a call on Nov. 7, 1763, from the church, and on December 5th, following, "the congregation concurred." He was ordained April 25, 1764, and continued his ministrations until Nov. 2, 1788, at which time he preached his last sermon. The separation really took place Jan. 12, 1789, when he was dismissed by a vote of the parish. Mr. West gave as a reason for his leaving "a difference of opinion with respect to ministerial support." The differences between the minister and parish so far as indebtedness was concerned was settled by a mutual agreement between the parties. The Rev. Thomas Thacher, as quoted by Dr. Palmer, describes him as "a man of talents, of extensive erudition, and of very amiable and polished manners. This is acknowledged by all who were acquainted with him. While he continued in the ministry here, he was esteemed a faithful and affectionate pastor; and was highly acceptable to the people of his charge."

The Rev. Stephen Palmer, after a lapse of four years, received a call June 11, 1792. The interval between this call and the resignation of Mr. West was a period of discouragement. But the few and faithful stood firm in their support of the parish. Mr. Hendrius Dow was invited to settle Aug. 2, 1790, but declined, and on June 11, Mr. Stephen Palmer received a call, and was ordained the 7th of November, 1792. Mr. Palmer was the son of a minister, and inherited from his father a love of knowledge. He graduated from Cambridge with academic honors, and entered upon the ministry with interest and devotion. It was during his life that what the historian, Hildreth, calls the spirit of latitudinarianism began to prevail. Mr. Palmer, though orthodox in his theological opinions, was liberal in his methods of study and conviction. The Rev. John White, of West Dedham, in his funeral discourse on the death of Mr. Palmer, quotes him as saying, "Every man will have a creed of his own. I have mine,—but have no right to impose it upon others, nor have others any right to impose theirs upon me. I have never viewed my opinions to be such mountains, as a different faith cannot remove, nor have I ever yet believed myself to be infallible. He who thinks he has no more light to receive, has seen but little, and he who is not open to convictions is in bondage to himself."

The ministry of Mr. Palmer was marked by fidelity both as a preacher and pastor. As an evidence of the acceptance of his ministrations there are no less than twenty of his publications, most of them either sermons or addresses on special occasions. The memory of him still remains among the oldest surviving members of the parish as a pleasant tradition. He died Oct. 31, 1821.

At the death of Mr. Palmer, the parish at once proceeded to settle a new minister, and the Rev. William Ritchie received a call Dec. 12, 1821. The period of his ministry was at the time the doctrinal controversy arose, which led to the separation of the New England Congregational Churches into two distinct bodies known as the Orthodox and Unitarian. Mr. Ritchie sympathized with the Unitarians, and as the ministers of most of the old parishes in the neighborhood were of this drift, he was in fellowship with them. This was a source of disagreement on the part of some of his hearers who were inclined to the more orthodox belief. Still, his ministry was, as a whole, a very useful and harmonious one. Towards its close his health failed, and on Dec. 17, 1841, he resigned his active charge with the request that he might retain his relation as pastor. The correspondence between him and the parish abounds in the expressions of mutual kindness and esteem. He alludes to the great changes which had taken place in the parish during his ministry, and expresses his deep interest in the future religious welfare of his beloved parishioners. The letter of the society in reply is both sympathetic and appreciative. His death, which took place Feb. 22, 1842, awakened a deeper feeling of tenderness, and the parish voted to pay his funeral expenses, and his people with loving care placed his remains in the grave, and carried with them the memory of his useful and devoted life.

The Rev. Lyman Maynard, a minister in fellowship with the Universalist Church, was installed as the successor of Mr. Ritchie, Sept. 8, 1842. According to the arrangement with the parish the settlement was for an indefinite term, the parties being at liberty to dissolve the connection on giving each other six months' notice. When the call was given it was also voted that the parish committee call upon Mr. Maynard, and request that he should exchange with clergymen in the vicinity of different denominations within convenient distance. The committee, it would seem, did not inform Mr. Maynard of this arrangement, for in a communication next year he said he would consent to exchange with the Rev. Mr. Partridge, of Newton, and the Rev. Mr. Spear, of Weymouth, both of whom were of the Universalist persuasion; that had he been informed of the vote of the parish on this subject, he should have hesitated before accepting the call. He had known much disunion to grow out of such a course, and had fears of the result. He hoped, however, for the best, and should use his utmost efforts to promote a spirit of harmony in the society. Mr. Maynard's connection closed in 1846, and then followed a series of short settlements. The Rev. C. H. A. Dall's ministry was from Feb. 7, 1847, to Dec. 1, 1849; the Rev. James F. Hicks, from July 14, 1852, to December, 1853. The Rev. George Channing supplied the pulpit for the next two years. He was succeeded by Mr. Andrew N. Adams, who was ordained at Needham Nov. 21, 1855. After a brief ministry the Rev. William Barry was next settled, and his ministry was both devoted and fruitful in good works. He was followed by the Rev. George H. Emerson, D.D., who supplied the pulpit with acceptance. In 1870, after his engagement ended, the society called the Rev. A. B. Voise, who also supplied, in addition, the pulpit of the Unitarian Church at Grantville. The service in the First Parish Church was held in the forenoon—that at Grantville in the afternoon. The next year the society at the latter place gave Mr. Voise a call to be their minister, and the Rev. S. W. Bush succeeded him, and still is minister of the First Parish.

III. The Parish and Church.—Like all the old Puritan Congregational Churches, the First Parish had a twofold organization known as the Parish and the Church. The parish organization was devoted chiefly to the care of the financial affairs, and the records abound in illustrations of the difficulties of the voluntary system for the support of religious institutions. For a long time the First Parish was the only religious society in East Needham, and as diversities of religious opinions prevailed, added to the extreme individualism which is inbred in New England Puritanism, it was not always easy to raise the minister's salary. Still with these inherent difficulties the members of this old historic society maintained for successive generations the ministrations of the pulpit. The parish records, which have been kept with unusual accuracy and care, contain full evidence of the earnest fidelity with which the cause of religion was maintained.

The church organization concerned itself with the spiritual affairs of the parish. It was embodied March 23, 1720, and on July 3d following the ordinance of the Lord's Supper was first administered, when about fifty communicants were present. Two deacons, Thomas Metcalf and Josiah Newell, were chosen, and a covenant was signed March 18, 1720. This covenant was very mildly orthodox in its statement of belief, and in no way bound its subscribers to a rigid creed. It was silent on those doctrines which are called Calvinistic, and its definition of the Trinity would be accepted by those who are Sabelians. In 1764, October 19th, this covenant was renewed by the members of the church with an addition practical in its character. No mention is made of a belief in any specific doctrines which have since been emphasized by a large body of the New England Orthodox Congregational Churches. This covenant continued until about 1850, when a new one was adopted. In this, after an acknowledgment and confession of sin, the candidate is thus addressed by the minister: "You sincerely and solemnly give up yourselves to God the Father, whom you receive as your God. . . . to the Lord Jesus Christ, and receive him as made of God unto you, wisdom and righteousness, and sanctification and redemption." This covenant with verbal alterations, but the same in substance of doctrine, is still used.

In the idea of church-fellowship we can trace a gradual growth. At first the church refused to give members a dismission, and to recommend them to the Baptist, Methodist, and other communions, but in the course of time their ideas broadened, and July 19, 1840, it was voted "as there is but one Christian Church in the world, they consider it improper to dismiss from the church." But as there are branches of the Christian Church, the record adds, which require a certificate of dismission as well as recommendation, this church will comply with request of those members who wish to join another branch of the one Christian Church.

The early records of the church also abound in details of proceedings growing out of some unchristian conduct. If a member had a grievance against a brother or sister, it was brought before the church. One incident which illustrates the early period is worthy of mention. In 1736 several of the brethren fell into hot disputes about certain personal matters so that they became angry. The affair was submitted to the church, and after a full hearing the disaffected brethren were exhorted to bury their differences in one common grave of forgetfulness, and for the time to come to live and act towards each other as Christians. They agreed to do this. So, after singing a psalm, the Rev. Mr. Townsend called for a tankard of drink and drank to "the heretofore contending, but now reconciled brethren, praying that all might live and act together in love and favor, to which Capt. Cook said, Amen. Then the minister gave the tankard into Capt. Cook's hand; he drank himself and drank to Capt. Fisher. We all drank ut sic finitur. So the matter ended."

The general trend of both church and parish was towards what is called liberal Christianity. So the First Parish, like many other old ones in the country, became either Universalist or Unitarian. At present the First Parish holds ecclesiastical relations with the Unitarians, and its members have a reasonable hope in a more prosperous future.

The First Baptist Church.¹—"During the year 1853 the people of Needham Plains began to feel the importance of having stated evangelical worship in this new and rapidly increasing village."

In 1854, Deacon George Howland, of the Second Baptist Church at Newton, employed at his own expense Rev. Amos Webster to canvass the town and preach a few Sundays.

The first service was held September 24th, in the old school-house corner of Great Plain Avenue and Webster Street, and was attended by fifty-six persons in the morning and seventy-four in the afternoon. In connection a Sunday-school was established, with Deacon George Howland as superintendent.

A subscription paper was put in circulation about this time and nearly two thousand dollars pledged. A society was formed and a house of worship soon commenced, large enough to seat about four hundred in the audience-room and two hundred in the vestry, at a cost of four thousand two hundred dollars. The vestry only was finished and was opened to public worship early in June, 1855.

The building is situated on the corner of Great Plain and Highland Avenues.

Rev. Amos Webster continued to preach till the following October, when he resigned, and the desk was supplied by different preachers for some time.

May 26, 1856, the church was organized with twenty-five members, George Howland, deacon, and C. M. Dinsmore, clerk. A council, composed of pastors and delegates from ten Baptist Churches, was held June 11th, and the church was recognized as "an independent and regular Baptist Church." Rev. Banson Stow, D.D., preached the sermon on that occasion. A beautiful communion service was presented by Mrs. Nancy Kingsbury.

June 22d the first baptism took place, at which four candidates were immersed and received into the church.

December 7th, Rev. A. F. Willard accepted a call to become its pastor. He remained with the church nine years, although, on account of ill health, he was absent about a year. All this time the church was in debt and the people poor. But he labored faithfully for the love of the cause, part of the time without any stated salary. On account of ill health he was obliged to resign, Nov. 12, 1865. During his term of office twenty-eight were received from other churches and eighteen baptized.

At this time, by reason of the recent death of Rev. A. Harvey and the removal from the town of Deacon George Howland, the church was in a very weak state. They engaged the services of Rev. S. F. Smith, D.D., of Newton. The first five years he was with the church hardly money enough could be raised to meet the running expenses, and in the autumn of 1869, when Deacon John Burnham and the clerk, Brother G. F. de Leesdenier, died, it seemed as though the enterprise must be given up. It was at this time that the male members were so few that one man, Deacon William Moseley, held every office in the church, and was also superintendent of the Sunday-school. But the faithful efforts and self-denial of the few left were not in vain, and soon the church was strengthened by the addition of new members. In the year 1871 sixteen were baptized and five added by letter, the church debt was paid, principal and interest, amounting to seven hundred and thirty-four dollars, and early in the next year preparations for finishing the audience-room were commenced, and by June all was completed and handsomely furnished, at an expense of four thousand one hundred and fifty-four dollars, about one thousand of which was raised by the exertions of the pastor in other places.

The house was dedicated, free from debt, June 5, 1872, and a vote passed that the pews should be free. The sermon on this occasion was preached by Rev. William Lamson, D.D., of Brookline.

Aug. 1, 1873, the pastor resigned, having labored with marked success for seven years, twenty-six having been received by baptism and fourteen by letter.

Dec. 23, 1873, Rev. S. G. Abbott became pastor. During his stay quite a number of improvements were made in the church property, fifteen persons added by baptism, and fourteen by letter. Owing to the removal of several men of means from our town and the general depression of business, the church was unable to continue its relation with the pastor, and he resigned July 1, 1876.

Rev. A. T. Spaulding was settled March, 1877, and labored with good success for eight months, when he died instantly with heart-disease. He was much loved and respected by the church and community.

Rev. S. F. Smith, D.D., again supplied the pulpit until Aug. 29, 1880, when he left for a two-years' trip among the mission-fields in Europe and Asia.

Rev. E. A. Read was called to be pastor June,

1881, and continued two years, during which time various plans to aid the benevolent organizations of the denomination were formed, which have been quite successful. Since then the old friend of the church, Rev. S. F. Smith, D.D., has supplied the pulpit.

Within a few years a new furnace, organ, and chandelier have been purchased, and the buildings put in good repair and painted, all debts paid, and some money is now in the treasury. The future prosperity seems assured, and the church has extended a call to the Rev. W. H. Clark, of South Norridgewock, Me., to become its pastor. He will commence his labors in February, 1884.

The number baptized since its organization is seventy; admitted by letter, one hundred and one. Total, one hundred and seventy-one. The present membership is seventy-one, and the officers are, Deacons William Moseley and R. W. Ames, trustees; John Moseley, treasurer; Thomas Sutton, clerk; Thomas J. Crossman, superintendent of Sunday-school.

Methodist Episcopal Church, Highlandville.¹—The Methodist Episcopal Church of Highlandville, a village of Needham, was organized in April, 1867, and the Rev. John W. Coolidge, of the New England Conference, was appointed its pastor. Previous to this time many influential families of the vicinity had been connected with the Methodist Church in Newton Upper Falls; its pastors had held frequent religious services among them, resulting, especially in 1865-66, in a large addition from Highlandville to the Upper Falls Church, so that on the organization of the former thirty-four members were united with it by letter from the latter. The society, from the spring of 1867 to the summer of 1876, worshiped in a hall in the centre of the village. Its business, a fine woolen and silk hosiery, was prosperous, and its population, mostly English immigrants, increased rapidly, and the question of building a house of worship became one of deeply interesting discussion. In 1875 it took a business form, and in the summer of 1876 a beautifully-situated and convenient church edifice was completed. The enterprise, from its initiation to its consummation, was inspired by the pastor, Rev. G. R. Bent. The cost of the site, edifice, and furnishing was ten thousand dollars. Soon after its dedication the business of the village became greatly depressed, in common with that of the country at the time, and greatly embarrassed the financiers of the society. An effort has just been made for the canceling of its debt, and large success has been attained. The pastors of this society, in conformity with the itinerant usage of Methodism, have been as follows: J. W. Coolidge, 1867-68; Stephen Cushing, 1869-70; S. H. Noon, 1871-73; G. R. Bent, 1874-76; W. Silverthorn, 1877; Stephen Cushing, 1878-79; R. W. Harlow, 1880-81; Z. A. Mudge, 1882-83.

The Needham Chronicle.—The publication of the Needham Chronicle and Wellesley Advertiser, the first paper printed in this town, was founded in 1874 by George W. Southworth, a native of Stoughton, this county, who had had previous journalistic experience at Stoughton and Marlborough, in response to the express desire for a local paper by the most prominent citizens. The Chronicle enjoys a circulation in neighboring towns. At the incorporation of Wellesley the words "and Wellesley Advertiser" were dropped from the heading, and an edition called the Wellesley Advertiser issued since that time for Wellesley. The Chronicle is still under the able management of Mr. Southworth.

Changes in Boundary-Line.²—By an act of the General Court, passed in the year 1797, an alteration was made in the line between Needham and Natick. By virtue of this act sixteen hundred and fifty-six acres of land were set off from Needham to Natick, and in exchange four hundred and four and one-half acres, exclusive of pond, were set off from Natick and annexed to Needham, leaving a balance in favor of Natick of twelve hundred and fifty-one and one-half acres.

An island in Charles River, at the Upper Falls, set off from Needham and annexed to Newton, June 21, 1803.

The westerly part of the town, comprising about six thousand acres of land, with a population of about two thousand seven hundred, set off and incorporated as the town of Wellesley April 6, 1881.

DOCUMENTARY.

"NEEDHAM, July 17, 1737.

"This day died here Mrs. Lydia Chickering in the eighty-sixth year of her age. She was born at Dedham in New England, on July 14, 1652, and about the year 1671 went up from thence to Hadley, where, for the space of about a year, she waited upon Col. Whalley and Col. Goffe (two of King Charles' first judges), who had fled thither from the men that sought their life. She was the daughter of Capt. Daniel Fisher, of Dedham, one of the magistrates of this Colony under the old charter. Having lived a virtuous life, she died universally respected and came to her grave in a full age, as a shock of corn cometh in in his season."

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

EDGAR KIMBALL WHITAKER.

The ancestors of this gentleman were of Saxon origin. The ancient family-seat was in Warwickshire, upon a tract called Whiteacre or Whitacre in Domesday Book (A.D. 1086). Part of this tract is still so designated. It was "enfeoffed" to the ancestors of Simon de Whitacre, knight, of the reign of Henry I.

³ Died May 12, 1788.

⁴ Died Aug. 17, 1850, and Solomon Flagg appointed by the selectmen, Aug. 19, 1850, to serve the rest of the year.

⁵ Died May 14, 1859, and Solomon Flagg appointed by the selectmen to serve the remainder of the year.

(A.D. 1100–1135). The chiefs of the family, knights and barons, were many times called to be of the "king's council," under the first three Edwards and Richard II., a period of near one hundred years. Their coats-of-arms bore invariably three lozenges, or three mascles. Since feudal times, when their men of mark were soldiers, the Whitakers have achieved distinction as scholars, historians, divines, jurists, and physicians. The limits of this paper will not permit a recapitulation of their names and record. Suffice it that the family history is honorable.

Branches of the family settled, first, in Lancashire and Yorkshire, and afterwards in Wiltshire, Dorsetshire, and other counties. Later on, representatives emigrated to Ireland, Germany, and America. In 1611, Rev. Alexander Whitaker, known as the "apostle of Virginia," and son of Rev. William Whitaker, LL.D., Master of St. John's College, Cambridge, came to Virginia with Sir John Dale, and was established at Henrico.

Of the immediate ancestors of Edgar Kimball Whitaker, Jonathan, born about 1690, is said to have "left England on account of religious persecution, settled first in Connecticut, then on Long Island, and afterwards in New Jersey." He resided at Huntington, Island of Nassau (now Long Island), in 1724. He removed to Mine Brook Farm (purchased in 1734), near Basking Ridge, Somerset Co., N. J., where he died in 1763. A lineal descendant occupies the old homestead. He was a Puritan of the Puritans. He left a portion of his estate in trust for the Christian education of the Indians.

Of his eight known children, Nathaniel was seventh, and the third son. Nathaniel was born in 1730; was educated at Princeton, N. J., where he was graduated in 1752. He became a Presbyterian clergyman, and was first settled at Woodbridge, N. J., in 1755. In 1759, he was "called" by the Chelsea Society "to settle in the work of the gospel ministry" at Norwich, Conn., and, having accepted, "arrived with his family and goods, by water, April 12, 1760. A room for preaching had been prepared in the tavern kept by Samuel Trapp, and a bell, to take the place of the Sabbath drum, was suspended in the rear of the house, from a scaffolding erected upon a rock." Early in 1766 he was selected by the Board of Commissioners of the London and Edinburgh Societies for Propagating the Gospel in New England to visit England and Scotland in behalf of Rev. Eleazer Wheelock's Indian school at Lebanon, Conn., and during an absence of eighteen months, procured donations to the amount of eleven thousand pounds for the school, the final result being the founding of the institution at Hanover, N. H., which takes its name from Lord Dartmouth, one of the principal donors, and a warm friend of Mr. Whitaker. In one of his letters to Mr. Wheelock (March 19, 1766), he says, "Yesterday the good King went to the house, in the midst of the shouts and acclamations of a joyful people, in order to sign the Bill for Repealing the accursed Stamp Act; of this I was a spectator. A joyful day it was." St. Andrew's University gave Mr. Whitaker the degree of D.D. while he was in Scotland. In 1768 he resumed his pastorate at Norwich. In 1769 he was installed as pastor of the Old Tabernacle Church, in Salem, Mass., where he remained until 1784, when he organized a Presbyterian Church at Norridgewock, Me., retaining his charge there for six years. In 1790 he removed to Hampton, Va., where he died in 1795. His portrait—presented to him in London, by Lord Dartmouth, according to family tradition—is in the library at Dartmouth College, where it was deposited by its owner, Judge J. S. Whitaker, of New Orleans, his grandson. He was learned, a powerful writer and preacher, prone to controversy and skilled in it, an ardent patriot, and a man of indomitable will. His appearance was prepossessing, and his manners winning.

Jonathan was the seventh of Nathaniel's eight children, and was the fourth son. He was born in Salem, Mass., in 1771; was graduated at Harvard College in 1797, and became a Unitarian minister. His first pastorate was at Sharon, Mass., where he was ordained and installed in 1799, Rev. Abiel Holmes, the father of Oliver Wendell Holmes, preaching the ordination sermon. In 1817 he removed to New Bedford, Mass., where, in addition to his pastoral duties, he assumed the charge of an academy, with decided advantage to the then growing town. In 1823 he went to Summerville, S. C., where he remained some years. His next residence was in Ogdensburg, N. Y., whence he removed to Henrietta, in that State, where he preached and conducted the Monroe Academy, and where he died in 1835. He married Mary Kimball, of Bradford, Mass., sister of Rev. Daniel Kimball, long an honored resident of Needham, and of Rev. David Tenny Kimball, for fifty years Unitarian clergyman at Ipswich, Mass. Jonathan Whitaker was a thorough scholar, gifted as a public speaker, devoted to his sacred calling, and eminently successful as a teacher. During the second war with Great Britain, although an ardent Federalist, he went at the head of a company of one hundred of his parishioners to assist in throwing up the earthworks upon Dorchester Heights, near Boston, when invasion was expected.

C. H. Whitaker

Edgar Kimball was his fourth son, and the sixth of his ten children. He was born in Sharon, Norfolk Co., Aug. 27, 1806, and died in Boston, Nov. 10, 1883. He received his early instruction in the school of Rev. Dr. Richmond, pastor of the Unitarian Society at Stoughton, in whose family he lived until after his father's removal to New Bedford. At New Bedford he continued his studies at the academy established by his father, in preparation for matriculation at Harvard College, but, preferring a mercantile life, he entered the house of W. & G. Allen, of that place, in his fifteenth year. In 1823 he went to Boston, and was employed in the old dry-goods house of Lane & Lamson, and on a change of the firm, remained with his valued friend, David Lane. In 1827, his health failing, he was advised to choose a country residence, and found employment in the charge of the books of the manufacturing firm of Crocker, Richmond & Co., of Taunton, Mass. After a pleasant year in that then delightful town, with health restored, he returned to Boston, and to his old employers,—Lane & Lamson. In 1829 he went into business on his own account as a dry-goods merchant, succeeding David Lane, on Cornhill. Subsequently he established himself at the corner of Water and Washington Streets. The business of his firm was large, but its capital was mainly in the energy and business qualifications of its managers. It went down in the dark days that ended with the grand financial crash of 1837. After winding up its affairs, Mr. Whitaker went to New York, where he found occupation, first, as a clerk, and afterwards in the office of Gen. James Lorimer Graham, in conveyancing. In the summer of 1839 he left New York for East Needham, where he purchased a farm, and soon became identified with the interests of the town. Here he had two honored relatives,—Rev. Daniel Kimball, a college friend of his father, and his maternal uncle, and Mrs. Clarissa Ritchie, his mother's sister, and wife of Rev. William Ritchie, the Unitarian clergyman of the East Parish.

He had married, Oct. 28, 1830, Catharine Cravath Holland, daughter of John Holland, of Boston.

During the rebuilding of the house upon his farm, in the winter of 1839–40, Mr. Whitaker taught the Upper Falls district school, and many of the substantial, older residents of that part of Needham were among his pupils. His experience as a teacher was one of his pleasantest recollections, and it was of essential service to him in the making of friendships which made Needham always dear to him. Interested in the cause of popular education, and an earnest promoter of the common-school system in Massachusetts, his practical acquaintance with the requirements of the teacher's calling, and the defects of our old district schools made him an efficient coadjutor of his cherished friends, Horace Mann and Barnas Sears, in their great work.

In all matters affecting the prosperity and the moral progress of Needham Mr. Whitaker took a lively interest, and was indefatigable and judicious in his efforts. He devoted himself with unremitting zeal to the temperance reform. He connected himself with the Sunday-school of the Unitarian Church, and for many years was its faithful superintendent. The village Lyceum, an organization for lectures and debates (founded by Rev. Daniel Kimball, who was its presiding officer until advancing age compelled him to relinquish the charge), owed a great share of its prosperity to his constant support. He served for a long series of terms upon the town school committee, and gave much of his time to the supervision and improvement of the schools. The forlorn condition of the parish cemetery attracted his attention at an early day, and the task of its extension and embellishment was accomplished mainly in consequence of his efforts and appeals. He was foremost in the organization of the Norfolk County Agricultural Society, of which he was the first corresponding secretary, Marshall P. Wilder being its first president. At his own cost he laid out public streets. He planted shade-trees by the highways. He labored assiduously, in the face of constant opposition and discouragement, to bring the railroad through East Needham, sustaining the project almost unaided when other men grew disheartened.

Mr. Whitaker received the unsolicited appointments of justice of the peace and trial justice from Governor Briggs, a political opponent. In 1843, and several times afterwards, he was Democratic candidate for the State Senate. In 1846 he represented the town in the lower house. In 1848 he was nominated by the Democrats to succeed John Quincy Adams in Congress, and was a delegate to the Democratic National Convention at Baltimore. In 1849 he was elected one of the Governor's council. For three years he was agent of the commonwealth for the inspection of charitable institutions. In 1853 he received a position in the Boston custom-house, and remained in that service until after the inauguration of President Lincoln. In 1862, Secretary Chase gave him an appointment in the Treasury Department, and during the remainder of his active life he was in government employment, at Washington generally, but with intervals at New York and New Orleans. At the latter place he was auditor of customs from 1866 until relieved at his own request, in 1869. Finally, his health failing, and after a prolonged leave of absence, in 1876 he resigned his official duties, and returned to Massachusetts, where he died, as stated.

His first wife died at Needham, April 22, 1850. Nov. 28, 1850, he married Clementina Augusta Dimick, daughter of Jacob Dimick, of Quechee, Vt. She died in Washington in February, 1865. Sept. 19, 1866, he married, at New Orleans, Sarah Beaumont Millard, daughter of Alfred Millard. By his first wife he had eleven children, nine of whom have survived him.

Mr. Whitaker was a man of pure life, was fond of books, and his mind was well stored and cultured. He wrote with force and elegance, and his advantages of voice, person, and manner rendered him an extremely effective public speaker. Misfortunes never affected his amiability, or diminished his faith in human kind. He has left to his descendants an honored name, and earned the lasting regard of his townsmen.

GALEN ORR.

Hugh Orr, the first American ancestor of Galen Orr, was born in Lochwinnoch, Renfrewshire, Scotland, Jan. 2, 1715. He was "educated a gunsmith and house-lock filer." He came to America June 17, 1740, and, after a temporary stop at Easton, settled in East Bridgewater, where he lived until the time of his death, Dec. 6, 1798. He married Mary Bass, daughter of Capt. Jonathan Bass, of Bridgewater, Aug. 4, 1742. "Hon. Hugh Orr, Esq.," as he is styled in certain resolutions passed by the General Court of Massachusetts, May 2, 1787, very soon after he came to East Bridgewater, established iron-works there and commenced the manufacture of scythes and axes. He was engaged just before the Revolution in the manufacture of fire-arms, and at the commencement of that war produced the first cannon made in this country by boring from the solid casting. Shortly after the Revolutionary war he was a member of the Massachusetts Senate. He was also instrumental in the introduction of cotton machinery into this country, and the first machines for carding, roving, and spinning cotton made in the United States were constructed at his works in East Bridgewater. He had ten children, two sons and eight daughters.

Hugh Orr, Jr., who was the tenth child and the grandfather of the subject of this sketch, was born in Bridgewater, Mass., July 26, 1766, and lived there until his death, June 2, 1851. He married Sylvia

Mitchell, and there were born to them twelve children, eight sons and four daughters.

Thomas Orr, the eldest son of Hugh Orr, Jr., was born in Bridgewater, Mass., July 18, 1785. When quite a young man he obtained employment in Needham, and there met Rachel Bullen, of that town, whom he afterwards married. About the year 1812 he removed with his family to Shirley, Mass., where he died March 14, 1819, leaving a widow and six children, the eldest twelve years and the youngest ten months old, without adequate means of support. Necessity compelled the mother to place the older children under the care of relatives and friends, and returning with her two younger children to Needham, she endeavored to provide for her own and their support.

Galen Orr, whose portrait is here given, was the fifth child of Thomas and Rachel (Bullen) Orr. He was born in Shirley, Mass., Dec. 9, 1815. His early life was spent on a farm, with only such advantages for education as the public schools of that day afforded. Being obliged to rely upon his own resources to gain a livelihood, he learned the trade of nail-cutting, and worked at it in the towns of Braintree and Dover, Mass., and also in Boston, at the large works then located on the "Mill Dam." At Newton Lower Falls he worked as a blacksmith and machinist, gaining knowledge and experience which were of great value to him in the business which he afterwards established. In the year 1837 he married Mary Ann Smith, daughter of Luther Smith, of Needham, and settled in that town. The children by this marriage were Galen, Jr., born July 3, 1838, and died Feb. 8, 1883; Mary E., born Feb. 11, 1840; Lydia A., born April 25, 1842; and Isabella A., born Nov. 8, 1844. Galen, Jr., married Henrietta Childs. The husband of Mary E. is Edgar H. Bowers, a manufacturer of Needham, and the husband of Lydia A. is Emery Grover, a lawyer in active practice at the Suffolk bar. In 1839, Mr. Orr commenced the manufacture of blind hinges and fastenings, which he continued until his death, taking into partnership, in 1872, his son-in-law, Edgar H. Bowers. About 1850 he purchased the mill privilege on Rosemary Street, in Needham, and engaged in the manufacture of cotton batting, which business he continued for some six years, when he sold the machinery to be removed from the mill. In 1857 he formed a copartnership with his cousin, Thaddeus Bullen, of Haverhill, Mass., and fitted up the mill for the manufacture of tacks and finishing nails; but this business proving unremunerative, at the end of a year and a half the partnership was dissolved and its affairs closed. In 1860 he established a grist-mill, and for about six years dealt quite largely in flour and grain. Mr. Orr's early political affiliations were with the Democratic party, but upon the organization of the Free-Soil party he was among the first to join its numbers, and he continued in it until the formation of the Republican party, with which he acted up to the time of his death. Although not a member of any church, he was always interested in the institutions of religion and contributed liberally for their support. When the Congregational society of Needham was formed he assisted in its organization and attended that church, with his family, as long as his health permitted. He was especially fond of church music, and gave liberally of his time and means to develop an interest in and to support that part of public worship. He was a member of the board of selectmen and overseers of the poor of the town of Needham for the year 1855, and afterwards for eight consecutive years from 1858 to 1865, and was re-elected in 1866, but declined to serve longer. During the war of the Rebellion he was chairman of the board, performing the arduous duties which at that trying time devolved upon such officers with untiring energy and in a manner which left no room to doubt his entire devotion to the cause of his country and the interests of those who went to defend and preserve its institutions. In 1872 he was again elected selectman and overseer of the poor, and served as chairman; he was re-elected in 1873, but declined to accept. In 1864 he was a member of the State Legislature, representing the Fourteenth Norfolk District, then composed of the towns of Needham, Medfield, and Dover. He was elected special commissioner for the county of Norfolk for the term of three years from Jan. 1, 1869, and served in that capacity. In 1871 he was elected county commissioner, and continued in that office by re-election until the close of the year 1879. In 1874 he was elected president of the Needham Savings-Bank, which position he occupied until the closing of the bank in 1879, when he and the treasurer, Emery Grover, Esq., were appointed receivers. Under the receivership the depositors have been paid in full. The beginning of the year 1880 found him in failing health, and he withdrew from active life and spent the remainder of his days quietly at his home in Needham, where he died March 4, 1881.

Mr. Orr was a man of much strength of character, active and energetic, of great firmness and keen foresight, and although lacking the advantages of early education which many of his associates enjoyed, was able to raise himself to a position of influence and honor in the community which he held to the last. His counsel and advice were frequently sought by neighbors and townsmen in matters touching both public and private interests, and his judgment was always trusted. His kindness of heart and sympathy with the unfortunate were remarkable, and no deserving person ever appealed to him in vain if it was in his power to assist.

ELISHA LYON.

Elisha Lyon, for more than sixty years one of the honored citizens of Needham, was born in Milton, Sept. 29, 1778; son of Jacob and Jerusha (Tucker) Lyon. He remained in his native town until sixteen years of age, when he went to Roxbury and commenced working at the hatter's trade. In consequence of the death of his employer soon after, he left Roxbury and, going to Dedham, entered the employ of Reuben Guild, with whom he completed his apprenticeship as a hatter. At the age of twenty-one he removed to Needham and commenced the manufacture of hats, which he carried on successfully for nearly forty years. His factory was destroyed by fire in 1834, and being then fifty-six years of age, Mr. Lyon concluded not to rebuild, but to pass the balance of his life in comparative retirement from active business.

Dec. 18, 1800, he united in marriage with Sally Brown, who died June 6, 1807; their children were Sally B., born May 28, 1801; Louisa, born April 11, 1803; and Lemuel, Feb. 2, 1806.

Oct. 31, 1809, Mr. Lyon married Polly Brown, sister of his former wife, and their family were as follows: Joshua B., born Oct. 25, 1810; Mary Ann, born Nov. 7, 1814; Elisha Hiram, born Feb. 11, 1818; and Hannah, born Feb. 19, 1820; all living except Joshua B. Mrs. Lyon died Sept. 6, 1867. Mr. Elisha H. Lyon [who incorporates the accompanying portrait as a tribute to the memory of his father] and his sister, Hannah, reside on the old homestead where they were born.

Politically, Mr. Lyon was originally a Jeffersonian Democrat, later a member of the Free-Soil party, and was a staunch member of the Republican party from its organization to the day of his death.

Possessed of a taste and an ability for the discharge of public duties, a judgment well balanced and almost uniformly correct in its results, and an integrity of character that was never touched by whisper or reflection; it is not strange that he was selected by his fellow-citizens as one fitted to assume and administer public trusts in a variety of town relations. He never shrank from the duties of citizenship, and served his town faithfully and well, and discharged the duties of the various positions to which he was called to the entire satisfaction of his fellow-citizens. He was a representative to the General Court in 1816, 1839, and 1840; selectman fifteen years, and for seven of those years chairman of the board; town treasurer from 1839 to 1852 inclusive. He was one of the superintending school committee four years; he was also a member of the local or district committee for several years; assessor three years; and being frequently chosen moderator of town meetings. For a period of nearly thirty years he rendered valuable services on various committees, appointed from time to time to consider town matters. He was commissioned justice of the peace in 1824. In 1814 he was the commander of East Militia Company of the town, and although not called into service, the company was ready to march for the defense of the country at a minute's warning, the alarm to be given by the ringing of the bell.

Personally, Elisha Lyon represented the best type of that pure, firm, straightforward, stalwart, Saxon virtue, which has proven New England's best inheritance from the mother-country. In religious faith he was a Unitarian, and a firm believer in both the justice and goodness of the Deity. And so by holiness in life, and godliness in walk, he sought to be judged rather than by any show of the mere ceremonials of profession. He was a member of the First Church of Needham, and from Sept. 1, 1826, to May 19, 1849, a deacon. He was also on standing committee many years. Later in life he attended the Orthodox Church at the "Plains," and was chosen a deacon, but declined the office.

Elisha Lyon was essentially a self-made man. Early in life he learned that the way to success was by no royal road, but was open to stout hearts and willing hands. He gained nothing by mere luck, but everything by perseverance and well-digested plans, and the intelligent application of his energies to the end in view. He was a kind neighbor, and one of Needham's most honored citizens. He died May 14, 1862, aged eighty-three years, seven months, and fifteen days.

REV. DANIEL KIMBALL.

Rev. Daniel Kimball was the oldest son of Daniel and Elizabeth (Tenney) Kimball, and was born in Bradford, Mass., July 3, 1778. His ancestors were among the earliest settlers of that town, and his father was one of the largest and most successful farmers of the place, highly esteemed by his townsmen, filling various offices of trust and honor, and taking a deep interest in his country's cause in her struggle for independence. His mother was of a devout, religious temperament, endowed with a large share of native intelligence improved by reading, and with her husband devoted to the education and moral improvement of her children. In common with his brothers and sisters (ten in number) Daniel inherited a robust physical frame, a cheerfulness of temperament, and a love of labor which made his services of great value to his father, whom he assisted on the farm, attending the district school in winter to the age of sixteen. Early showing a taste for study, he then, with his father's permission, went to the academy in the neighboring town of Atkinson, N. H., and there fitted for college, entering Harvard at the age of eighteen. He graduated with distinction in the class of 1800, numbering among his classmates Washington Allston, Dr. Charles Lowell, Chief Justice Shaw, Rev. Joseph S. Buckminster, and other noted men with whom he maintained intimate and pleasant relations during life.

After leaving college Mr. Kimball taught school for a year or two, and then returned to Cambridge as a theological student under the direction of Dr. Tappan Hollis, professor of Divinity, and was approbated and commenced preaching in 1803. The same year he delivered the Latin valedictory on taking the degree of Master of Arts, and was appointed tutor in Latin at Harvard, which office he held two years; and after spending two or three years more in theological study and preaching, and declining several offers to settle over a parish, he accepted a call from the trustees of Derby Academy in Hingham to take the office of preceptor, and entered upon its duties in 1808. On March 22d, of the same year, he was married to Miss Betsey Gage, of Bradford, daughter of Peter and Mary (Webster) Gage, and granddaughter of Major Benjamin Gage, an officer in the French war and in the American army of the Revolution.

Mr. Kimball remained in Hingham for eighteen years, discharging his duties as preceptor with exemplary fidelity, taking private pupils into his family, and often called to officiate in vacant pulpits and in ministerial duties. Strictly conscientious in all that he did, he was not one to neglect any duty or to esteem it irksome. His heart was in his work. His pupils felt the influence of his faithfulness, and went from his hands thoroughly prepared for college and other pursuits, and strengthened in their moral character by the example and precepts of their instructor. So exact was he in the preparation of his pupils for college that not one offered by him during his whole course of teaching (over forty years) ever failed of admission. Many lads afterwards eminent in various walks of life were his pupils, and it may be mentioned as an evidence of the esteem in which he was held in Hingham and vicinity that John Quincy Adams, who was his steadfast friend, on going abroad as minister to Russia, placed his two sons, George Washington and John, under his care.

In order to qualify himself more fully for ministerial work, Mr. Kimball was ordained as an evangelist, while at Hingham, by the Plymouth Association, Dec. 17, 1817.

In the spring of 1826, Mr. Kimball purchased a farm in Needham, then a very retired country town, and opened a boarding- and day-school for youth of both sexes. His oldest son, Daniel, fitted for college, but died before entering. Both the others entered and graduated at Harvard, having been fitted for college by their father. His daughters assisted both in the school and the cares of the household.

Upon taking up his residence in Needham, Mr. Kimball at once identified himself with the interests of the town, and labored in every way for its temporal and spiritual advancement. He was a member of the school committee for twenty-three years and chairman of the board most of that time, and wrote valuable and suggestive reports. He also assisted in the formation of the American Institute of Instruction, and had been at the time of his death for twenty-seven years one of its vice-presidents. He was often appointed on committees in town-matters, and in 1846 represented the town in the State Legislature.

After a life of temperance and activity old age found him with a still vigorous intellect, and with a sufficient degree of physical energy to enjoy that period which by many is anticipated with dread, and he retained his calmness and cheerfulness to the last. He died at Needham Jan. 17, 1862, aged eighty-three years and six months.

Mrs. Kimball survived her husband several years, and died at Needham Nov. 11, 1873, aged eighty-nine years and ten months. Their children were nine in number, and were all born in Hingham:

Elizabeth Tenney, born March 23, 1810; died in Boston April 2, 1833.

Harriet Webster, born Dec. 1, 1812; married John M. Washburn, Esq.; resides in Lancaster, Mass.

Daniel, born Oct. 1, 1814; died in Needham Dec. 17, 1827.

Benjamin Gage, born May 5, 1816; married Miss Emeline F. Smith, and resides in Edgartown, Mass.

Mary Jane, born Oct. 19, 1817; married Hon. James Ritchie; resides in Hyde Park.

Henry Colman, born Feb. 25, 1820; married Miss Harriet C. Fisher, and resides in Stoughton, Mass.

Charles David Tenney, born Sept. 6, 1821; died in Hingham, July 24, 1822.

Charlotte Sophia, born July 31, 1823; married J. C. Hoadley, Esq.; died at Lancaster, June 12, 1848.

Clara Anna, born Jan. 7, 1825; died in Needham, Dec. 25, 1847.

CHAPTER XLIV.

MEDWAY.

BY E. O. JAMESON.

MEDWAY is not one of the very ancient towns of the commonwealth. Its municipal history reaches back only one hundred and seventy years. It was constituted of that part of Medfield which was located west and north of the river Charles.

The early Indian history, the laying out of farms, the building of roads, and the first settlement of the territory now embraced in the town of Medway are identified with the history of Medfield. The larger part of Medway, along the west bank of the river Charles, is country which the Indians called Boggastow, the western section lying southward of Winnekenning (the smile of the Great Spirit) Lake, now Winthrop Pond, the Indians named Mucksquirtt. The eastern and southern boundaries of Medway are the river which Capt. John Smith in 1614 named the Massachusetts, but soon after called the Charles, in honor of Charles I. of England.

All the region west of the Charles River was once under the dominion of the Nipmuck Indians, but some years prior to King Philip's war the Nipmucks became divided into several smaller independent tribes, and Boggastow fell to the possession of a small tribe known as the Naticks, whose chief was John Awashamog.

The patent granted to John Endicott in 1628, who, with his company of immigrants, settled Salem, embraced within its extreme southern boundary the larger part of the territory included in the present town of Medway. This appears in the description given in the grant, as follows: "That part of New England lying between three miles to the north of the Merrimack and three miles to the south of the Charles River, and every part thereof in the Massachusetts Bay and in length between the described breadth from the Atlantic Ocean to the South Sea."

For some years after this Patent was issued all the region west of the Charles was held by the Massachusetts Colony as "country land," unincorporated and ungranted to settlers.

The earliest intimation that the white man's civilization was about to lay her hand upon the vast wilderness on the west side of the river Charles was given in 1643, when the General Court of Massachusetts Bay granted to the Rev. John Allyne, the first minister of Dedham, in consideration of some public service rendered, two hundred acres of wild land lying in the forest beyond the west bounds of that town.

In 1649 Capt. Robert Kayne received a Grant of one thousand and seventy-four acres, bounded south by Rev. Mr. Allyne's grant, and in 1652 other grants were made to Nicholas Wood, Thomas Holbrook, Hlopestill Layland, and his son, Henry Layland, all of Dorchester, Mass. Their lands lying adjacent and near to that granted to Rev. Mr. Allyne.

These several grants constituted "The Farms," so called, largely embraced in the present town of Sherborn. The single grant made to Rev. Mr. Allyne is easily identified as located in the extreme northeast part of the present town of Medway, land lying between Boggastow Brook and the southern boundary of the town of Sherborn. It was on this tract of land that the earliest settlement within the limits of Medway was made. Here the first white man appeared on the scene, and became an actual settler in 1657. Meanwhile the town of Medfield had been established by an act of the General Court, and a considerable settlement made on the wide plain to the eastward from the river Charles.

The incorporation of Medfield came about in this wise: certain citizens of Dedham conceived the idea of having a new township established which should embrace the western portion of Dedham, and an additional section of meadow and wild lands on the west side of Charles River.

Accordingly, on the request of petitioners the town of Dedham made a grant of "so much land within the west end of the bounds of Dedham, next Boggastow, as is or may be contained within the extent of three miles east and west, and four miles north and south." This territory constitutes the present town of Medfield.

A petition was then sent to the General Court for a grant of land west of the river. The answer to this petition is recorded as follows:

"In answer to a petition of the inhabitants of Dedham for a parcell of upland and meadow adjoining to their line, to make a village of, in quantity four miles south and north, and three miles east and west, because they are straightened at their doores by other towns and rocky lands, &c. Their request is granted, so as they erect a distinct village thereupon within one year from this day, Octob. 23, 1649, and Capt. Keaine, Mr. Edward Jackson, and the Surveyor Gennerall are appointed to lay it out at any time, Dedham giving them a weekes warning."

Under date of May 22, 1650, the following record appears:

"Whereas, there was a graunt made by the Generall Court at a session of the 8th month of 1649 unto the inhabitants of Dedham in answer to petition of theires for enlargement of the village theire, as by the said graunt may more fully appeare, this graunt so made was laid out by Captaine Robert Keaine and Mr. Edward Jackson, who have subscribed it with their hands in manner and forme followinge, vizt: beginninge at a small hill or iland in the meddow on the west side of Charles river, and runninge from thence about full west three miles, and then turninge a South line, ended at Charles river at three miles and a quarter. This line beinge then shorter than by the graunt it was allowed to be, but accepted by the grauntees. The said river is appointed to be the bounds from that place to the place where the first lyne began. This Court doth approve of this returne of the psons above mentioned concerninge the bound of the said village, & in answer to the request of the inhabitants of Dedham, doe order that it shall be called Meadfield."

It appears from these records that the survey was made to the satisfaction of all parties, and that under date of May 22, 1650, the General Court established the new township and ordered it to be called "Meadfield."

The grant thus made on the west side of the river Charles, when Medfield became incorporated afterwards, constituted a considerable part of Medway, and was known as the "Old Grant." This territory is embraced in East Medway, Rockville, and Medway Village. The first thirteen house-lots in Medfield were laid out June 19, 1650, on the plain east of the river, and the following year the grantees erected houses and removed from Dedham, making the date of the actual settlement of Medfield the year 1651. Dedham surrendered its jurisdiction Jan. 11, 1651, and the May following the town of Medfield was recognized by the General Court in the following act:

"There beinge a Town lately erected beyond Dedham in the County of Suffolke upon Charles river called by the name of Meadfield, upon their request made to this General Court, this General Court hath graunted them all the power and privileges which other towns doe enjoy according to law."

There followed a somewhat rapid settlement of the new town, and the setting up of religious institutions. Before the year closed, December, 1651, Rev. John Wilson, Jr., was on the ground, and settled as pastor over a people to whom he ministered for the next forty years.

The first survey of lands west of the river Charles was that of the "broad meadows," in 1652-53, consisting of twenty-two grants or about ninety acres in all. In 1653 grants were made to Abraham Harding and Peter Adams in "grape meadow," by the town of Medfield.

The first actual settler within the territory, now Medway, was George Fairbanks, from Dedham, in 1657. Mr. Fairbanks was not connected with the settlement of Medfield Plain, but purchased the tract of land which had been granted in 1643 to Rev. Mr. Allyne, by the General Court. While Mr. Fairbanks lived within the limits of Medfield, and enjoyed religious and municipal privileges in that town, he held his land by purchase and not by town grant. He was one of the inhabitants at "The Farms," so called. His immediate neighbors, as recorded in 1660, were "nicholas woods, Daniel Morse, Henry Lealand, thomas Holbrooke, and thomas Bas."

There were also John Hill, Benjamin Bullard, and perhaps others who settled in the vicinity about this time.

Late in 1658 the town of Medfield voted to lay out certain uplands on the "West Side," which the records thus describe:

"On the Longe plain to begin next to Boggastow River on that end." "At the furdur Corner of our bounds By charles river to Begine next the town." "In pine valley to begin at north end and go throf it." "At the end of pine valley on a persell of land that the path goeth throfe." There had, perhaps, been a few grants made to individuals prior to this,—to John Fussell, eight acres, to Benjamin Abby, and probably to others. But, in 1659, there were laid out fifteen lots, in all one hundred and seventy-three acres, on land owned and taken by the following persons, viz.: Benjamin Abby, heirs of Joseph Morse, Thomas Wight, Sr., John Thurston, Samuel Bullen, Peter Adams, Nicholas Rockwood, Thomas Wight, Jr., John Frairy, Sr., Robert Hinsdell, Joshua Fisher, Thomas Thurston, Thomas Ellis, Mr. Wilson, James Allen.

It is said to be "quite certain that none of the men who drew these lots settled on the west side of the river," although the sons of some of them did years afterwards.

Various highways were projected by which these grants of land were made accessible to the owners living in Medfield. It was in the year 1659, that was sought and obtained from the General Court another grant of land to the westward, known as

The New Grant.—The following entry is found in the town records of Medfield: "The Eleventh of May one Thousand six hundred fifty-nine, in Answer to petition of the town of Medfield presented to the General Court was granted by the court to the town of Meadfield an addition of land at the west end of their former grant, as the Record of the Courte will make Appeare."

In the Colonial Record for May, 1659, appears the following: "In answer to petition of inhabitants of Medfield, the court judgeth it meete to graunt unto them as an addition to their former bounds and at the west end thereof two miles east and west and four miles north and south, provideth it entrench not upon any former graunts, and that Capt. Lusher and Left. Fisher are hereby appointed to lay it out." This accession of territory westward is embraced in the present West Parish of Medway. At the next annual town-meeting of Medfield, held Feb. 6, 1660, the following vote was passed:

"It is ordered that the new graunt mad to the town this year by the Courte shall Be Divided By way of Devidend to all the inhabitance of the town that are proprietors in the town and that it shal be Divided by the common rules of Division by number of persons and estates."

Each member of the family was reckoned the same as ten pounds of estate in the division of land. At another meeting, April 20, 1660, two highways were ordered through this new grant, one at a distance of half a mile north of the Charles River from east to west, the other through "the midst of the tract of land from the way that runs west to a line to the north end of the same."

These highways divided the new grant into three sections, known as the River, East, and West Sections. The River Section was divided into twelve lots, embracing ten hundred and seventy-nine acres. The West Section was divided into nineteen lots, embracing ten hundred and ninety-six acres, and the East Section into sixteen lots, embracing sixteen hundred and fifty-eight acres, leaving some two hundred acres undivided at the northeast corner of the grant, near Winthrop Pond.

The names of those who received dividends of these lands are given in the order in which the lots were drawn.

The River Section (twelve lots): Ralph Wheelock, John Metcalf, Robert Mason, John Pratt, Widow Sheppard, Thomas Wight, Jr., Timothy Dwight, John Turner, Alexander Lovell, John Ellis, James Allen, Joseph Thurston.

The West Section (nineteen lots): Heirs of Joseph Morse, Henry Smith, John Bullard, Sampson Frairy, Edward Adams, John Fussell, William Partidge, Jonathan Adams, Daniel Morse, John Plympton, Isaac Chenery, Joseph Clark, Robert Hinsdell, John Fisher, Nicholas Rockwood, Samuel Bullen, Abiel Wight, John Frairy, Jr., Mr. Wilson.

The East Section (sixteen lots): Gershom Wheelock, Joshua Fisher, Benjamin Abby, John Frairy, Sr., Henry Adams, Thomas Wight, Sr., Thomas

The first white child born within the territory of the present town of Medway was Jonathan Fairbanks, son and sixth child of George Fairbanks, the first settler. He was born May 1, 1662. Jonathan Fairbanks became a physician. He was drowned in crossing Boggastow Pond on the ice as he was returning from a visit to a patient in Medfield, on the night of Dec. 18, 1719.

The establishment of a new town on the west side of the river Charles must have been agitated forty years before it became a fact, for we find that at a session of the General Court held in Boston, in May, 1662, it was voted: "in answer to the petition of the inhabitants of Boggastow, it is ordered that Mr. Edward Jackson, Mr. Ephraim Child, Mr. William Parks, and Ensign Fisher, or any three of them, shall and are hereby impowered as a committee to view the place and return their applications to the next sessions of this Court for settling a Township there as is desired."

In 1662 lands were laid out on the west side within the "Old Grant," and Joseph Daniell, an accepted townsman of Medfield, in October of that year, drew lands in this new survey, and became soon after the second actual settler of Medway. His house, built prior to 1665, stood west of "Island Woods," and the farm he owned is still owned and tilled by his descendants. Mr. Daniell married, Nov. 16, 1665, Mary Fairbanks, the eldest daughter of George Fairbanks, the first settler. This was the first marriage ceremony within the territory, now Medway. Soon after, in the same year, Jonathan Adams and Elizabeth Fussell were married. Jonathan Adams became a settler on the west side in October, 1665. In 1668 William Allen settled where Dr. Richardson afterward lived, and Peter Colley was an inhabitant west of the Charles in 1669. In 1672 the settlement of Indian claims came up, and a committee was chosen "to treat and conclud with John of Boggastow, we mene John a Wasameg of natick, for the interest and right in claim in the lands within our Towne Bownes on the west sid of Charles River. Thomas Wight, Sr., John Frairy, Sr., John Elice, John Medcallfe, and George Barber were chose a Commity to treat and conelude with John Awashanog as above said."

Shortly after Indian troubles arose, and, Feb. 21, 1676, about half the houses in the village of Medfield were burned and seventeen persons massacred. At this date, so far as is ascertained, there were resident on the west side of the river, within the present bounds of Medway, the following householders: "George Fairbanks, Sr., George Fairbanks, Jr., Joseph Daniell, Jonathan Adams, William Allen, and Peter Collyr," perhaps John Fussell: in all thirty persons. Of these, Joseph Daniell, Jonathan Adams, William Allen, and probably Peter Collyr had their houses burned. As a protection against the attacks of the Indians, there had been built by the residents of "The Farms," some years before, a "stone house" near Boggastow Pond, a place of refuge and defense. To this Rev. Mr. Wilson refers in his letter written to the Governor of the Colony on the evening of that disastrous day, Feb. 21, 1676. He says, "We hope George Fairbanks's pallisade is safe."

On the 6th of the following May this garrison house was savagely attacked by the Indians, but they met with a "notorious repulse." The 2d of the next July, the men of Medfield in turn attacked the Indians, in the woods near the "stone house," and drove them to such a distance from the town that they never again appeared in those parts. From this time the settlements on the west side increased. In 1677, Josiah Rockwood settled on the farm which soon came into the possession of the Lovell family, and was owned by them for the next one hundred years. This, with the Wheeler place, is now known as the Oak Grove Farm.

In 1682, George Fairbanks was drowned. In 1693 there were sixteen householders on the west side, as appears by the tax-list, viz.: John Adams, John Ellis, Abraham Harding, John Clark, Jonathan Adams, Sr., Jonathan Adams, Jr., Peter Adams, Josiah Rockett, John Partridge, Jr., John Richardson, John Rockett, Samuel Hill, George Fairbanks, Jonathan Fisher, Joseph Daniell, Joseph Daniell, Jr.

Stretching out over a large area, and almost dividing from north to south the present town of Medway, was the Black Swamp, so called from the dark shading its thick, heavy pines gave to the landscape. The laying out of Black Swamp was ordered under date of March, 1702.

"Voted, that the Black Swamp shall be laid out with such necks of upland and Ilands as shall make it formable by our former Rules of laying out lands." The list of proprietors contains one hundred and twenty-three names. Of these, twenty-seven were residents of the west side of the river, viz.:

Jasper Adams, John Adams, Jonathan Adams, Jonathan Adams, Jr., Peter Adams, Benjamin Allen, William Allen, John Clarke, Theophilus Clark, Timothy Clark, Ebenezer Daniell, Joseph Daniell, Joseph Daniell, Jr., John Ellis, Sr., George Fairbanks, Jonathan Fisher, Henry Guernsey, Abraham Harding, Samuel Hill, John Partridge, Samuel Partridge, Widow Rebecca Richardson, John Richardson, John Rockwood, Josiah Rockwood, Vincent Shuttleworth, Ebenezer Thompson.

The next succeeding ten years there was considerable growth to the population on the west side of the river, and there prevailed a general desire to have religious privileges nearer at hand, which found expression in a petition to the town, May 7, 1712, for building a meeting-house on the west side of the river. This matter was pressed upon the town unsuccessfully, but at length it was made the subject of a petition to the General Court, which, although opposed, met with colonial favor, and the General Court "recommended to the town of Medfield to raise money towards the building another meeting-house on the west side of Charles River." This was opposed by a vote of the town, and March 9, 1713, "voted that the town shall petition the General Court, declaring their inability to build another meeting-house in the town, and to bare the charge attending it." The town voted money to pay "necessary charges that may arise for the printing of said petition, and the town paid to "Mr. Paul Dudley to manage the town case three pounds."

The General Court at length sent a committee to look over the ground with reference to the establishment of a new town west of the river Charles. This committee reported favorably. And Judge Sewall states that on Oct. 24, 1713, he "helped the selectmen prepare the bill for Medway, the new town on the west of Charles River." The act was passed the next day, Oct. 25, 1713. This Act of Incorporation, a yellow and time-stained document, still preserved in the archives of the town of Medway, is as follows:

"ANNO REGNI ANNE REGINE DUODECIM.

"An Act for Dividing of the Township of Medfield and erecting a new Town there by the name of Medway.

"A true Copy—examined.

In the order of incorporations Medway was the sixty-ninth town in the Massachusetts Colony. Tradition says it derived its name from the locality, being situated meadway or midway, i.e., by the way of or between the meadows. Or midway, it being the half-way stopping-place on the old Post road from Dedham to Mendon. Some have derived the name from Medway River, in England.

Topographical.—Medway is bounded on the north by Holliston and Sherborn, on the east by Medfield and Norfolk, on the south by Franklin and Bellingham, and on the west by Milford and Holliston. The Charles River separates it from Medfield, Norfolk, and Franklin, almost entirely on its eastern and southern boundaries. It embraces only about fifteen square miles, although its extreme length south and west is six miles and its extreme breadth northwest and southwest is four miles. There are nearly ten thousand acres, about one-half being unimproved or pasture land, one-quarter under cultivation, and one-quarter wood and sprout land. The valuation of land being about three hundred thousand dollars. The town is traversed by nearly a hundred miles of highways, and by railway from east to west in direct connection with Boston. Its topography is peculiar by reason of the meadow-lands, which extend for miles along its eastern border, and traverse midway almost its entire breadth from north to south. These meadows along the river Charles are productive of grass. Those lying along the western border of the Old Grant are known as Black Swamp, and considerably covered with forest trees.

The water system of the town is limited; consisting of the Charles River which flows along the eastern boundary in a very irregular and serpentine course; Boggastow Brook crossing the northern and easterly corner of the town, flows into Boggastow Pond, which has its outlet into the Charles River; Chicken Brook, which enters the extreme western part of the town from Holliston, flows through that entire section from the north to the south, and empties into the Charles River; and Winthrop Pond, which is partly in Medway and partly in Holliston. These waters furnish but limited mill power and at but a few points. The surface of the uplands of the town is level with few hills in the easterly section. While to the south, west, and north the country is uneven and hilly. The most elevated land is a range of hills west of Black Swamp. The soil in many parts of the town is excellent for agriculture. The broad meadows furnish large quantities of hay for the cutting, and an abundant crop of cranberries for the picking. Medway is well furnished with highways. From east to west the "Old Mendon Road," laid out in 1670, called the "County road," along which Washington rode on his way to Cambridge to take command of the American army in 1775. It is said that Washington, in making this passage through the town, dined at Richardson's Hotel in the East Parish, at the house now standing and the residence of Mrs. Cyrus Ballard.

By an act of incorporation, passed March 9, 1804, the Hartford and Dedham Turnpike Corporation came into existence. And there was constructed a turnpike through the town from east to west, called the Hartford Turnpike. This road was opened to travel in 1807, and a toll-gate established near the "Hammond Place." This point is now marked by the railroad-crossing in East Medway.

Tolls were collected for nearly twenty years. The Medford Turnpike was laid out and established as a public highway June 4, 1838, and received the name of Main Street. It is the longest highway in the town, extending from Medfield to Bellingham. The old county road, which is the oldest highway in town, and nearly as long as Main Street, running in the same direction nearer the river, is called Village Street.

A movement to secure railroad communication to Boston from Medway took form in a meeting of prominent men in the region, held Nov. 30, 1836, in Medway. In this meeting were Artemas Brown, M.D., Luther Metcalf, Esq., Hon. Warren Lovering, Lyman Adams, and others of Medway. This movement for a long period was a contest and a struggle. It had a history of almost twenty years, for not until January, 1853, was the puff of an engine and the rumble of a railroad train heard within the precinct of Medway. The first railroad opened to the public was the Medway Branch of the Norfolk County Railroad, January, 1853, having its terminus in Medway Village. This was discontinued in 1864, and the rails removed in the night. The New York and Boston Railroad, which was an extension of the Charles River Railroad, from Dedham to Woonsocket, was completed and opened to Medway in 1861, and to Woonsocket in 1863, and merged into the Boston, Hartford and Erie Railroad. Financially this railroad has been a failure; it is now the Woonsocket Division of the New York and New England Railroad.

There are four principal villages in Medway, viz., East, West, Rockville, and Medway Villages. The New York and New England Railroad passes immediately through three of these so as to furnish easy transportation to Boston, to Providence, and Worcester. Rockville has coach connection with the Southern Division of the New York and New England Railroad at Norfolk Station, so that all parts of the town are well accommodated.

The amount of freight and passenger business to and from the three stations in Medway on the New York and New England Railroad for the year ending Jan. 31, 1883, was $41,843.23.

Population.—The exact population resident within the territory embraced by the town of Medway at the date of its incorporation is not stated. The number of householders and voters was 48, which would indicate a population of some 250 or 300 people. By the first census taken and published in 1765 there were 123 houses, 138 families,—males 380, females 388; and 17 negroes; making a total of 785 inhabitants. In 1776 there were 912, in 1790 there were 1035, and in 1800 there were 1050. As reported in the State census of 1875 there were 4242 inhabitants,—males 2066, females 2176; natives of the town 1567; natives of Massachusetts 2931; natives of United States 3421; foreign-born 742; and unknown nationality 79. The number of polls were 1038. The population of the town has hardly increased during the last ten years. The business of the town is largely manufacturing. There are some 500 boot-makers, 150 straw-bonnet makers, 200 farmers, 50 merchants and traders, 12 blacksmiths, 54 carpenters, 5 physicians, 2 lawyers, and 10 clergymen.

In the population of Medway by census of 1875 there were 204 persons who were illiterates; 31 of these were natives, and 173 foreign-born. 80 of the number could read, but 124 could neither read nor write. About five per cent. of the population is illiterate.

Municipal.—The first town-meeting of Medway was held "November ye 23d, 1713 . . . to choose town officers to stand untill the next annuall election are chosen, which will be in March 17¹⁴/₁₃."

After making choice of town clerk, selectmen, and constable, the town

"Voted, That John Rockett and Jonathan Adams, Sen., Sergt Samuel Partridge, and Sergt Jonathan Adams and Edward Clark to be a Committee to take care to procure the Meeting-house built."

"Voted, That Abraham Harding, Senr, John Partridge, and Theophilus Clark to procure and carry in a petition to the town clerk of Medfield in order to the procuring of accommodations for the setting of the metting hous upon the place commonly called bare hills, and some conven't acomodations for the ministry near ther abouts."

The business of the town for the first forty years of its municipal history was largely in relation to ecclesiastical matters. This feature, however, disappears from the town records, with the following entry:

"March ye 22 Anno Dom. 1748-9, Received of Dea. John Barber, town treasurer, the sum of four hundred pounds old Term Bills in full satisfaction of my salary the past year, and I do hereby acquit and discharge the said Town of Medway for all debts, dues or demands whatsoever on the account of my yearly salary from the time of my first settling with them in the work of the ministry to the first day of this instant, March, as witness my hand

"NATHAN BUCKNAN."

The first road laid out after the incorporation of the town is thus recorded:

"June 4, 1715. The select men met at the house of Nathaniel Wight to lay out high wais for the benefit of this Town, and for the Conveniency of travelers to pass from town to town as followeth: begun in the country Rhode that leads to mendon near twenty rods east from Nat Wight's upon a straight line across part of the plain known by the name of Stony Plain, and cross a swamp place comonly called paradise island, and by the south east side of Ebenezer Thompson's field on to bare hill along at the south west end of the meeting house to the laid out highway through the plain comonly known by the name of hills."

For the first thirteen years of their municipal history the town was not represented in the Provincial Court. They adhered to their vote taken Dec. 3, 1713, "To send none, accounting ourselves not obliged to send any," until 1726, when they chose as their first representative to the General Court Jonathan Adams.

The names of representatives to the Colonial State Legislature from Medway, in the order of their election, are as follows:

The whole number who have served in the office of selectman is one hundred and eighty-eight persons. Some have served by re-election from two to twenty years.

There appears in the record of town expenses for 1734-35, the following:

"Paid Mr. Salter, of Borston, for half barrel of powder, £10; for one hundred weight of bullets & one hund. flints, £5 15s. To Edward Clark, for bringing ammunition, £5. To Timothy Clark, for bringing powder and bullets, 3s. 6d." Making a total of £16 3s. 6d. Whereas all other expenditures of the town for that year, exclusive of the minister's salary, but including £2 which was paid for schools and £7 for the building of a pound, were £12 2s. 13d.

In 1730 bears were troublesome in the vicinity of Winthrop Pond. In 1737, Seth Harding was paid one pound for "killing a wild catt." In 1742, nineteen pounds, eleven shillings, and six pence were ordered by the town to be paid for killing eight hundred and seventeen squirrels and six hundred and eighty-four blackbirds. The last deer killed in the region was in 1747, and the last panther made his appearance in 1790.

"The incorporation of the West Precinct by the General Court, Dec. 29, 1748," prepared the way for the organization of the Second Church of Christ in Medway. The first town-meeting held in the West Precinct was in March, 1753.

In March, 1770, the town voted that the inhabitants "will forbear the purchasing of tea and wholly restrain themselves from the use of it, upon which there is a duty laid by the Parliament of Great Britain, and also that they will forbear the purchasing of any goods knowingly, directly or indirectly of any importer . . . until the revenue acts shall be repealed." And a committee was chosen, who recommended to the town "to frown upon all who may endeavor to frustrate the good designs of the above vote, and to deem all who may at any time counteract it no better than enemies to our constitution and banes to the Commonwealth." This recommendation was "unanimously" adopted.

In December of 1773 the selectmen were instructed to withhold their approbation from "inn-holders and retailers of strong liquors in this town from all such persons that shall buy, use, and consume any tea in their homes while subject to duties." In 1774 there were added to the town stock of ammunition "100 pounds of powder, 200 pounds of bullets, and 200 flints." In September of 1774 the town voted to purchase "two iron field-pieces, for better security and defence." Medway was thoroughly patriotic, as seen in various votes adopted at this period.

In the warrant for March meeting in 1776 "His Majesty's name" was omitted for the first time.

The town warrant calling a meeting May, 1776, was issued "in the name of the government of the People of Massachusetts."

Elijah Clark was representative to the General Court of 1776, and instructed as follows: "If the Honorable Continental Congress shall for the safety of the colonies declare them independent of Great Britain, then we will support them in the measure with our lives and fortunes."

In 1780 the expenditures of the town were £92,909 10s. 3d. in the currency of that period, and in 1781 the town voted to pay those "who marched and served in the late alarm in Rhode Island" the sum of twenty-five pounds per day for service.

The tax-list of 1783 fills fourteen manuscript pages on paper eight inches square, contains two hundred and sixteen residents and ninety-eight non-residents; poll-tax, 2s. 6d. The largest real estate tax-payers were Asa P. Richardson, £1 2s. 9d.; Capt. Joseph Lovell, £1 3s. 8d.; and Nathaniel Lovell, £1 8d.

The warrant for 1794 defines the qualifications for voting for State officers to be, a residence within the State one year, age twenty-one years, and an estate of sixty pounds, or an estate yielding an annual income of three pounds; and for town officers the payment of a tax, besides a poll-tax, equal to two-thirds of the poll-tax.

In 1795 Federal money came into use, and the town expenditures recorded in dollars, cents, and mills for the first time. This year the town ordered guide-posts to be set up. The Hartford Turnpike was built and opened for public travel in 1807, but became a public way June 4, 1838, after a corporate existence of thirty years. In 1805, Ezekiel Plympton petitioned the town to grant liberty to owners of land to set out and cultivate various kinds of trees along the highways against their premises, which petition the town voted to dismiss. Mr. Plympton was a hundred years ahead of his generation.

In 1814 the town voted not to send a representative to the Legislature "by reason of the town being at great expense for building Meeting-houses, and also an additional number of poor thrown upon the town."

In 1815 two additional tithingmen were chosen, making the number four for that year, and the following vote was passed:

"Whereas, The profanation of the Lord's Day by many inconsiderate persons has become notorious, and is incompatible with a due regard to the Christian Sabbath, . . . it being the ardent wish of this town that the tithingmen should use their vigilant exertions in order to put a stop to all unnecessary traveling on the Sabbath, and in all things cause the laws for the due observance of the Lord's Day to be duly executed according to the tenor and intent of their solemn oath."

Tithingmen ceased to be chosen in 1845, Samuel Force and Anson F. White being the last incumbents of that office. In 1818 voted to hold town-meetings two out of every three years in East Parish, and one year in West Parish. In 1823 voted to alternate town-meetings between East and West Parishes. In 1843 voted to hold town-meetings every third year in the Village, which plan is still followed. In 1831 the day of State election was changed to November. In 1867 the town gave names to its public streets.

Ecclesiastical.—The early inhabitants of the territory within the present town of Medway were furnished religious as well as municipal privileges in Medfield of which they were a part. For a period of fifty years their ecclesiastical connections were with the old First Church of Christ in Medfield, of which Rev. John Wilson, Jr., was pastor from 1651 to 1691. As the population increased on the west side of the river Charles, in consideration of the long distance to public worship, there was awakened a strong and general desire to have a meeting-house, and Christian privileges among themselves. This found frequent expression, and the refusal of the town of Medfield to subject themselves to the expense of building a second meeting-house, and of the support of the Gospel on the west side of the Charles River led the inhabitants of that part of the town to determine on and ask the General Court for the establishment of a new town. It was, as they expressed it, "that they and their posterity might more conveniently enjoy Gospel privileges" that the new town of Medway was incorporated, Oct. 25, 1713. For a period of the first forty years much of the business transacted in town-meetings had to do with the matters of the church and the ministry.

The First Church of Christ in Medway was organized Oct. 7, 1714, by the establishment of public worship on the west side of the river Charles. This first service was held "at the house of Peter Adams." The first meeting-house was erected on Bare Hill, and probably dedicated Nov. 20, 1715, the day that Rev. David Deming was ordained the first pastor.

The First Church of Christ.—For the larger part of the period of one hundred and seventy years this has been the only church in the East Parish of the town. It now occupies its fourth meeting-house, and has its ninth pastor. Its pastors have been Rev. David Deming, 1715–22; Nathan Bucknam, 1724–95; Rev. Benjamin Green (colleague), 1788–93; Rev. Luther Wright, 1798–1815; Rev. Luther Bailey, 1816–35; Rev. Sewall Harding, 1837–51; Rev. John O. Means, D.D., 1851–55; Rev. Jacob Roberts, 1856–71; Rev. E. O. Jameson, 1871, the present pastor.

The Second Church of Christ was organized in the West Precinct or New Grant Oct. 4, 1750. The pastors have been Rev. David Thurston, 1752–69; Rev. David Sanford, 1773–1810; Rev. Jacob Ide, D.D., 1814–65; Rev. Stephen Knowlton, 1865–72; Rev.

S. W. Segur, 1873–75; Rev. James M. Bell, 1876, the present pastor.

The First Baptist Church was constituted Nov. 15, 1832, in West Parish or New Grant. The pastors have been Rev. William Bowen, 1833–35; Rev. Aaron Haynes, 1836–40; Rev. David Curtis, 1843–45; Rev. Abner Mason, 1845–47; Rev. E. C. Messenger, 1849–66; Rev. Samuel Brooks, 1866–69; Rev. S. J. Axtell, 1870–78; Rev. John E. Burr, 1878–83; Rev. Benjamin R. Dow, 1884, the present pastor.

The Third Congregational Church was organized Dec. 7, 1836. The pastor was Rev. Luther Bailey, who, after several years of ministration, retired, and the organization became at length entirely extinct.

The Evangelical Congregational Church, of Medway Village, was organized Sept. 7, 1838. The pastors have been Rev. David Sanford, 1838–71; Rev. R. K. Harlow, 1872, the present pastor.

The First Methodist Episcopal Church was organized July 19, 1857, in West Parish, or New Grant. The pastors have been Rev. William Jackson, 1857–58; Rev. M. Tilton, 1859; Rev. Joseph Higgins, 1860–61; Rev. George Whitaker, 1861–63; Rev. T. C. Potter, 1863–65; Rev. C. W. Wilder, 1866; Rev. M. Thayer, 1866; Rev. W. A. Nottage, 1867–68; Rev. W. P. Ray, 1868–71; Rev. William Merrill, 1871–73; Rev. J. R. Cushing, 1873–74; Rev. L. Crowell, 1874–77; Rev. D. N. Richardson, 1877–79; Rev. J. C. Smith, 1879–82; Rev. W. M. Hubbard, 1882, the present pastor.

St. Clair's Roman Catholic Church was organized in 1864 at Medway Village. Rev. J. P. Quinlan, pastor.

The Saint Clement's Church was established June, 1865, in the East Parish. The rectors have been Rev. Benjamin F. Cooley, 1865–69; Rev. Charles Kelly, 1870–71. Their church building was burned Feb. 5, 1871, and was not rebuilt. A new church edifice of stone was erected in 1874–80 in Medway Village, called Christ's Church. It was opened for divine service on Christmas evening, 1881, by Rev. John S. Beers, Missionary-at-large in the Diocese of Massachusetts. Jan. 8, 1882, Rev. Samuel Edwards became officiating missionary under the Diocesan Board of Missions, which position he still filled in 1884.

Rockville Chapel was erected in 1876. For many years the First Church of Medway had maintained a Sabbath-school in the village of Rockville, and in 1876 a convenient chapel was erected at the expense of sixteen hundred dollars. In this chapel a Sunday-school meets weekly, and public worship is held regularly by the pastor of the First Church once a month, and occasionally by other clergymen.

The town of Medway is abundantly provided with churches and religious institutions, which are well supported and prosperous.

Educational.—In 1678 George Fairbanks, Jr., gave one shilling and one bushel of Indian corn and Joseph Daniell gave two shillings sixpence and two bushels of corn as a contribution towards the "new college in Cambridge." This was the first expression of interest in "higher education" made in the town of Medway.

The first appropriation of money on record for educating the children within the territory of the present town of Medway was that made when the town of Medfield voted Oct. 28, 1697, "fifty shillings for schooling children on the west side of Charles River."

The first school-teacher contracted with appears in the following entry upon the record of Medfield, May 4, 1699: "The selectmen agreed with Sergt. Joseph Daniell to take care for the schooling children on the west side of Charles River."

The first school-room was ordered Sept. 13, 1704, when the town of Medfield voted, "The inhabitants of the west side to provide a convenient room for a school this year for such time as shall be needfull."

The first payments made to teachers as recorded were: Feb. 21, 1700, "payd unto peter adams for his wive's Keeping school on that side of the River, it being the full of his Du, 2-9-11." Mrs. Adams was at this time the mother of seven children. March 19, 1700, "payd to Sergt. Joseph Daniel for Keeping a school the year 99 he Dischargin the Town 3 want. 6d." March 29, 1710, "Paid to John Partridge, Sen., for Keeping School on the west side of Charles River one month 1-12-0."

Upon the records of Medway under date of May 13, 1717, it is found that the town "granted four pounds of money to be raised as and put into the minister's rate for to build a pound and keep a scool." The next year two pounds were voted, thirty shillings for a writing school, and ten shillings for a school at "y^e bent of y^e river." Ruth Harding received nine shillings and eight pence, and widow Partridge six shillings and four pence for teaching. In 1726 the town appropriated ten pounds to be divided for the support of the schools in different parts of the town.

In March, 1737, the town of Medway voted to build three school-houses, one in East Parish, one at the Bent, and one in the New Grant.

In 1745 the town granted forty-five pounds to be distributed in different sums to support six schools.

The wages of teachers at this period may be inferred from the record that Samuel Harding was paid three pounds for keeping school seven weeks. In 1760 five schools were maintained, viz., East Parish, Bent, Neck, New Grant, North New Grant: and in 1769 a school on the county line, No. 6, was added.

Until 1805 the selectmen had the supervision of the schools, but that year the limits of the different districts were fixed, and the first school committee chosen, who were Abijah Richardson, M.D., John Ellis, Ezekiel Plympton, Philo Sanford, and Calvin Cutler.

The names of persons who have served on the school committee in order of their election, from 1805 to 1884, are as follows:

The whole number being one hundred and sixteen persons. Among these who have served a long series of years were Rev. David Sanford, twenty-two years; Rev. Luther Bailey, twenty-four years; Deacon Anson Daniels, twenty-eight years (and still in office); Rev. Jacob Ide, D.D., thirty years.

The earliest record of a district-school meeting is that of No. 1 District, Feb. 11, 1801. The appropriation of money by the town for schools that year was four hundred dollars. At this district-school meeting it was voted "to have one month's man school" and "to have four months' woman school."

The text-books used in school at the beginning of the century were Pike's Arithmetic, Morse's Geography (with maps), and the American Preceptor. Penmanship received much attention, and the art of making and mending a quill pen was a great accomplishment and a necessary qualification for teaching. In 1816 the village District, No. 7, was formed and a school-house built. In 1873 school-house No. 9 was erected.

In 1830 the first High School was set up in Medway. It was taught at the village first by Abijah R. Baker, from Franklin, Mass., a graduate of that year from Amherst College.

This school was successful and popular for several terms, but was superseded by select and private schools taught at intervals and in different parts of the town. Among the teachers were George P. Smith, afterwards a clergyman in Worcester, and Samuel J. Spaulding, afterwards Rev. Dr. Spaulding, of Newburyport, Mass. In 1831-32, Mr. Daniel Forbes, of Dedham, taught a similar school in the West Parish, and Mr. Daniel J. Poor in 1838. The higher academic studies were pursued in these schools.

In 1851 the town conformed to the law of the State and established a high school, which has been maintained ever since at the expense of the town. In 1869 the district system was abolished and the school committee increased to nine members. The high school, from 1851 to 1855, was rotary: one term yearly at each of the three villages; then from 1855 to 1879 it was distributed into three high and grammar schools, one in each village, but in 1879 the Medway High School became permanently located in Medway Village, pupils being transported at the expense of the town. This school for two years has been under the charge of George H. Rockwood, A.M., as principal, with a lady assistant, Miss Sarah E. Haskell. There is a large attendance, and the school takes high rank for the facilities it affords for pursuing Higher English and Classical studies. In 1883 a class of thirteen graduated, some of whom entered the best New England colleges without condition.

St. Clement's school was established, in 1868, in connection with the St. Clement's Church in the East Parish. This school was for the education of boys. It had a history of a few terms of marked prosperity, but in 1870, the buildings being burned, it was discontinued.

The town of Medway has advanced in its appropriations for schools from four pounds, "for building a pound and teaching a school," or two pounds for schooling the children in 1717, to some nine thousand dollars for schools and school incidentals in 1883. Instead of one school and one teacher, there are eighteen schools, with twenty teachers, including a High School not surpassed in this region, and graded schools of a high order. The town provides liberally: books, supplies, and everything to equip and run her public schools with success. In 1883 the town adopted the plan of providing school-books free of expense to all the pupils except those in the High School. The school board consists of nine members, the superintendence, employment of teachers, and general management of the schools being in charge of a sub-committee.

The educational facilities of the town are supplemented by two public libraries: the East Medway Circulating Library and the Dean Public Library. The Dean Library Association was incorporated March 3, 1860. By the munificence of the late Dr. Dean they have a capital of about five thousand dollars, the income of which goes to support the Dean Public Library, which has some twenty-five hundred volumes. This library is accommodated with a convenient room in Sanford Hall.

Sanford Hall was erected, 1872, at a cost of about sixteen thousand dollars, in Medway Village. It was dedicated Dec. 31, 1872, by appropriate services, and named for the largest donor to its building fund, Milton A. Sanford, Esq., of New York, but a native of Medway.

Theodore W. Fisher, M.D., of Boston, son of Hon. M. M. Fisher, of Medway, gave an historical address on the occasion, and Rev. R. K. Harlow made the address of dedication. The lower story of the building is occupied by stores and the Dean Public Library. The second story is devoted to a public hall, with convenient anterooms. The third story is devoted to several smaller halls used for various purposes.

Partridge Hall was erected in 1876, in East Medway, by the enterprise of one of the active citizens of the place, whose name it bears.

Numerous organizations in the town, such as fire-companies, Lodges of Masons and Odd-Fellows, East Medway Improvement Society, and Patrons of Industry, co-operate to render the population intelligent, social, and thriving.

Industrial.—Medway has always been somewhat largely an agricultural town, farming being the occupation of the people outside of the village centres.

The small water-power within the limits of the town has been utilized, and in later years supplemented with steam. A variety of manufactures have been produced. Hardly had a settlement on the west side of the river Charles been commenced, when we find the town of Medfield making a grant in 1659 to Robert Hinsdell of "forty-six acres lying on the other side of Boggastow Brook," in payment for "the bell" with which he had provided the town for their church. And very soon, 1663, Boggastow mill-dam is mentioned, and in 1665, Robert Hinsdell's mill was a fact. This first mill was doubtless for grinding corn. Mr. Hinsdell sold it in 1669 to Peter Woodward, and it was burned by the Indians sometime prior to 1676, but probably rebuilt, as Hinsdell's mill is mentioned in 1677. In 1680, Medfield voted to grant fifty acres of land to encourage the building of a mill on Charles River, and to exempt the mill from taxes for seven years. This proposal was accepted, and the first mill at the Bent, now Rockville, was built by the following owners:

John Metcalf, Sr., John Partridge, Sr., Samuel Morse, Edward Adams, Joseph Allen, John Metcalf, Jr., Nathaniel Allen, George Barber, Ephraim Wight, Samuel Barber, John Plympton, and Benjamin Wheelock. This mill was burned prior to 1685, and "Gamaliel Hinsdell was appointed by the selectmen to prosecute John Sunchamaug, an Indian, upon suspicion of firing the new mill." How soon this mill was rebuilt is not known. But Feb. 7, 1687, the town granted to Joseph Daniell "the stream of Boggastow Brook, so far as it shall be needful to the advantage of his mill, and not damage the proprietors on said brook, provided he maintains a good mill on said stream, for the supply of the town." The following year they gave him leave "to land a dam on the common land on the brook," and "to flow the common land so far as shall be convenient for a mill at all times forever." Joseph Daniell had become the proprietor of the old mill site, "the place where Peter Woodward's stood," for he gave it to his son in 1693. This mill site is thus described: "The land where the old mill stood being two acres more or less, a highway to pass through the same." This was the site of the Hinsdell mill which was burned by the Indians. In later times it was known as Bullard's mill, afterwards as Fisher's mill, then as Partridge's mill, and was at last purchased by M. H. Collins, Esq., and removed to make way for straightening the highway, so that the road now passes over the spot first selected for the erection of a mill by Robert Hinsdell, on the west side of the Charles. At just what date the mill further up the Boggastow Brook, known as Daniell's mill, was built is not known. But Joseph Daniell, Jr., built a saw-mill there, and the property was held in the Daniel's name until recent date, although no mill has been there for some years, the last Daniels proprietor being Cyrus Daniels, whose grandfather, Moses Daniels, was drowned in 1800 in the flume while shutting the gate. The mills on the Charles River were as follows: one near where the mill of George Barber and others was built, known as the Richardson and Ellis' mill, not far from the site of the present factories in Rockville; Whiting's mill, near Medway Village not far from the New Sanford Mill. There were Cutler's mill on Chicken Brook, on the road to Holliston, and another mill on the same stream near its junction with the Charles River, a site occupied in later times by Campbell's paper-factory. Among the earliest cotton-mills in the State was the "Medway Cotton Manufactory," located upon the site of the old saw- and grist-mill, erected by Nathaniel Whiting on the Charles River, at a point near Medway Village.

It appears that Luther Metcalf, Sr., Philo Sanford, Abijah Richardson, William Felt, Comfort Walker, Nathaniel Miller, and John Blackburn entered into a formal agreement, May 14, 1805, as associates "for the purpose of carding and spinning and manufacturing cotton in all its various branches." John Blackburn was a practical manufacturer, having been in the employ of Samuel Slater, who was the founder of cotton-mills in this country. The first mill erected was sixty by thirty feet, two stories high. It was completed and went into operation in March, 1807, with machinery to operate eight hundred and twenty spindles. The exact date of the introduction of looms for weaving in this mill is unknown. These associated manufacturers of cotton added Lyman

Tiffany to their number, and were incorporated by the General Court as the Medway Cotton Manufactory, by a special charter approved March 4, 1809. On Sunday, Oct. 20, 1811, this mill was destroyed by fire. It was rebuilt and running by the close of that year. The new mill erected stood for seventy years. The corporation had for its agent and treasurer Lyman Tiffany from 1809 to 1819, when Dr. Oliver Dean was elected, and served seven years, until 1826. Dr. Dean was succeeded by Luther Metcalf, Jr., who held the position thirty-eight years, until the corporation dissolved, which occurred after the sale of the property in 1864. Soon after it was purchased by William A. Jenckes, of Woonsocket, and for fifteen years operated in the manufacture of flax, under the name of Medway Flax Company. Aug. 10, 1881, the property was conveyed by Mr. Jenckes to the Sanford Mill Corporation for fifteen thousand dollars. The old mill was sold at auction Aug. 17, 1881, for one dollar and fifty cents, to be removed in ten days. The site is now occupied by a substantial brick building for the manufacture of fine woolen fabrics. It is called the Sanford New Mill.

In 1837 there were running two thousand four hundred spindles, and the production of cotton goods was nearly a half-million of yards, valued at about fifty thousand dollars. The production of woolen goods was some seventy-six thousand yards, valued at seventy-two thousand dollars. There were at that date also manufactured cotton wadding and cotton batting to some extent.

From the cotton-mill of Medway, it is said, "graduated many of the men who were to lay the foundations of Lowell, Manchester, and other manufacturing places, and build for themselves colossal fortunes."

The manufacture of boots and shoes has been for more than fifty years the prominent business of the town. In 1837 this industry employed about three hundred persons, the production that year being forty thousand pairs of boots and about a hundred thousand pairs of shoes, valued at nearly one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. The manufacture of boots has largely superseded that of shoes, and the business now gives employment to four hundred persons, and the annual production exceeds a million of dollars.

The straw braid and bonnet industry commenced in Medway about the year 1800. The braiding of straw was carried on in families and exchanged at the stores for goods. About 1810, Capt. William Felt commenced to manufacture it into bonnets. In 1830 the weaving of imported straw was introduced. In 1840, Hon. M. M. Fisher established straw goods manufacturing, which has continued in operation and has been an important industry of the town. In 1837 there were manufactured more than thirty thousand straw bonnets, valued at forty thousand dollars. The value of straw goods manufactured in 1874 was nearly two hundred thousand dollars.

There have been and are various other industrial interests in the town. One of the oldest church-bell foundries in the country was established in East Medway in 1815, by Maj. George Holbrook, and for many years Holbrook's bells from thousands of church steeples from Maine to Texas have summoned the people to worship. In the same part of Medway, clocks, church organs, and organ pipes have been manufactured for some years. Messrs. Ware, organ-pipe manufacturers, made the pipes for the great organ in the Colliseum building, Boston, at the time of the Jubilee. E. L. Holbrook, Esq., still carries on the manufacture of church organs of a very superior quality, being himself a practical musician of rare gifts. There are several corn-canning establishments; one of the largest is that of the late James La Croix, Esq.

There are manufactured awls, boxes, mallets, monuments, paper wrapping, bricks, and other products to a considerable extent.

Military.—The Revolutionary Period.—The town of Medway as early as 1765 expressed anxiety and the spirit of patriotic resistance of British oppression by giving instructions to her representative, Elisha Adams, of that year, and by various acts in the next ten ensuing years declarative of her full sympathy with the colonists in their opposition to the encroachments on the liberties of the people. In January, 1775, the town voted thirty pounds "to encourage the enlisting of a number of able-bodied men to the number of one-quarter of the military soldiers to complete and hold themselves in readiness to march at the shortest notice." These were called "minute-men."

The following names appear as those who had endured sufferings and hardships in the Continental service of 1776-77:

Lieut. Joshua Gould.	John Barber.
Joshua Bullard.	Seth Mann.
Joseph Clark.	Jesse Richardson.
Jonas Brick.	Paul Holbrook.

David Hagur.	Abial Pratt.
Simpson Jones.	Ichabod Hawes, Jr.
Joel Morse.	Samuel Partridge.
Jonathan Graves.	James Barber.
John Hill.	John Allen.
Jotham Ellis.

A full list of those who served in the army of the Revolution from the town of Medway cannot be given, but she did her full share in creating a patriotic sentiment, in fighting the battles, and in enduring the hardships of the Revolutionary period.

The War of 1812.—Medway furnished soldiers to vindicate the national rights and resist British encroachments.

The War of the Union.—In the late war the record of Medway will compare favorably with that of any town in the old Bay State, both in furnishing men, money, and in works of beneficence to relieve the sufferings of sick and disabled soldiers. The town took action as early as 1862 to have prepared a careful record of her soldiers. This action antedated by nearly a year that of the Commonwealth, and it may have been the first action of the kind taken within the State. As a result, the town of Medway has a brief biographical sketch of all her Union soldiers. The whole number of soldiers sent into the field under the various calls of the President was three hundred and eighty-four. The whole number of different men sent was three hundred and sixty-nine.

Miscellaneous.—There are four Post-offices in Medway. The first Post-office was established in Medway village in the spring of 1803. Capt. William Felt was appointed the first Postmaster. His first quarterly return was made July 1, 1803, Gideon Granger being Postmaster-General. The office was kept in Capt. Felt's store, which stood near the present residence of Mrs. Hathon. The mail was carried by a post-rider, who went over the route once a week. The postage was from six to twenty-five cents per letter, according to the distance carried. At this date there were less than thirteen hundred post-offices in the whole country. The successors of Capt. William Felt, as postmasters in this office, have been Warren Lovering, Esq., Sewall Sanford, James B. Wilson, Clark Partridge, Samuel W. Metcalf, Collins Hathon, O. A. Mason, and, since 1864, H. E. Mason, the present incumbent. The office has been kept in Sanford Hall since 1873.

The second post-office was established in East Medway March 17, 1819. Timothy Hammond, Esq., was appointed the first Postmaster, and the office was kept in the house of Adam Bullard, late residence of James La Croix, Esq. The successors of Timothy Hammond, Esq., have been Nathan Jones, George Holbrook, Deacon Milton Daniels, Mrs. Mariam Daniels, and George B. Fisher, who was appointed in 1877, and is the present incumbent. The office has been in Partridge Hall since 1876.

The third post-office was established Sept. 19, 1834, in West Medway. The first Postmaster in this office was Olney Foristall, and the office was kept in the house, then a hotel, but now the residence of James Coombs, Esq. Mr. Foristall has been succeeded by Simeon Fuller, Deacon Daniel Wiley, Levi P. Colburn, Stephen Partridge, Jason Smith, Gilbert Nourse, John Cushing, Lewis Clark, J. N. Tourtellotte, Mrs. Mary A. Tourtellotte, and Vincent Moses, the present incumbent.

The fourth post-office in Medway was established Feb. 23, 1838, in Rockville. Deacon Timothy Walker was appointed the first Postmaster. His successors have been Eliab B. Blake, John S. Walker, Erastus H. Tyler, and Frederic Swarman, the present incumbent.

The following persons have received appointment to the office of Justice of the Peace by the Governor and Council, in the order in which their names occur. The first received appointment in 1736:

Edward Clark.	Clark Partridge.
Elijah Clark.	Charles H. Fitts.
Jonathan Adams.	William B. Boyd.
Abijah Richardson, M.D.	William H. Cary.

Of the above, John Ellis, Jr., was Associate Justice of the County Court of Sessions.

Joseph L. Richardson and Luther Metcalf, Jr., were Justices of the Quorum; Warren Lovering and Milton M. Fisher were Justices of the Peace and Quorum for the whole State; Asa M. B. Fuller and Charles H. Deans were Trial Justices; and Milton M. Fisher was Notary Public.

Joseph Ware was appointed Coroner in 1794. His successors have been Ralph Bullard, Zachariah Lovell, and Valentine Coombs.

In 1877 Charles A. Bemis, M.D., was appointed Medical Examiner.

Cemeteries, 1700-1884.—The town of Medfield, March 4, 1700, "voted that the inhabitants on the west side of Charles River shall have two acres of land for a burying-place where they and a committee chosen by the selectmen for that end shall order it in any of the Town commons there." It does not appear that this ground was laid out until Medway was incorporated, but burials were made in the Medfield burying-ground and in that of the south part of Sherborn. We find, however, that at a meeting of the legal voters of the town of Medway, held Oct. 29, 1714, at the house of Peter Adams, of which Theophilus Clark was the moderator, it was "voted, that the burying place should be upon Bare Hill, sum where within forty Rods of the meeting-house," and a "commity was chosen by the vote of the Town to joynt with the commity y^t Medfield have chose to lay out a burying place, who are, Cpt. George Fairbanks and Zackri Partridge and John Richardson."

This cemetery was the first and only one in the town for some years. It has been enlarged and beautified, and is still used by the people of the East Parish as the burial-place of the dead.

The second cemetery laid out was in the West Precinct, probably about the time of the erection of the first church in 1750. It was located near the church, as was customary in those days, and has been greatly enlarged and improved.

Oakland Cemetery is a third place of burial located near Medway Village. This is a beautiful spot, and was appropriately consecrated to its sacred purposes by a service held June 20, 1865. The Scriptures were read by Rev. David Sanford, the prayer was offered by Rev. Jacob Lee, D.D., and an address made by Rev. Jacob Roberts.

The first burial in these newly-consecrated grounds was that of Mrs. Mary Darling, who died Oct. 26, 1865, at the age of one hundred and two years, five months, and ten days. At a little distance from Oakland Cemetery in 1876 was laid out the Catholic Cemetery.

Many quaint inscriptions are to be found on the older gravestones in the East and West Parish cemeteries. On the gravestone of one, Phineas Allen, is found the following inscription :

*"Behold and see as you pass by,
As you are now so once was I ;
As I am now, so you must be,
Prepare to die and follow me."*

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

MILTON HOLBROOK SANFORD.

Milton Holbrook Sanford, the oldest child of Sewall and Edena (Holbrook) Sanford, was born in Medway, Mass., Aug. 29, 1813.

He inherited eminent ancestral respectability from both parents, his father being a grandson of the eloquent and well-known divine, the Rev. David Sanford, for thirty-seven years pastor of the Second Congregational Church, Medway, and his mother a descendant of the sixth generation from Thomas Holbrooke, of Broudway, England, who sailed from Weymouth, England, March 20, 1635, with his family and one hundred other emigrants, bound for New England. He settled in Weymouth, Mass., from whence his worthy posterity have gone out into all the land.

The boy Milton early exhibited traits that were prophetic of his future. He was self-reliant, courageous, generous, and frank, a champion in all athletic sports and contests. His education, beyond that afforded by the schools of his native village, was obtained at a military school (taught by Capt. Alden Partridge) in Middletown, Conn., and subsequently at the academies in Bradford and Andover, Mass.

When seventeen years of age his school-life was terminated by the death of his father, the management of whose extensive and varied business was intrusted to him, a trust that he very successfully discharged, as the agent of the estate, until experience made him competent to assume the business as principal.

After a successful career in Medway, he disposed of his business there and removed to Boston, where he opened an office for the sale of Southern products. This enterprise gave him acquaintance at the South, and prepared the way for the extensive business operations which he subsequently carried on in that section. Leasing a mill in Canton, Mass., he commenced the manufacture of a strong cotton fabric, much in use on the plantations of the South. After working this mill for ten years, his need of better facilities induced him to buy a mill property in Southborough, Mass., where he erected a substantial and adequate factory. His success in this enterprise was exceptional. By a process of which he held the monopoly he utilized the fibre of jute for the manufacture of plantation cloth, which sold readily, and at a handsome profit.

His business at Cordaville was very profitable, and during the ten years preceding the civil war the bulk of his large wealth was accumulated.

As a business man, Mr. Sanford possessed those qualities that compel success. Coupled with a sagacity that discovered, as by intuition, the right thing to do, and the right method of doing it, was an energy and determination that obstacles only intensified. In practical common sense, self-reliance, and will-power he was always conspicuous.

When he built his mill at Southborough he changed the location of the dam, against the protests of many advisers, but the result, in the increase of the head and fall of water, fully justified his action.

After the destruction of this mill by fire, two or three years later, he pushed the work of rebuilding with such energy that in one hundred and twenty-one working days the second mill was weaving cloth.

On the election of Mr. Lincoln as President, the defiant attitude of the South convinced Mr. Sanford that war was inevitable, and in spite of the incredulity of his contemporaries, he protected himself by turning the paper of his Southern customers, of which he held a large amount, into cotton. He thus escaped heavy losses, and was enabled to continue running his mill long after similar factories had suspended.

Subsequently his mill lay idle for two years, during which period, with characteristic generosity, he supported the families of his operatives. He then changed his machinery, and commenced the manufacture of blankets for the United States army.

At the close of the war Mr. Sanford sold out his mill property, and, having an independent fortune, decided to gratify a taste that he always had for blooded horses. It was his ambition to produce an American horse that would compete, in endurance and speed, with foreign blooded racers. He accordingly purchased a tract of land near Paterson, N. J., and established there the Preakness stud, which has become famous for its breeding record.

To secure a soil and climate better adapted to his purposes, he disposed of his property in Paterson and purchased a valuable tract of land in Lexington, Ky., where he established the North Elkhorn stud, now Elmendorf. Mr. Sanford won many important races on the American turf, and bred some horses that have made a creditable record.

In 1881 he sold out his stock-farm, owing to increasing infirmity, and limited his business cares to the management of his large property.

Mr. Sanford was twice married; in 1836 to Miss Anna T. Davenport, daughter of Benjamin Davenport, of Mendon, Mass., by whom he had one child,—a daughter. In 1838 mother and child both died within a few days of each other, the latter being less than a year old, a bereavement whose shadow lingered long over Mr. Sanford's heart. In 1846 he married Miss Cordelia Riddle, of Boston, who still (1884) survives him.

The welfare of his native village was always a matter of interest to him, and he has given many substantial evidences of his loyalty. As a young man, he was active in the formation of the parish associated with the Third Evangelical Congregational Church, and in the erection of its house of worship. This church and parish, over which his uncle, the Rev. David Sanford (2d), was for thirty-five years pastor, received frequent tokens of his continued interest. Its organ was his gift. He was the largest contributor to the expense of remodeling its house of worship in 1874. Six years later he paid the entire cost of inclosing its grounds with a granite curb, surmounted by a substantial wrought-iron fence.

By his generous aid the capacious building that bears the family name (Sanford Hall), was erected in 1872.

Water-pipes, connecting with pumps at the mills, were laid at his expense through the most exposed portion of the village street, as a protection from fire, and for the irrigation of the church grounds. He also paid for inclosing the lawn fronting the Catholic Church with a substantial granite curbing.

Two years previous to his death he responded to a memorial from leading citizens, who were desirous of increasing the business of the town, by subscribing forty thousand dollars for the incorporation of a stock company for the manufacture of cassimeres, a project which he had the pleasure of seeing realized in a substantial and thoroughly equipped brick mill, in successful operation. Thus he has set up his memorial, not only in the adornment of his native village, but in its increased business activity and well-being.

It was not by reason of his eminent business capacity and energy, his skill and success in conducting the various enterprises he originated, or his large wealth that Mr. Sanford impressed his personality with most emphasis and permanence upon his kindred and friends, but rather by the nobility of his nature, the quick response of his sympathies, the hearty liberality of his ministrations, the steadfast loyalty of his friendships. These are the characteristics most conspicuous to the thought of those who knew him best. To his family he was the ideal of chivalric kindness, always the safe and interested adviser, the able and generous helper.

His liberality was not confined within the limits of his friendships, but reached and blessed the needs of the comparative stranger. Those for whom he has smoothed the rough ways of life are a multitude, and embrace beneficiaries of numerous and diverse needs. Among them are the aged servants of God, whose years of waiting were blessed with many comforts through his thoughtfulness; the homeless unfortunate, for whom he provided a home; the widow and the fatherless, to whom he was as a defense; the earnest student, anxious and troubled by the question how his school expenses are to be met, for whom he solved the problem by a signature,—his helpful aid all the more grateful for the modesty and secrecy with which it was tendered.

Even on his dying bed this "law of kindness that was in his heart" laid on him still its sweet constraint, so that to strangers, who were fellow-sufferers on beds of pain, he sent delicacies that he had enjoyed, in token of his sympathy and desire to help.

The poet's declaration seems to have furnished his life its motto and inspiration,—

"'Tis worth a wise man's best of life,
'Tis worth a thousand years of strife,
If thou canst lessen but by one
The countless ills beneath the sun."

During the last years of his life he suffered from physical infirmities, which increased until they conquered even his resolute will, and after weeks of much pain and weakness he quietly passed away, in his summer home at Newport, R. I., Aug. 3, 1883. His body was brought to his boyhood home, and after a simple service in the village church, was laid to rest in the family burial lot, beneath the shadow of the stately monument which he had erected in honor of his ancestors, whose dust shares the same resting-place.

MILTON M. FISHER.

Milton M. Fisher, son of Willis and Caroline (Fairbanks) Fisher, was born in Franklin, Mass., Jan. 30, 1811. He is descended on his father's side from two old English families probably having a common ancestor. His grandfather, Joseph Fisher, of Franklin, traced his lineage to Anthony Fisher, of Syleham, Suffolk County, near the borders of Norfolk, England. The line descends from him to his son Anthony, born 1591, who, with his wife and five children, came to America in the Great Puritan Immigration, and settled in Dedham in 1637; and, removing just over the line, was known as Anthony Fisher, Sr., of Dorchester. His second son, Cornelius, born in England, is next in line of descent, who, with Samuel Fisher and eight others, projected a colony in Wollomonopouge, now Wrentham, previous to 1661, and removed from Dedham hither in 1662; thence comes the line to his son Cornelius, Jr., born February, 1660; thence to Benjamin, born March 6, 1701; thence to Joseph, born Oct. 6, 1741, and to Willis, born July 20, 1783.

His grandfather, Joseph, married Susa Fisher, daughter of Hon. Jabez Fisher, who traced his lineage to Thomas Fisher, who immigrated from Winston, in England, a town near Syleham, with his wife and three children, and settled first in Cambridge in 1634, but removed to Dedham on the arrival of Anthony and others, in 1637, and died in 1638, having contracted to build the first meeting-house in Dedham. This line comes next to Samuel, born in England, who was one of the original colony at Wrentham, and deacon of the first church, and a member of the General Court; thence to his son Ebenezer, born Dec. 20, 1670; thence to Hon. Jabez, born Nov. 19, 1717, who settled on territory now Franklin; thence to Susa, who married Joseph, thus uniting the line of Thomas to that of Anthony,—coming to Willis, father of Milton. On the side of his mother, Caroline Fairbanks, his descent is traced from Jonathan Fairbanks, of Somerby, West Riding, Yorkshire, England, who with his wife and six children came to America and settled in Dedham previous to 1664; thence the line is through John, first, second, and third, to Asa first, and second, to Caroline, who married Willis Fisher, and inherited and lived upon a part of the large landed estate acquired by the third John, and now comprising several farms in South Franklin. The ancestors of Mr. Fisher both in this country and in England have for centuries held a good position in the great middle class of society.

The Fisher coat of arms used in this country by Joshua Fisher, Sr., of Medfield, and Capt. Ebenezer Fisher, of Dedham, is the same as described in the history of Norfolk County in England, with notices of Richard and Edward Fisher, "Gentlemen;" Richard Fisher, chaplain, 1442; John Fyshere, 1449, burgess of Thetford; Rev. William Fisher, "a Public Benefactor;" and of Mrs. Maiy Fisher, "who died and went to Heaven in a hurricane." The arms are a common shield bearing upon its face a fish (in English, a dolphin; in French, dauphin "embossed") with the crest of an eagle, and without any known motto. A "crown" rested on the face of the shield over and above the dolphin, and an eagle on top of the shield as the "crest." These arms are known to be identical with those of the Dauphine of France, heir apparent to the throne. These arms originally were those of the Count of Dauphiny, a French province, who bestowed his title and estates upon the heir apparent. They probably came to England previously through one Osborne la Pêcheur, in English Osborne Fisher, one of the Norman French generals of William the Conqueror in 1066, who, after the conquest, received from William, for distinguished services, lands in Bedfordshire, where is now a hamlet called "Fisher," visited some years since by Col. Horace N. Fisher, of Brookline.

It is evident that the Fisher arms are of French origin. The name being derived from a common occupation and found in several languages, may have been a family name in England before the Norman conquest.

Among the many bearing the name in Norfolk County, descendants of the original seventeen and honored by their fellow-citizens, none attained a greater distinction or more justly than the Hon. Jabez Fisher, of Franklin, who, between 1766 and 1799, was in public life, was member of the General Court seven years, senator five, councilor eleven, and one of a committee to exercise executive power in place of the Tory Governor Gage; member of the Provincial Congress during its whole existence, and elected to the Committee of Safety with Gen. Joseph Warren and others for colonial defense in 1775. He was also a delegate to convention to adopt the Constitution of the United States. (See Emmons' Sermons, vol. ii., and Judge Theron Metcalf's article in the Boston Monthly Magazine, June, 1826.)

The subject of this notice was educated at a classical school in Medway, taught by Rev. Abijah Baker, D.D., and at Day's Academy, Wrentham, Isaac Perkins preceptor. He entered Amherst College in 1832, in class with Governor Bullock and the Hon. and Rev. Edmund Down, but health failing, he left the next year, devoting some time to travel in the States and Canada. He commenced teaching school at the age of sixteen years, and, teaching a classical school in Randolph in 1832, he prepared in part twenty youths for college, some of whom have been and still are prominent in public life. He began business as a trader upon a small borrowed capital in Franklin in 1835, removed to Westboro' next year, and married Eleanor, the eldest daughter of Hon. Luther Metcalf, of Medway, Aug. 22, 1836. In 1838 he was appointed postmaster in that town, after much opposition, because he was an "Abolitionist." Being indorsed by the local Democratic Committee and others as "honest and capable," and not a fanatic, Amos Kendall, the postmaster-general, for once disappointed the pro-slavery party.

In 1840, removing to Medway, he established there the manufacture of straw goods, and continued the business in partnership with others till 1863. He was deputed by the trade to go to Washington and readjust the revenue tax with Governor Boutwell upon straw goods.

Retiring from this business in 1863, he established the Medway Insurance Agency, representing a large insurance capital in some thirty companies, his son, Frederick L., being associated with him since 1878.

In 1840 he was elected a deacon of the village church in Medway, giving him a title by which he has been more familiarly known to the public ever since. Being an original pupil in the Franklin Sabbath-school, in 1819, he has been either pupil, teacher, or superintendent in some Sunday-school to the present time. Upon his motion in the Massachusetts Senate in 1859, the first State aid of three thousand dollars was given to the Washingtonian Home in Boston, of which institution he has been a director for many years, and is officially connected with several State and national benevolent organizations.

He has held various municipal offices and public trusts by judicial and executive appointments, such as justice of the peace, quorum and for all the counties notary public, commissioner in railroad matters, and for the division of towns of Danvers and Peabody.

In 1848 was delegate from Norfolk County with Hon. Charles Francis Adams to the Free-Soil National Convention, and in 1850 candidate with him and Judge Wilkinson for senator of the county.

After a protracted and expensive illness of four years he was elected senator (Republican) for Norfolk, West District, in 1859 and 1860, with two sessions in each year. In both terms he resisted successfully by vote and voice the annexation of Roxbury to Boston, and the measure was delayed eight years, much to the benefit of the treasury of Norfolk County. In 1863, perhaps as some recognition for services rendered, he was elected county commissioner, and served till 1872, and for three years as chairman of the board. Two of his returns upon important highways were sharply contested in the Supreme Court, and although a layman they were sustained as legal in every point, and notably in the case from Brookline, in which the returns provided a reservation to Norfolk County of ten thousand dollars, if Brookline were annexed to the county of Suffolk before the highway improvement was completed. A "wise provision," said Judge Gray. He was contemporary with the earliest modern efforts in the temperance and anti-slavery cause, and met with much opposition. While in college, in 1833, he was the first to break silence in the chapel upon the tabooed question of slavery. Reproved by the professor, he was sustained by the faculty, and the discussion went on until freedom of speech and the views of his essay were fully sustained.

Though failing to graduate from ill health, the trustees in due time conferred upon him the honorary degree of Master of Arts. He was a delegate to the first anniversary of the American Anti-Slavery Society in 1833; was chairman of committee which perfected the organization of the old Liberty party in the county, visiting all the towns till the ballot-box in all spoke for the party. He addressed many meetings, and wrote many articles for the press upon temperance, slavery, and other topics, and has continued so to do till the present time.

In 1845 he prepared a petition, quite numerously signed, to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions in the matter of slavery in the churches under the patronage of the board among the Choctaw Indians. Upon this petition Rev. Dr. Wood made a characteristic report, unsatisfactory to anti-slavery Christians, which led, soon after, to the formation of the American Missionary Association, now doing a great work among the freedmen. About this time he assumed and paid a liberal share of the debt of the Massachusetts Abolition Society, and in the late war paid more than enough to procure a substitute. As to local enterprises, in 1846, he settled a difficulty, and so obtained land for a church park, and inclosed it; introduced the question of a high school, consummated in 1851; was first chief engineer of fire department in 1854; one of a committee to appear before the Legislature for railroad, secured after a great struggle and delay, and opened in 1862; obtained charter for the Dean Library in 1860, and is now president of the association. He laid out the Oakland Cemetery, of which he is sole proprietor.

In 1871 he projected the Medway Savings Bank, and has always been its president, and in the same year co-operated in the erection of Sanford Hall building. In 1881 he initiated, at his own cost, measures which secured the successful co-operation and liberal aid of Mr. M. H. Sanford and others in building the Sanford Mills. In the same year he suggested and obtained an appropriation from the town for the publication of a town history, to which he has contributed much material, and is chairman of the committee of publication.

His seventieth anniversary was observed by his fellow-citizens Jan. 31, 1881, in Sanford Hall, and conducted by a committee consisting of William H. Cary, Clark Partridge, A. S. Harding, O. A. Mason, and Rev. R. K. Harlow. The tables were beautifully furnished, and letters received from personal friends, including Governor Claflin, Hon. F. W. Bird, N. F.

Safford, J. White Belcher, Sheriff Thomas, Charles Endicott, Dr. Mortimer Blake, and others. Addresses were made by Rev. Dr. Spaulding, E. O. Jameson, R. K. Harlow, and others, all complimentary to the personal character and services of the guest of the occasion.

Mr. Safford says, "My acquaintance with him dates back to more than half these 'threescore years and ten,' and during a protracted term of official service I have witnessed his unswerving devotion to the conscientious discharge of his duty as a citizen, his earnest and vigorous thought, his firm yet cautious mind, and as one whose intelligence, fidelity, activities, and examples assuredly merit this public appreciation." Mr. Belcher, one of his old pupils, says, "Some of his pupils now living can recall his faithful teachings and wise counsels which helped to qualify them to fill honorable positions in life. I have long known him as one of the faithful guardians in many departments of the interests of Norfolk County." Rev. Mr. Harlow said, "He has made his mark upon more useful enterprises in this community than any other man among us," and Rev. Dr. Spaulding said, "To know him well he must be known in his home-life, as it has been his privilege to know him."

The last lines of the poem for the occasion by Deacon Anson Daniels, entitled "The Garden Beyond the Iron Gate," voiced the common feeling:

"May he who yesterday stepped through the gate
Find the joys that abound in this Garden of fate,
And be cheered by the music that floats from the Shore,
Beyond the dark waters, where life is evermore."

Mr. Fisher has had nine children, four of whom are living. His eldest son, Dr. Theodore W. Fisher, born May 29, 1837, was educated at Andover, East Hampton, and Harvard Medical College; was surgeon of the Forty-fourth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers; has officially served the city of Boston for nearly twenty years as physician, and is now superintendent of the Lunatic Hospital. He first married Miss Maria C. Brown, of Medway, who died early, and next married Miss Ella G. Richardson, of Boston. They have two sons, Willis and Edward.

His eldest daughter, Mary Eleanor, born Dec. 5, 1844, educated at Wheaton Seminary and Gannett's Institute, is a teacher of French and German. His next son, Frederick Luther, born Jan. 12, 1853, is a graduate of the Institute of Technology, Boston; began business as a trader; married Miss Caroline P. Lyons, of Boston; has a daughter, Hattie Lyons, and now manages an insurance agency in Boston and Medway. His youngest daughter, Helen Frances, born May 12, 1854, is a graduate of Framingham Normal School, became a teacher, married Walter V. Hawkes, late of Amherst, now of Saugus. They have two children, Milton and Louisa. T. W. F.

JAMES HOVEY SARGENT.

James Hovey Sargent, the son of Nathaniel and Abial H. Sargent, was born in York, Me., in June, 1782. His early life was spent in his native village, where he availed himself of such opportunities for education as the schools of the town afforded.

In his nineteenth year he entered Phillips' Academy, Exeter, N. H., and at the conclusion of his academic course commenced the study of medicine with Dr. Gilman, a practicing physician in that town.

On the 19th of June, 1806, he was appointed by President Thomas Jefferson, surgeon's mate in the United States army, to take rank from the 6th day of the previous March. He was enrolled on the medical staff of Fort Independence, Boston Harbor, in April, 1806, where he remained for the succeeding ten years. Dr. Sargent was married, in 1812, to Miss Fanny Ruggles, of Roxbury, Mass., who died Sept. 13, 1854. They had one child, a daughter,—Frances J. R.,—who married Mr. Anson Bullard, of Medway, and who survives both parents (1884). Dr. Sargent was subsequently stationed at Fort Pickering, Salem, Mass.; Fort Constitution, Portsmouth, N. H.; Fort Preble, Portland, Me.; Fort Trumbull, New London, Conn.; Fort Niagara, Niagara, N. Y. (at which place he resigned his commission in 1846, having completed a term of forty years' continuous service).

He subsequently resided with his daughter at Watertown, Mass., accompanying her when she removed to Medway, Mass., in which place he died in August, 1869, probably the last survivor of those who held commissions in the army when he entered. He was buried in Mount Auburn, the resting-place of the dust of his devoted wife.

Dr. Sargent was a gentleman of the old school, of fine presence, and courtly manners. He was very fond of reading, but confined himself to the best authors. In his old age his mind remained uncommonly active, and his memory continued clear and retentive.

His neighbors and acquaintances in Medway remember his venerable and dignified aspect as he appeared upon their streets and in the village church, of which he was a constant attendant till the infirmities of extreme old age prevented him. His last years were quietly passed in the society of those who were fitted, by age and kindred tastes, to be his companions, his needs most considerably and untiringly ministered to by his devoted and beloved daughter.

In recognition of his public career, and out of respect to his memory, a post of the Grand Army, formed in Medway in 1882, took his name as its designation,—viz., James H. Sargent Post, G. A. R.

CHAPTER XLV.

WEYMOUTH.¹

BY GILBERT NASH.

Geography—Geology—General History—Weston's Colony—Gorges' Settlement—Hull's Company—Ecclesiastical Troubles—Pequod War—Emigration—Town Government.

Geography.—Weymouth is the most ancient town in the county, and, next to Plymouth, in the commonwealth, and its original boundaries have been preserved without material change until the present time, therefore its lines are the same for any date in its history of two hundred and sixty years. The town borders upon the shore of Boston Harbor, with its centre about thirteen miles southeasterly from Boston and about double that distance northwesterly from Plymouth.

It is above nine miles in extreme length from the Abington line on the south to the shore of the bay on the north, with an average of about seven miles. It lies between Braintree and Holbrook on the west and Hingham on the east, with a width nearly uniform of about two and a half miles. It has a water front on Fore and Back Rivers of eight or nine miles, and its whole area contains between sixteen and seventeen square miles. Of this area a considerable portion is covered by ponds. Great Pond, in the southerly part, is about a mile and one-third in length and one-third of a mile in width, with a surface of about two hundred and fifty acres. Whitman's Pond, centrally located, is about one-third less in extent than Great Pond, being nearly as long but of very irregular form. Whortlebury Pond, a little south of Whitman's, is small, nearly circular, and about forty rods in diameter. There are but two streams of any importance,—“Mill River,” the outlet to Great Pond, running into Back River, a distance by its course in which it passes through Whitman's Pond, of five or six miles, and “Old Swamp River,” rising in Hingham and flowing into Whitman's Pond, about two and one-half or three miles. These rivers have several very fine water privileges, one of which, that of the East Weymouth Iron Company, has been thought one of the best in the State. There are but two hills of noticeable prominence in the town,—Great Hill, on the shore of the bay, and King Oak Hill, about two miles farther south. From the summits of both are to be seen some of the finest views in the State. There are two inlets making in from the bay, navigable for vessels of considerable size,—Fore River on the north and west, four or five miles in length, and Back River on the northeast, three or four miles long. The extreme northeasterly portion of the town is a long and narrow neck of land extending into the bay for a mile and a half or more, while beyond this, to the north about eighty rods away, lies Grape Island, separated only by the narrow mouth of Back River, and is of an oblong shape, about half a mile in length, and sixty rods in width, while about two hundred rods farther to the north, in the bay, lies another small island, called Sheep Island. Both of these belong to Weymouth, are wholly destitute of trees, and used only for pasturage.

Almost the whole of the south part of the town is an elevated plateau with a light sandy or gravelly soil, capable, with good tillage, of producing fair crops. The surface from this plain commences to fall away with gentle undulations until it reaches the sea. The northern portion has always enjoyed the reputation of containing the best land for cultivation, while only a comparatively small portion of the whole area is unfit for agricultural purposes in consequence of swamp, ledge, or barrenness. Formerly farming was the principal industry, and the larger portion of the population gained their livelihood from the produce of the soil, but during the present century manufactures have increased to such an extent as almost to exterminate the former. On Fore and Back Rivers a large amount of business is done in lumber and coal, while the Old Colony and South Shore Railroads bring in large quantities of grain, flour, and other necessities.

For the first hundred years the town constituted one precinct, but in 1723 it was divided into two, the south being somewhat the larger. Quite recently, for practical and convenient purposes, it has been divided into five wards,—two at the south, one at the east, one at the Landing, and one at the north. Until 1793 Weymouth constituted a part of Suffolk County, but in that year Norfolk County was established and Weymouth made a part of it. It has four post-offices, one in each of the principal villages, with telegraphic and telephone accommodations along the lines of the Old Colony and South Shore Railroads, which cross the town at different points.

Geology.—Weymouth, geologically, is a very ancient town. The solid rock formations date far back in the primitive ages, and its physical history, could it be told in detail, would be extremely interesting. The rock underlying a large portion of the town is closely allied to the famous granite beds of its near neighbor, Quincy, but is less perfectly crystallized. This bed rock is everywhere pierced by veins of amygdaloid trap, often many feet in width. Belonging to a later period are beds of dark slate or shale, extending across the northerly part of the town from Braintree to Hingham, and cropping out upon the surface in huge seams at frequent intervals. These slates contain large quantities of iron pyrites, and are cut by quartz veins in which are found fine crystals. There is also found in North Weymouth another peculiar purplish slate which is full of cavities that seem once to have been filled with organic matter.

After the very early period in which these rocks were formed there comes a great gap in the record of this earth history as written by the pen of Nature, until the glacial or ice period is reached, of which Weymouth bears abundant and very marked testimony. The uncovered ledges are in many places very plainly scarred with the parallel groovings or striæ, and the surface is covered with hills of gravel and sand, or strown with bowlders of great variety and of all sizes up to that of an ordinary dwelling-house.

In various parts of the town, particularly that in the north bordering upon Back River, are unusually fine examples of the sharp, linear hills, called horse-backs or kames and glacial plains, both formed by the ice as it melted or retreated towards the pole.

The hilly, rolling surface of Weymouth, especially in the northerly portion, is due partly to the up-turned ledges of granite, and partly to these hills of glacial gravel. But little soil is left upon the rocky, gravelly hills, most of the vegetable débris having been washed into the swamps and peat-bogs.

General History.—The history of the town of Weymouth covers a period of two hundred and sixty-one years, and is no less fruitful in important and stirring events than that of any of its contemporaries. The early voyagers were attracted to it by its beautiful and protected situation, shielded from the ocean by the beach and peninsula of Nantasket, and from the Indians by its position between the two rivers, extending far into the bay. Its central location made it also easy of access both by water and land from a large reach of territory, thus rendering it a favorable point for trade with the natives. The wandering fishermen and traders who were ranging the New England coast during the early years of the seventeenth century, soon discovered its value and made it a point of rendezvous. From it they could easily slip out upon the ocean, and from it they could make such excursions upon the land as were necessary in accomplishing their purposes.

The great companies were then looking for the men and the places by whom and where they could carry out their grand schemes, accumulate the fortunes and seize the honors they foresaw already within their grasp; and, not more scrupulous than some of their modern successors, they were not always as careful as to the means by which their purposes were to be accomplished as might be desired. Land was here in abundance, and its rightful owners, if there were any, were few, ignorant, and of no fixed abode. The geography of the coast was not well understood; and it easily happened that conflicts of jurisdiction arose between the various claimants that caused, in after-times, no little vexation and trouble. If the Plymouth and Gorges grants came together the boundary was not well defined, and a fine position near the border, once in possession, might, perhaps be held against future comers. It was at a great distance from the courts that held jurisdiction, and influences might be brought to bear even upon those high in authority that would render the result of a trial anything but certain. Justice was tardy, her eyes liable to partial blindness and her hand held the scales in uncertain poise. Thus the position of things prepared the way for a train of events involving a great deal of disturbance and perplexity, and the result was usually in favor of those holding the most money and home influence.

Such was the condition of affairs during the first quarter of the seventeenth century. The Virginia Company, whose patent covered the southern portion of the English possessions in America, established at Jamestown, Va., in 1607, a colony which commenced a long and severe struggle for existence. In 1614, the Dutch began a settlement on Manhattan Island, at the mouth of the Hudson,—an entering-wedge between the two portions of the continent claimed by England,—and seven years later, at the close of the year 1620, the Plymouth Company, after much discussion and bargaining, invited the Pilgrims (then temporarily living in Leyden, in Holland) to embark for the coast of New England, and the colony located at Plymouth, where the resolute members of that community commenced their hand-to-hand conflict with the terrible circumstances against them, and which proved almost too great for their strength.

The Weston Colony.—Thus it was that Mr. Thomas Weston, a merchant of London, who had much to do with the Pilgrims in their negotiations with the Plymouth Company, and with an exalted opinion of the value and future prosperity of the country, conceived the idea of an independent enterprise of similar character, which should unite in itself all the elements of success without cumbering itself with the discouragements that surrounded the other settlement. They would establish a trading-post by men without families which should afterwards grow into a powerful State. Consequently in August, 1622, a company of about sixty able-bodied men, selected—not so much for their special fitness for the work proposed as for their willingness to undertake it—from the migratory population of London, landed from the “Charity” and “Swan,” two small vessels chartered for the purpose, upon the shore of Wessagusset, about twenty-five miles north of Plymouth, inside of the entrance of a capacious bay afterwards known as Boston Harbor. The spot has not been positively identified, but tradition points to the northern shore of Phillips’ Creek, a small inlet of Fore River (or Monaticquot), about three or four miles from its entrance into the bay,—a well-protected, well-wooded and watered spot, and one that promised well for the business proposed.

As might have been expected, this company, with no settled habits of industry and no extraordinary inducements to form them now, not well disposed towards the hard labor and deprivations necessary to the formation of a settlement in a new and rugged country, and without a competent head, soon became disgusted with their enterprise, neglected their means of livelihood, broke over the comparatively friendly relations upon which they had subsisted with the natives, and were soon in great distress. The severity of the winter and their neglect to make provisions for it, in a short time brought them to the point of starvation. Their treatment of their savage neighbors rendered them in the utmost degree distrustful and timid. In their want of food they sent to their neighbors at Plymouth for supplies, but they, nearly as badly off, could not help them,—thus the fish of the sea, the shell-fish of the beaches, and the nuts and fruits of the forest became their sole food. In their great fear of the Indians they applied to Plymouth for assistance, and that colony sent up Capt. Miles Standish with a file of men, who speedily established order in the death of the principal aggressors. Meanwhile, fully satisfied with their brief experiment of colonial life, the Weston Colony disbanded, going in different directions, and at the opening of the summer of 1623, not one was left upon the spot to claim ownership in the name of the ill-fated company.

Ten of the colony died of famine, two had been killed and one wounded by the savages in their various encounters, and at the close of the spring, after the visit of Capt. Standish, three of their number, the last of the company, were cruelly tortured to death by their Indian neighbors with whom they had sought refuge. After the lapse of more than two and a half centuries it may be possible to form a more favorable estimate of the character of the men who composed this colony than that which has been usually accredited to them. That they were not the utterly depraved set they have been described is very evident. In their intercourse with the Plymouth people they certainly showed a disposition to act fairly. In an expedition made with them under contract to trade with the Indians to the south, in the region of Cape Cod, Mr. Weston's people took their full share of the labor and privation, acting with energy and honorably discharging all their obligations. Even their associates in this enterprise offer no complaints in this respect. When one of their number had shown himself a notorious thief, and had committed serious depredations upon their Indian neighbors, he was given up at their complaint, and, as the sufferers declined to judge the culprit, the colonists proceeded to execute summary justice by hanging him. It may be said that this act was the result of fear, but it is hardly fair to ascribe a dishonorable motive when a better one appears in the exhibition of it. They had not that high moral purpose, neither were they actuated by that strong religious faith that actuated their Pilgrim contemporaries. They were not flying from persecution in their own land to seek a home for themselves and their families where they could enjoy comparative freedom of conscience and life, although at the expense of most of life's comforts. They were men with no families, who undertook the enterprise to earn a living, and, it may be, make a fortune with which to return home. More than this, they were under no competent leadership,

Mr. Weston remaining behind, and his agent, intrusted with the charge of the colony during its early days, dying in a short time. Had they come with families dependent upon them, with the result resting upon their own exertions, the issue might have been different. Their faults seem to have come from the want of proper training with its consequent improvidence, and the lack of a sufficient motive.

Gorges' Settlement.—The natural attractions of Wessagusset did not suffer it to remain long unoccupied, for in the autumn of the same year, 1623, or in the late summer, it is not quite certain which, Capt. Robert Gorges, son of Sir Fernando Gorges, acting under a charter from the Plymouth Company, the Council of New England, came with a company consisting in part at least of families and of character superior to that of those who had preceded them, with the evident intention of forming a permanent settlement. They landed upon the northern part of the town, probably near or upon the spot chosen by the Weston people the year before, thinking undoubtedly that this was covered by the grant which was so indefinitely described as to be easily susceptible of misconstruction. This gave them ten miles of the coast on the northeast side of Massachusetts Bay and extending thirty miles inland. They chose their ten miles evidently to include the entrance of Boston Harbor, and this mistake, if mistake it were, was the cause of much trouble in the future.

The leader of this company is well known in history, but of the men who composed it little has been recorded; even their number is not known, the names of very few mentioned, and those with a great deal of uncertainty. It is, however, a well-ascertained fact that the colony was projected to favor the establishment of the government more firmly on the New England shore, and to prepare a foundation upon which the Episcopacy might rear its future prosperity, and also as an offset to the threatened opposition that might possibly arise from the then insignificant attempt at Plymouth. The project therefore carried upon its face the evidence of ministerial and ecclesiastical favor; hence, it did not meet with much assistance from the Pilgrims, from whom there have come not the most favorable reports. To further the authority of the church and to form a legal basis of future action the colony brought a regular chaplain, or clergyman of the Church of England, in the person of Rev. William Morrell, a man of education and standing, of excellent character, with power sufficient for the purpose intrusted to his care, the establishment of the claims of the church in the wilderness, and also to act as its bishop when the enterprise should develop sufficiently to need the services of such an officer.

The plan of the colony was projected upon a scale of magnificent proportions and with machinery sufficient to conduct the affairs of an empire. Capt. Gorges was named as Governor-General, with a general oversight of the company's officers in America, and authority by commission to carry out his plans. Associated with him in the government were Capt. Francis West, admiral; Christopher Levet, Esq., perhaps the chief judicial officer, and such others as the Governor-General chose to appoint, any two of whom, with himself, were empowered to transact any business necessary for the government of the colony. The Governor of Plymouth, for the time being, was constituted a member of the government, and immediately upon the arrival of the company, in August or September, Governor Bradford was notified of the fact, and at once made his arrangements to make the newcomers a call; but before this could be effected, the Governor-General, while on a tour of inspection over his extended domains, was forced by stress of weather into Plymouth, where he remained a few days and then returned overland to Wessagusset. Very soon, however, he became satisfied with his experience as a ruler in the new settlement, and returned to England with a considerable portion of his company; others of the party went to Virginia and some to Plymouth, while some remained as the nucleus of the future settlement. Mr. Morrell appears to have remained here for perhaps a year and a half, and despairing of an accomplishment of his purpose in coming hither, went to Plymouth and took passage for England.

In the course of the year 1624, there came in other settlers from Weymouth, England, bringing with them a non-conformist minister by the name of Barnard, who remained with them and died there. The records of this time are so bare and scanty that nothing more than the fact of this addition is known. From this time until the arrival of Governor Winthrop at Shawmut there is more or less mention of the settlement at Wessagusset, and a continual though small accession to its members. The most notorious event of this period was the arrest there in 1628 of Thomas Morton, of Merry Mount, as Mount Wollaston was then called, by Capt. Miles Standish by order of the Plymouth authorities, taken to that town and sent to England. In 1630, and the following years, the settlement was recognized as a part of the Massachusetts Bay Colony and taxed for its support. In 1632, Governor Winthrop with a party of friends visited Plymouth, by vessel to Wessagusset or Wessagusset (it was called by either name), thence overland. On their way, in going and returning they were generously entertained by the people of that place. During that year a tax was ordered by the court, five pounds of which was levied on Wessagusset, eight on Boston, and four pounds ten shillings on Salem, showing the relative importance of the towns. In 1633 it was spoken of as a small village. In 1634 it was ordered to pay the charges incurred in taking care of Thomas Lane, a servant of John Burslyn (Bursley), of that settlement, who had fallen sick in Dorchester.

Hull Company.—In 1635, the place came into general notice and took a prominent position among the towns composing the Massachusetts Bay Colony. On the 8th of July, of that year, the General Court passed an order permitting Rev. Joseph Hull with twenty-one families, consisting of about one hundred persons, to settle at Wessagusset, the largest addition at any one time, probably, in the history of the town. These settlers came from Weymouth, England, and belonged to the county of Dorset and its immediate neighborhood. They were a class of people who soon became prominent and whose families, many of them, retain their position to the present day. Their minister, Rev. Joseph Hull, became for a time the minister of the town. On the 2d of September the town was erected into a plantation, equivalent probably to an act of incorporation, and the name changed to Weymouth, which it has since retained. On the following day it was ordered to send a deputy to the General Court, to which office William Reade, John Bursley, and John Upham were elected, these three being sent as an accommodation to three strong opposing elements then existing in the town, consisting probably of those who remained of the Gorges Company and friends who followed them, those who came in from other towns in the colony with an interest centering in the capital, and a third, embracing those who came with Rev. Joseph Hull, and their sympathizers. John Bursley representing the first, William Reade the second, and John Upham the third. The court influence predominating, Mr. Reade was retained and the others were permitted to retire. During the years 1635 and 1636 commissioners were appointed to establish the bounds between Mount Wollaston and Weymouth, of which Fore River and the Smelt Brook formed a part, thence by a straight line running south, a little westerly, until it reached the line of Plymouth Colony; also, between Weymouth and Bare Cove, afterwards Hingham, of which line Back River and a creek called Fresh River formed a part; thence on a line nearly parallel with the western boundary, to the Plymouth Colony line. These bounds, which were the more ancient ones re-established, have remained to the present with little if any change.

Ferries had already been erected, connecting the town with its neighbors on either hand, and bridges were projected for the better accommodation of traffic and travel. Roads were built towards Boston and mills erected upon the streams. A quarterly court was established, to be held in Boston, to which Roxbury, Dorchester, Weymouth, and Hingham belonged; and for the better protection of the inhabitants of the various towns in the colony from the Indians, it was ordered by the General Court that no dwelling-house should be built more than half a mile from the meeting-house. It appears, however, that the latter order was never enforced, or soon became a dead letter, for at this time the people of Weymouth were scattered over a territory from two to three miles in extent. The larger part of the population lived in North Weymouth, commonly known as "Old Spain," extending from the shore of the bay to Burying Hill, more than a mile, while there were quite a number of plantations, extending south and east over King Oak Hill as far as Fresh Pond, now Whitman's, in East Weymouth.

Where the first meeting-house was built is unknown, but tradition says in Old Spain, probably near what is now the centre of the village; but this did not long remain, giving place to a more commodious building which stood upon Burying Hill, near where North Street now passes through it. This remained until 1682, when a third was erected upon the spot now occupied by the meeting-house of the first parish. The houses of the inhabitants were mostly rude structures built of logs, and thatched with the coarse grass found at the head of the beaches above the salt water, which was carefully preserved for the purpose by order of the town. In 1642, 26th April, the Indian title to the town was extinguished by purchase; the original deed is not to be found, but a copy stands upon the records of the Suffolk County registry of deeds, and is a curious specimen of the sharp trading which the early fathers allowed themselves to indulge in when dealing with the native owners. It was signed by Wampetuck, alias Josias Webecowett, Nateaunt and Nahowton, sachems.

Church Troubles.—During the early years of the town it was very much disturbed by internal dissensions in the church. From 1635, on the arrival of Rev. Joseph Hull and his company, until 1644, upon the settlement of Rev. Thomas Thacher, there was almost constant tumult and disturbance, sometimes so serious as to draw the attention of the General Court. About the years 1637 and 1638 there were no less than four claimants for the Weymouth pulpit, each with a strong party at his command; the old Gorges settlers, the later comers from Dorchester, Boston, and vicinity, and the recent Hull arrivals, while the fourth, coming with a view of harmonizing the differences, only added another element to the discord. The Episcopal element was still strong, but apparently not enough so to propose a candidate of their own views; the Puritan party, which sustained Rev. Thomas Jenner; the 1635 settlers, under the leadership of Rev. Joseph Hull, an independent, with Episcopalian antecedents; and a strong party who had invited Rev. Robert Lenthal, who was suspected of favoring the views of Mrs. Hutchinson. Rev. Samuel Newman was summoned to heal the breach, but he found the trouble too serious for his powers. The departure of all of these contestants and the settlement of Rev. Thomas Thacher, appeared to resolve the difficulty.

In December, 1636, the General Court ceded to Weymouth, Grape Island and Round Island, the only additions ever made to its territory. During the eight years from the arrival of Rev. Joseph Hull, in 1635, to the departure of Rev. Samuel Newman, in 1643, Weymouth had gained largely in population and had become one of the most important towns in the colony. The records of the latter year, subsequent to the departure of Rev. Mr. Newman to Rehoboth, with a large colony, estimated by some as high as forty families, contained the names of more than one hundred and thirty land-owners, representing, most of them, heads of families. These records are imperfect, and probably do not represent by many the whole number. It is at this time that the regular records of the town commence, from which date they are comparatively good, probably as full as the average of the town records of the colony. Earlier than this the peculiar circumstances surrounding the settlement conspired to envelope the history in much obscurity. The natural jealousy of the Pilgrims against the adherents of the established church from which they had suffered so much, prevented them from making any fuller record than was absolutely necessary of their neighbors at Wessagusset; and later, the Puritans at Boston were in the same condition and no better disposed, although it was in their own territory and under their own jurisdiction; while still later, the disturbances produced by the conflicting elements in their own midst prevented the preservation of records that would be of inestimable value at the present time.

Pequod War.—The Indians upon the territory of the town were never numerous from the first visits of the whites to its shores, and this was one reason for its selection as a favorable location for a settlement; yet, notwithstanding its retired position, it was not without its share of damage from its savage enemies in other parts of the province, and it was always called upon for its quota of men, and taxed for its share of the expense. As early as 1637, of the one hundred and sixty men called for to serve against the Pequods, five were to come from Weymouth; and from this time until the close of the King Philip war, in 1676, the town was always a contributor in men and money to sustain the various expeditions sent against the Indians. From that time the immediate danger was not felt, yet her soldiers were found upon the bloody fields of New York and Canada, fighting for the preservation of their homes, although so far away.

Emigration.—The first large colony sent out from Weymouth was that under the charge of Rev. Samuel Newman, to Rehoboth, and numbered by the best accounts about forty families. From that time, but usually in small companies, often but a single family, the tide flowed away, and the town saw its population slowly diminish by the constant drain upon it to supply the calls of the frontier. First Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, and the western part of this State, Rhode Island, and Connecticut, made large demands. Then followed the calls from New York and the other Middle States, and still later the vast West, which have all been abundantly answered, until not a State in the Union, and hardly a county or town, but has one or more of the sons of Weymouth to represent it. This condition of things could not fail to be seriously felt, and the town was severely crippled by it, so much so that from 1643, for one hundred and fifty years, the gain was hardly perceptible, sometimes a period of gain to be more than offset by a corresponding period of loss, while the actual increase for the whole time was so small as to be hardly appreciable. If the estimate for 1643 of at least one hundred and fifty families be correct, and an average of six to the family a fair allowance, a population of nine hundred at that time against fourteen hundred, the estimate for 1776, will show the truth of this statement.

Town Government.—Like that of nearly all of the early settlements, the government of the town was of a very simple pattern. Town-meetings were called as necessity demanded, at irregular intervals; and townsmen, afterwards known as selectmen, chosen at times and in number most convenient. The officers seem to have been their own recorders, since no regular clerk appears for twenty or thirty years. Meetings were notified upon training or lecture days by public call, and such business was transacted as the time demanded. When and how the first land grants were made is not known, but probably upon the earliest settlement the lands were divided as the needs of the settlers appeared; that remaining was held in common. A large portion of the north part of the town was occupied, and as early as 1636 there is record of a division of great lots at the lower end of Fresh (Whitman's) Pond, some two or three miles from the shore of the bay.

In 1643 a partial record of the then property owners was made which has been preserved. Most of the early records are filled with the regulations respecting cattle, the cutting of timber, and such public matters as seemed to be called for. The earliest officers, after townsmen, named upon the records are fence-viewers, and the number and prominence of the men appointed to this position show it to have been at least no sinecure. There was the strictest scrutiny into the character and purpose of those who came among them. As early as 1646 a vote was passed forbidding any inhabitant from taking as an inmate any stranger without giving the town an indemnity bond against damage, under penalty of a fine of five shillings per week; nor could he sell or let to any such person house or land, without having first tendered the same to the town at a training, lecture, or other public meeting.

During those early days frequent regulations were made for the preservation of pine and cedar, indicating a waste of that material. In 1648, Widow Hillard was required to give the town security against harm from the charges of her children. At the first settlement the town set apart the shore land between high and low water-marks for thatching purposes, thatch being at that time the most important material for roofing purposes, and there appeared to be a necessity to provide for its preservation; and when the General Court afterwards ordered that all lands to low water-mark should belong to the proprietors of the adjoining land, this regulation of the town was respected, and an exception made in its favor.

The highways were a matter of prime importance at an early date, and as far back as 1649 the inhabitants were required to work them at the call of the "way warden," under penalty. In 1650–51, March 1, a vote was passed requiring the officers to post notices of the assessment of rates, and all persons liable to taxation were required to bring in lists of polls and property under penalty. March 10, 1651, the town voted to fine all such as should be tardy at town-meetings six pence for each hour the meeting continued. The rates were to be laid so that the town bills could be promptly paid, particularly Capt. Perkins' ten pounds for six months' schooling, which is the first notice upon the record in relation to school matters.

About this time the town business had accumulated to such a degree that it became necessary to adopt more systematic measures in relation to its conduct.

Regular meetings were to be held on the first Monday in March and the last Monday of November, for the choice of officers and general business, while unimportant matters could be regulated on lecture days without notice; and all military affairs were to be decided upon training days. The townsmen were also required to make report of the action taken at their meetings. The first annual town-meeting was held Nov. 26, 1651, for the choice of town officers, and the townsmen are now for the first time called "selectmen," a title which they have since retained. The powers of these officers are given upon the record with minute detail, and the business of the town seems to have been settled upon in nearly the same form that it bears at present.

The necessity of a town clerk was apparent, and Deacon John Rogers was chosen "recorder," his special duty being that of clerk to the selectmen. At this time there is a record made of those entitled to the great lots near Whitman's Pond, numbering about sixty persons. Jan. 24, 1652-53, two thousand acres were set apart as town commons, running across the town from Braintree to Hingham, and near the centre from north to south; at the same time Thomas Dyer was chosen to record births, deaths, and marriages, and William Torrey recorder of deeds, etc. The town records seem at this time to have been in two divisions, each with its clerk, one for the personal, and the other for the general record. In 1663 there is a record of the names, number of lot and acres, of each person who was allotted land in the first and second divisions, beginning on Braintree line.

For many years the records are mainly taken up with domestic matters, regulations for cattle, running boundary lines with other and adjacent towns and between different estates, locating and improving the highways and managing the town commons, which was a matter of no small moment in those days. The sexton's duties were prescribed and looked after, and all parish matters, neither few nor small, were transacted by the town in public meeting, since the town and precinct were one.

As early as 1667 there was found a necessity to enlarge the capacity of the meeting-house, the seating showing a gradual increase in population. At the same time there was an increased call upon the town clerk in the matter of recording grants, and for copying, so large as to demand compensation, which was voted at the rate of one shilling for grants, six pence for a copy, and three shillings and four pence for recording the assessor's rates.

In 1668, Lieut. Holbrook was appointed with full powers to answer the "presentment" of the General Court in relation to the highways.

At the March meeting, 1669-70, a committee was chosen to procure a "new town book," upon which all of the affairs of the town should be correctly kept, and it is not at all unlikely that the oldest book of records now in possession of the town is the identical book purchased at this time, since in it are references to older books not now to be found.

King Philip's War.—During the period from 1651 to 1675, the town had been steadily growing in population and wealth, and laying the foundations of future prosperity, unconscious of the dark days before it. The people were upon the shore of the bay, far removed from danger of savage beasts or men, but trouble was gathering, and the ill feeling between the white settlers and the Indians on the southern borders had risen to that point that it needed but an accident of small importance in itself to bring about an outburst of hostilities. Such an accident happened in the murder of a white man by an Indian, and the execution of the offender. This was an opportunity too favorable to be resisted by the young braves, and the attack upon Swanzezy, June 24, 1675, was the result.

Upon this practical declaration of war sides were at once taken, the savages eagerly waiting to obtain their long accumulation of revenge, while the colonies of Plymouth and Massachusetts Bay joined hands for mutual aid and defense. Troops were quickly mustered and took the field in hope of a speedy crushing of their terrible foe.

But they reckoned without their host. Philip of Pokanoket was no ordinary opponent, and the events of the following two years were such a record of horror as the settlements had never before seen and were never afterwards to know. All through the State, from Massachusetts Bay to the Connecticut River, the Indians spread with the utmost rapidity, carrying terror and dismay into every household. They seemed to be ubiquitous, appearing in places widely distant at the same time, and only to burn and kill.

The history of this deplorable war is too well known to be repeated. More than a dozen towns were destroyed and half a million of money expended, while it is estimated that more than six hundred young men were slain or died in the service, or one in twenty of the producing citizens, and one family in every twenty was burned out. Contributions came in from various sources. Connecticut, which had escaped the ravages of the war, sent a thousand bushels of corn, and other places were equally prompt with their sorely-needed aid. Even across the ocean friends appeared, and Ireland sent forward a generous gift.

It will be sufficient to say that Weymouth was not the least among the sufferers. At the very beginning of hostilities (12th February, 1675) an attack was made upon the town, and several houses burnt. At the call of the State the men of Weymouth responded heartily to defend their homes from the ravages of the destroyer, and in the return made by Capt. William Torrey on behalf of the Committee of Militia of Weymouth, 1st December, 1675, appear the names of twelve volunteers, and nearly all of those names were of her known and honored citizens. In March following the town was again attacked by a band of Indians who were on their way to Plymouth Colony, and seven houses and barns were burned, while in February preceding several men had been killed in the town. So many men had been drawn away from the place for frontier service that not enough remained for their own defense, and the exigency was so great that on 26th March, 1676, a petition was presented to the Governor and Council, signed by the same William Torrey and on the same behalf, urging the recall of the men then on the frontier for the protection of their own homes; then follow the names of these, ten in all, and none of them belonging to the preceding list. These, too, were all young men of character and promise.

19th April, 1676, Sergt. Thomas Pratt was killed at Weymouth. And again the petition comes up from the distressed settlement, upon a demand for six more men by the State, representing in the most vivid colors the dangers of their position and the absolute necessity that the men should remain at home and defend their own firesides, "who, when we are most, are but a small company, and we have ten men out already and have the enemy appearing daily at our very doors, four killed already, and in danger where-soever we go; in expectation every day and hour of being assaulted, stand continually upon our guard, whereby planting is obstructed and all things turning into confusion and destruction;" and in a postscript the writer, Capt. William Torrey, adds: "Just at this instant saw appearing of fire and smoke about the Town, whereby we certainly know that the enemy is very near us."

A still later letter from the same hand continues the story of trouble and alarm, and it was only upon the death of Philip and the annihilation of his forces that the terror quieted and the settlement calmed down into its wonted peace. How many men were furnished by the town for service in this war it is impossible now to determine, as the records are very imperfect, and it is only by incidental mention in contemporaneous writings that most of the facts now known have been preserved. The twenty-two men whose names are preserved were but a part of those who were thus engaged; others are known to have "fought in the bloody war." On Oct. 12, 1676, an abatement was made by the General Court in favor of Weymouth on account of its losses by the enemy, and ten days later the taxes of those persons "slayne in the war" were for this purpose levied on the whole town.

Later on, in 1678, March 23d, there is the petition of John Lovell, of Weymouth, to be paid for service in this war, and October 7th, Richard Russ, also of Weymouth, a wounded soldier, was allowed forty shillings for his cure. A night-watch was also kept up in the town as late as the summer of that year, showing that the alarm had not wholly subsided.

Company of Horse.—In 1679, in the fall, a company of horse was formed which continued its organization for a number of years, and a year later, by order of the General Court, the soldiers of Weymouth, with those of the other towns in Suffolk County, were organized into a regiment, under the command of Maj. William Stoughton, thus anticipating any occasion that might arise which should call for troops.

Town Affairs.—26th November, 1683, an important change in the manner of choosing the selectmen was effected by a vote of the following import, "that after this year the selectmen shall be chosen by 'papers,' as the law provides," and this is the first appearance of the ballot in Weymouth.

At a meeting held on the second Tuesday of March, 1685–86, the following curious record occurs:

"Caleb Littlefield, living in the house formerly Thomas White's, warned to leave town, not being an inhabitant, or bring security to the selectmen." He still remained in town, and a request was made to the General Court to enter a caution upon its records that he or his may not become chargeable to the town, should they come to want. Such was the care taken that no unnecessary burden should be thrown upon the people. In the following autumn it was voted "that the selectmen should have their dinners at the town's charge when they meet for business."

On March 7, 1691-92, after various changes in the time of holding the annual meetings, the town returned to the former custom of holding two each year, one on the "last Second day of November and the other on the first Second day of March," which all of the inhabitants who were voters should be obliged to attend, under a penalty of eighteen pence for each absence.

Sir Edmund Andros.—The advent of Sir Edmund Andros as Governor of the colony in December, 1686, was the beginning of a series of important events bearing upon its political fortunes. Hitherto the colonies had been permitted a large degree of freedom in the management of their local affairs, and the Governor seldom interfered; now, everything was to give way to the will of the Executive, whose power was nearly absolute. Learning and religion were given the go-by in lack of the usual supports. Town-meetings were only allowed for the choice of town officers, not for deliberation on important matters. The vote by ballot was rejected. Personal liberty and the ancient customs were disregarded. None could leave the country without special permit. Probate fees were increased to an alarming degree. Oaths were administered on the Bible, to which Puritans would never consent. The Episcopal service, never before established in the colony, must have its place, and a meeting-house in Boston was demanded for the purpose. Heavy taxes were levied, which were generally refused. Writs of habeas corpus were withheld, and the laws of England denied to the people of the colony. Men were tried, fined, and imprisoned for refusal until even the clergy counseled resistance. The rights of property were denied, and old grants must be renewed at a high rate of fees, while grants under the charter were declared void by its forfeiture. Indian deeds were worthless.

Lands had been held under grants from the General Court to the towns and from the towns to individuals. These were now declared to be "not worth a rush." Possession and use were pleaded in vain by the answer, "You use and possess for the king." The common law and the Bible were brought forward in testimony only to be scorned. All commons and lands reserved for the poor were given to favorites. Everything must minister to the power and the purse of the Governor and his associates, while all opposers were treated as rebels; but the unyielding spirit of the stern old Puritans could not be subdued. Ministers preached sedition and resistance, and once, at least, put by Thanksgiving day. Desperate measures were proposed and a petition to the king prepared, with which Increase Mather was already on his way to England when the rebellion of 1688 broke forever the power of James, and with him went his rulers in the colonies.

Weymouth was not indifferent to these great movements, and 20th May, 1689, a meeting was held in relation to a new government, at which it was voted, "in concurrence with the representatives," "that the Governor, deputy, and assistants chosen in 1686, with the deputies then sent by the several towns, should be the settled government of the colony." In other words, the vote was to restore the old order of things.

When Sir Edmund Andros made his escape from the castle, Capt. Samuel White, of Weymouth, received a warrant from Governor Bradstreet and his Council to pursue and bring him back again, which he did with his troop of fifty-two men, for which, with other services, he claimed seventy pounds, but was allowed only twenty-two pounds eight pence.

Military Company.—24th June, 1689, the following officers were confirmed for the Weymouth and Hingham troops: Capt. Ephraim Hunt, Lieut. Jacob Nash, Ensign Richard Phillips. Capt. William Torrey had declined the command on account of the infirmities of age. This seems to have been a reorganization of the former company raised several years previous, and which had been in service during the interval.

Canadian Expedition.—In the Canadian expedition of 1690, Weymouth was represented by Capt. Ephraim Hunt and others. For his services in this campaign, Capt. Hunt received from the General Court a grant of the territory, now Ashland.

Local Matters.—Nov. 27, 1693, the selectmen were ordered to "prepare and present to the Justices' Court in Boston, the laws and orders which concern the prudential affairs of the town;" and March 7, 1697-98, John Torrey, "to encourage his trade, shall have twelve poles of land next his father's, out of the towns commons, for a tan-yard as long as he shall use it for that purpose."

In 1703, the town seems to have come under the displeasure of the government for dereliction of military duty, his Excellency intimating to the Council August 19th, that Col. Hunt was in default in the levy of soldiers ordered from his regiment, none appearing from Weymouth and Hingham, and Col. Hobby was dispatched with ten men of the troop of guards, with orders to make a draft of twenty men out of each of the said towns.

Town Boundaries.—From the earliest times the boundaries between Weymouth and Abington on the south, and Braintree on the west, seem to have been in a very unsatisfactory condition. Committees were frequently appointed by Weymouth to run the lines with a committee of Braintree, but in nearly all cases the latter town refused to act; thus the matter remained unsettled, which was a source of much irritation and annoyance, until Weymouth appears to have lost patience, and ordered its selectmen, June 13, 1712, to prosecute the selectmen of Braintree for refusing to run the town-line as the law provides, voting to stand by them in the business. Whether or not the matter ever came to court is uncertain, but it is quite true that down to the present time the line has never been satisfactorily determined.

New Precinct.—In 1722, an important matter came up which threatened to seriously disturb the friendly relations that the two sections of the town held towards each other. With the increase of population the settled portions of the town gradually extended until they covered more or less densely its entire territory, verging in the north and south towards villages. The length of the town and its narrowness contributed to form it into distinct sections with separate interests and associations, and this naturally engendered a feeling of conflict, if not of hostility, when any questions came up on which there could be a territorial difference of opinion.

These opportunities often occurred, particularly in school and parish affairs. The former could more easily be adjusted as schools could be supplied at moderate expense for all portions, but with regard to the church and parish, the matter was more difficult to manage, since the church was already established, with its meeting-house located in the north part of the town, and a second church with its necessary expense would involve a burden too heavy for the abilities of the town to sustain. Yet the distance, some five or more miles for a large portion of the inhabitants, and the constantly occurring occasions of disagreement, finally brought the matter to a crisis, the south portion of the town coming to the determination to have its own church and meeting-house either by a new precinct or by a new town.

Accordingly, a petition signed by about forty of the inhabitants of the south part of the town was presented to the General Court setting forth the difficulties of their position, and praying to be set off as a distinct town or precinct. The north part, being in the majority and disliking to be disturbed in its old-time arrangement, determined to oppose the movement and prevent, if possible, its consummation. A town-meeting was called and a committee chosen to oppose the petition in the General Court. Attempts were made to accommodate the difficulty by a proposed removal of the meeting-house to a more central locality, all of which failed. Notwithstanding the efforts of the town as represented by its majority, the General Court, in the spring of 1723, recognizing the reasonableness of the request, granted it, and the South Precinct was organized with a territory covering more than half of the area of the town. But this did not heal the breach as subsequent events proved, for there were yet continual sources of trouble and difficulty arising from the parsonage property which was in possession of the North Precinct, and which its people refused to relinquish.

Fisheries.—In the early days of the town no insignificant portion of the food-supply came from the fish taken within or near its borders; and of these, the most dependence was placed upon the herring, or alewives, which were in the habit of running into the ponds that feed Back River to spawn. For many years the supply was doubtless sufficient for all, and there was little need of restriction or care lest that supply should fail. It was therefore unnecessary that the town should concern itself about the matter. But as the population increased, and the multiplying of mills upon the stream threatened to prevent the fish from ascending to the ponds, it was found necessary that the town should take some control of the matter and provide that proper care should be taken to preserve this important source of food.

As early as 1648, mention is made of the "herring broge," giving evidence that this fishery dates back to the first settlement of the town. For the reasons previously given very little notice is subsequently taken of the matter for three-quarters of a century. In 1724-25, at the town-meeting held March 8th, a committee was chosen "to treat with the mill-owners on the river, by Bates', to make a convenient passage for fish into Whitman's Pond, to pay not over £5." From that time onward the "alewives business" occupies a large space upon the town records. Officers were regularly chosen to have charge of the fisheries, to preserve the fish, and also to take and dispose of them in the season, while the proceeds of the sale were a source of income that the town valued highly, as will be seen in the subsequent history. The arranging and settling of this business often proved quite perplexing and difficult.

New County.—About 1725, the subject of forming a new county, to be set off from Suffolk, was agitated, but the project was steadily opposed by Weymouth, unless the court-house should be located within five or six miles of the centre of the town, to which the other towns would not consent.

Dr. White.—At the March meeting held on the 14th of that month, 1726–27, the town felt a necessity for encouraging the settlement of a physician within its limits, and for this purpose voted “a grant of five acres of land to Dr. Nathaniel White while he should remain in the town and practice medicine.”

Town Regulations.—On July 21, 1729, a list of the first jurymen chosen by the town appears upon the records, and from that day to the present the matter has never been allowed to fall into disuse.

From the first settlement of the town for more than a century its expenses were very light, the highways being provided for by personal labor of all the male inhabitants above sixteen years, and no regular appropriation was made for the support of the poor, the cases being very few, and each as it came up was cared for as the circumstances of the matter required; hence are found occasional records like that of Aug. 23, 1733, when the three daughters of Widow Ruth Harvey were provided for by the town, the largest tax being that for the ministry and the schools. These matters will be more fully treated in another department of this sketch.

The proposition for a new county still continued to be agitated. Feb. 2, 1729–30, the town went so far as to choose an agent to treat with the towns of Scituate, Hingham, Hull, Braintree, Hanson, and Abington respecting the matter, and Sept. 1, 1735, a vote was passed in favor of a new county, to be composed of the towns in Suffolk County outside of Boston.

At the following town-meeting, held March 1, 1735–36, two important measures were passed; one allowing all freeholders to vote in the affairs of the town commons, and the other to divide all the commons among the householders “who are freeholders,” in equal shares, and this vote was reaffirmed at a subsequent meeting held March 29th.

March 7, 1736–37, a committee was chosen to unite with Braintree to build a cart-bridge over the Smelt Brook at Weymouth Landing, a proceeding so necessary that it is almost impossible to conceive that an important thoroughfare like this, on the main road leading from Boston to Plymouth, should have been so long permitted to remain without such an improvement.

And again, on the 13th of March following, the town votes its mind that Boston should be a county by itself, and a committee was chosen to petition the General Court to that effect.

Parsonage Property.—Ever since the division of the town into two precincts there had been constant trouble about the parsonage matters before referred to; the South claiming a share in the property and the North steadily refusing to allow the claim. Yet it was such a continual source of irritation that on June 23, 1741, the town chose a committee to consider the matter and to see if some amicable adjustment could not be made, but the effort failed, and the subject remained to be the cause of much future trouble.

Pigwacket Indians.—In 1744, a proposition was made that the Pigwacket Indians then stationed in Boston should be placed in Weymouth, but the disposition of the town was shown by a unanimous vote, on July 25th, that this should not be done.

Town Commons.—On May 23, 1751, the town made its first general appropriation for the poor by voting twenty pounds for this purpose. At the same meeting it was also voted that the Second Precinct should have its share of town-meetings in proportion to its tax; also that the town commons should be divided among the inhabitants according to the tax of 1750, each poll to draw one share, and other shares in proportion to the tax; but this vote, like all previous votes of the kind, was changed on July 1st so as to except all not over twenty-one years of age, all not born in town and who were not householders and freeholders, and also all persons renting property.

Throat Distemper.—At this period occurred the terrible throat distemper that raged so violently in the town during a whole year, from May, 1751, to May, 1752, that out of an estimated population of about twelve hundred one hundred and fifty died, being an eighth of the whole number. This scourge is unprecedented in the history of the town, and was long remembered with dread and horror. Another disaster of a very different character occurred in the burning of the old church, in the First Precinct, on the 23d of April, 1751, in which was stored three barrels of gunpowder. These two occurrences were deemed of so much consequence that the town voted not to send a representative to the General Court that year on that account.

French and Indian Wars.—Soon after this the peace of the colonies was seriously disturbed by the wars between England and France, which, to a large degree, were carried on upon this continent, and in which the French made alliance with the savage tribes of New York, Canada, and the nearer western territories, who carried on the wars in their usual merciless and bloodthirsty manner; and, although New England, especially upon the shores of Massachusetts Bay and the southern borders, was far removed from the scene of active strife, yet even the little town of Weymouth was not exempt from its share in the hardship and expense attendant upon their continuance. The records are very bare and many of the muster-rolls have been lost, but enough remains to show something of what these wars cost the town in blood and treasure for matters in which it had no real concern. In the expeditions of 1755 and 1756, to Crown Point and Lake George, about forty men of Weymouth belonged in the regiment of Col. (afterwards Gen.) Benjamin Lincoln, under the command of Capt. Samuel Thaxter. Of this number six never returned to the town, but died or were killed during the year's service. Among the men of this company was Lieut. Solomon Lovell, afterwards general during the Revolutionary struggle. But these were not all, for in the many hard campaigns along the northern frontiers during these and subsequent years, until the capture of that last stronghold of the French on this continent, Louisburg, in 1758, and the victory of Wolfe on the Plain of Abraham, below Quebec, in the year following, by which the power of that nation in this quarter of the world was completely broken, Weymouth sent her sons to assist in the general cause.

The names of such, to a great extent, are wanting, but in the incidental mentions upon public archives, and in private family histories, enough is gathered to show that there were many of them, and that they bore an honorable record.

French Neutrals.—In 1755, after the capture of Acadia (Nova Scotia) by the English, large numbers of the unfortunate inhabitants, who were with the greatest inhumanity forced to abandon their former pleasant homes, and seek shelter wherever they might, were brought to Boston, and as no provision had been made for their support, they were parceled out among the several towns that were thus compelled to provide for them. Weymouth received its share, but how many there remains no record to show, excepting such as is found in the votes of the town in special cases and upon the treasurer's books, like the following: March 8, 1756, "Dr. Nathaniel White was paid eight shillings per week for a year for keeping the French Neuters," this by vote of the town, and upon the treasurer's account there is an item of six pounds paid to James Humphrey, Feb. 28, 1761, for subsisting the "French Neuters."

Dr. Tufts.—Again, March 10, 1760, Dr. Cotton Tufts, who had recently settled in the north part of the town as a physician, and who afterwards, for more than half a century, was one of its most valuable and prominent citizens, was chosen agent to confer with other towns about a new county.

Highways.—About the same time also the town was found to have outgrown the primitive method of working the highways, and something different and more effective was needed. New regulations were consequently adopted, whereby each poll was to be taxed two shillings and one penny, one day's work; other taxes in same proportion. Those having teams, horse or ox, were rated at certain prices, and the whole matter was reduced to a kind of system, rude to be sure, but a vast improvement over the ancient plan. This arrangement was continued with comparatively few changes for several generations.

South Precinct.—During these years the South Precinct seems to have been steadily gaining upon the North in population and influence, and had become strong enough to command a vote, March 24, 1761, defining the word "ministry" in the parsonage deed to include both ministers, and that each should draw of the income from that source in proportion to the tax paid by his parish.

CHAPTER XLVII.

WEYMOUTH—(Continued).

Revolutionary War—Arbitrary Measures of the Crown—Agents Chosen to Meet in Boston—Committees of Correspondence—No more Tea—Energetic Action—Record of Votes on the Resolutions of Congress—Refusal to Pay Taxes to the Royal Treasurer—Town Committee of Correspondence—Minute-Men—Preparations for War—Raising Troops—Declaration of Independence—Bounties—State Convention—State Constitution—Procuring Men and Provisions—Soldiers to Hull.

Revolutionary War.—Soon after this time the political affairs of the colonies began to assume an importance that they had never before reached. The arbitrary measures of the English government continually growing more and more harsh and oppressive, had roused the people to a pitch that boded no friendly issue. Measure after measure was adopted by the ministry, each more urgent and onerous than the former, and forced upon the people until they were compelled to resort to extreme measures in self-defense. During the whole history of the colonies all important business was transacted in open town-meeting. Was any measure suggested for the benefit of the town, here it was thoroughly discussed, and adopted or rejected. Was any grievance complained of, here it was also considered and remedies proposed. Here all voters stood upon a perfect equality, where each could and did speak his mind freely and fully, and every vote counted one.

In these town-meetings, therefore, the measures of government came up for consideration, and such means were adopted as seemed best suited to counteract the evil effects of the arbitrary measures of the crown. Here were chosen the representatives to the General Court, to whom were given instructions filled with important and minute detail, and these officers were held to a strict accountability. To their constituents they must answer, and that directly; there could be no evading or shirking, consequently the public business was transacted under a feeling of heavy responsibility, which resulted in carrying out the will of the people as far as the power of the deputies extended. The law-makers in General Court assembled were the same class of men who spoke so boldly in town-meeting, and the same spirit animated their actions in the higher position.

Weymouth took an active and prominent part in the primary action that immediately preceded the war of the Revolution, and under the leadership of such men as Maj. James Humphrey, Dr. Cotton Tufts, and Gen. Solomon Lovell, of the North Parish, and Deacon Nathaniel Bayley, of the South, the town took a position that it had never before nor has since attained. Oct. 16, 1765, Maj. Humphrey, then representative to the General Court, received full and decided instructions from the town as to the position he was to take in the present position of affairs.

Sept. 1, 1766, the town refused to consent to the proposition, "that the sufferers by the disturbances of last year in Boston should be paid from the public treasury, as recommended by his majesty, and instructed their representative of this action."

Agents Chosen to Meet in Boston.—Sept. 21, 1768, James Humphrey and Cotton Tufts were appointed agents to meet in Faneuil Hall, Boston, on the following day, to consult with the agents of other towns on the present state of affairs.

Committees of Correspondence.—In the mean time the political matters of the State had reached such a point that committees of correspondence had been formed in all of the principal towns, and frequent consultations were held upon the important matters then agitating the country. At a special meeting held in Weymouth, Jan. 3, 1774, of which James Humphrey was moderator, a letter was read from the Boston committee, with copies of the votes and proceedings of that town at meetings held on the 5th and 18th of the previous November, with regard to the cargoes of teas daily expected from the East India Company's warehouses in London, suggesting the co-operation of the several towns in resisting the introduction of this obnoxious article,—obnoxious only because it had been the innocent occasion of an unjust tax. The matter was fully considered and a resolution passed "by a very great majority . . . not to purchase nor use any of the East India Company's teas of any kind (excepting such as they might now have on hand), until the act of Parliament, laying a duty thereon, be repealed."

No more Tea.—Also, that the minds of the people might be more fully determined, and there be no mistake in the business, also to show that they were as ready to act as to resolve, a committee was chosen, consisting of Cotton Tufts, Esq., Maj. Lovell, Deacon Nathaniel Bayley, Jacob Gould, and Ebenezer Colson, to prepare the resolutions in proper form and to present them at the March meeting "to be signed, that the minds of the inhabitants may be generally known."

On the 18th of July, of the same year, a form of covenant was received from the committee of correspondence of Boston, and recommended for signatures. This was placed in the hands of a committee, who were to give it full consideration, obtain as many names to it as possible, and then to deposit it with the town clerk.

Energetic Action.—At a meeting held on the 28th of September following, the instructions of the deputies from Boston to the General Court were read, and the same were made the instructions of the town to its deputy, Nathaniel Bayley. At the same meeting, Deacon Bayley was also chosen to attend the meeting of the Provincial Convention to assemble at Concord, on the second Tuesday of October next. The town also accepted the nineteen resolves drawn up by the county committee, agreeing to stand by them, and to hold the constables harmless in refusing to pay over the State taxes to the treasurer appointed by the crown.

Record of Votes on the Resolutions of Congress.—The resolutions prepared by the committee had been presented to the inhabitants for signature, according to the action of the town, and were reported as follows. In the South Precinct this preamble was adopted, date Dec. 12, 1774:

"We, the inhabitants of the Second Precinct in the said Town, under the sacred ties of Virtue, Honor, and love of our Country, do now covenant and agree with each other, that we will conform and strictly adhere to the agreement and association which the American Continental Congress has recommended unto us, and which has now been read."

This was signed with the following result: one hundred and two in favor, none against and twenty-one not voting, make a total of one hundred and twenty-three voters.

In the North Precinct the agreement varied a little in its wording, and read as follows:

"We, the inhabitants of the first precinct of Weymouth, whose names are here underwritten, do signify our approbation to the Continental Association which is recommended by the General Continental Congress held in Philadelphia, in the year 1774, those of us that approve of the same, to answer to our names by the word 'yea,' and those who disapprove of the same by the word 'no.'" The following questions were put at the close of the lecture, Dec. 25, 1774, with this result:

One hundred and four answered "yes," four answered "no," and fourteen did not answer. One hundred and twenty-two voters being at the meeting.

Refuse to Pay Taxes to the Royal Treasurer.—Jan. 30, 1775, Deacon Nathaniel Bayley was elected by the town as its delegate to the proposed Congress to meet at Cambridge, 1st of February next, the town to provide for him. The town also chose a committee to see that the inhabitants adhere strictly to their pledge; and, at the same meeting, renewed the vote to hold the constables harmless for not carrying their money for the year 1772 to "Harryson Gray," and ordering the money to be paid to the town treasurer. On the 13th of March, however, the latter vote was so far reconsidered as to direct the constables to pay the money to Henry Gardner, of Stow.

Town Committee of Correspondence.—A Committee of Correspondence for Weymouth to act with those of the neighboring towns had been chosen on the 9th of March, consisting of Dr. Tufts, Maj. Lovell, Maj. Vining, Capt. Asa White, and Mr. Josiah Colson. This committee met in Arnold's Tavern, at Weymouth Landing (the building is yet standing), together with those with whom they were to associate, organized by choice of Dr. Tufts as chairman, and Capt. White as secretary, and afterwards did efficient service during the war.

Minute-Men.—On the 13th of March it having been deemed necessary in view of the exigency of the times and the wish to be prepared for any emergency, to enlist a company of minute-men, it was voted to pay them one shilling per week for four weeks; and, on May 2d of the same year, it was voted to pay "a pistareen a day for a week to a company of fifteen men for a military guard in the present troublesome times." Deserters were to lose their wages.

Preparations for War.—At a town-meeting held on the 24th of May, Deacon Nathaniel Bayley was chosen to represent the town in the Provincial Congress to meet at Watertown, May 31st; the Committee of Correspondence was also directed to ascertain who were in need of arms, and report to the commanding officer. Enrolled soldiers from sixteen to sixty years of age were required to meet and organize, those of each parish at their own meeting-house, on the 25th of May. The town also accepted the offer of Mr. Polley for the use of two swivel guns then at Salem, and voted their thanks to Dr. Tufts for his offer to transport them to Weymouth.

On the 29th of May the committee was authorized to procure arms at the town's expense for those not able to purchase or hire them, and the Committee of Correspondence was directed to put in order the two swivel guns and to procure ammunition at the town's charge, in case the province should not assume it. The bells were also to be rung to notify an alarm. The thanks of the town were also voted to Hon. Richard Darby for the use of two small carriage-guns, which were delivered to Thomas Jenks, to be returned when done, with thanks and all damage made good.

June 1, 1775, the town instructed the committee to hire guns at one dollar each, for six months; and such was the urgency of the times that the enrolled militia were ordered to appear under arms on the Lord's day, under penalty of one dollar for each day; and those who remained at home, without reasonable excuse, were to forfeit two dollars each. The number of those reporting without arms was twelve in the North Precinct, and twenty-two in the South.

March 11, 1776, a new Committee of Correspondence was chosen, consisting of Cotton Tufts, Esq., Capt. James White, Col. Solomon Lovell, Nathaniel Bayley, Esq., and Daniel Blanchard; and on the 20th of May two representatives were chosen, Nathaniel Bayley and Col. Solomon Lovell. All persons drawing ammunition from the town were to return the same in amount, or pay at the rate of four shillings per pound for powder, eight pence for bullets, and six-pence for flints.

Raising Troops.—At a town-meeting held on the 15th of July, the town voted to raise one hundred and thirty pounds by tax, to be added to the bounty offered by the province for the enlistment of ten men, the quota called for from Weymouth, to be raised in ten days. Deacon Nathaniel Bayley and Capt. Samuel Ward were authorized to hire men from out of town in case they should not be raised in town, and to pay them the same bounty as was paid to townsmen,—that is, twenty pounds, thirteen from the town and seven from the province, and the treasurer was to borrow the money for the purpose.

On the 22d of July eight more men were called for from the town, and it was voted to raise one hundred and four pounds additional. These men were enlisted for the Northern or Canada expedition, and fully earned their wages. It was also voted at a meeting held Nov. 18, 1776, to raise ninety-two pounds for the men raised on the previous September. This was to be raised by tax on polls and estates, and all who had been in the Continental service for a year were exempt from it. And on the 23d December following, the town raised one hundred and ninety-eight pounds to pay twenty-two men who had gone into the Continental service with Lieut. Samuel Kingman, or three pounds additional to each man.

Upon the actual commencement of hostilities, as will be seen, the town took prompt and decided measures to perform its whole duty in carrying into effect its resolutions of the previous years, and to obtain the independence of the country. Men and money were freely raised and sent forward at the call of the Continental and Provincial authorities.

Declaration of Independence.—The Declaration of Independence was entered in full upon the town records, and read from both pulpits upon the next Lord's day after its reception. Measures were also taken to prevent a monopoly in articles of necessity, and to guard against extortion, and the prices at which these articles were to be sold were fixed by the town.

Bounties.—At a meeting held Feb. 21, 1777, to encourage enlistments for a longer term than those of previous years, it was voted to pay each soldier enlisting in the Continental service for three years, or during the war, seventy-four pounds additional. On the 17th of March it was voted to pay each soldier six pounds who was in the Northern army for a year. The committee was instructed to inquire "why some of our soldiers came from York before their time was up," and these were not to draw their pay until the committee had made its report.

On the 14th of May, it was voted to pay "six pounds per month, for eight months, for men who enlist in the provincial or Continental service, and deserters were to forfeit all right to their wages." On the 21st of the same month, a thousand pounds was voted to raise men for the Continental army, and a committee of three chosen to hire men from out of town. No one member was to pay more than thirty pounds per man without the consent of another. On the 18th of August the town voted to add four pounds, ten shillings per month to the pay of each soldier from the time of marching to his return, allowing twenty miles for a day's march. Three hundred pounds more were also raised for men for the Continental service; and on the 25th of August the wages of soldiers were raised to twelve pounds per month until the 1st of November.

On the 22d of September, by vote of the town, men were not to be drafted for the army, and those who entered the service in the previous September were to be allowed forty shillings per month to make their pay equal to that of the men hired by the town. Men were becoming scarce and more difficulty was found in obtaining them, consequently greater inducements must be offered. On the 6th of November, Capts. Samuel Ward and Thomas Nash were instructed to raise men at the best rate they could to guard prisoners, to serve until the 1st of April next; and another levy of eighty pounds was made.

On the 10th of November, under a further call for soldiers, it was voted to "pay them four pounds in case they can't be had for less, and forty shillings for rations to find themselves in case the State does not find them," and for this purpose seventy-five pounds were voted.

At a meeting held on the 2d of March, 1778, it was found so difficult to raise the necessary number of men demanded of the town that a committee was constituted to devise an easier method of doing it; but notwithstanding their utmost exertions, the trouble met them face to face. Men must be had, and no men were to be found. Committees were appointed to assist the officers in procuring enlistments, but the men came slowly and only upon the offer of superior inducements. The war was lingering on much longer than any had at first supposed, and with no immediate prospect of an end. The buoyancy of spirit and the hope that animated the people at the beginning had died out, and there remained but the stern reality of severe service, small pay, and an abundance of hardship; enthusiasm could accomplish nothing, for there was none; consequently, money must be given in its stead.

On the 16th of March, 1778, it was voted to raise six hundred and twelve pounds to pay the men under Capt. Ward, at the rate of nine pounds per month, who were guarding the stores near Boston. On the 25th of May following fifteen hundred pounds were voted "to raise men to be sent to Gen. Washington and other places, and the committee were authorized to go out of town to hire them, and to pay each man one hundred pounds or forty shillings per month to serve, to be paid in articles at the prices when the war began."

July 8, 1779, the committee was instructed to hire soldiers for the Continental army for nine months, three years, or the war, to pay them forty shillings per month in produce at the prices of 1775, or in cash upon the best terms they can make, the treasurer to borrow forty-five hundred pounds for the purpose.

State Convention.—On the 22d of July, 1779, Hon. James Humphrey was chosen representative to the State Convention, to meet at Cambridge on the 1st of the following September for the purpose of forming a constitution; and on the 2d of August the town accepted, by a large majority, the action of the convention at Concord regulating prices, and a committee was chosen to carry the matter into effect, also to see that the regulations were observed. On the 16th of August the treasurer was authorized to borrow nine thousand pounds for the purpose of procuring soldiers. This rapid and large increase of appropriations is simply the measure of the depreciation in the value of the currency of the country at that time, and by no means an indication of such an increase in the actual expense. As an illustration of this advance or rather depreciation, in 1780, March 13th, at the annual meeting, six pounds was fixed as the value of a day's work upon the highways against two shillings eight pence two years previous. At this meeting the assessors were instructed "to report a list of all persons taxed for estates to be amended by the town, and all upon the list were to be required to give in under oath a true list of their property, and any who do not shall pay double their assessment, and to double on each assessment until they comply with the requirement."

State Constitution.—On the 24th of April, 1780, a committee was appointed to consider the new Constitution and report, which was done on the 22d of May, and this Constitution was accepted with a proposition of certain amendments, such as "where personal estate is required, it shall be expressly mentioned 'rateable estate'; and that at least as much property shall be required for qualifications of members of Congress as for Senators, and that no member of the board of war shall be a member of the Senate or House of Representatives; that express provision be made for calling a Congress in 1795." Hon. James Humphrey, the delegate, was instructed to advocate these amendments, and also to vote for the adoption of the Constitution, even although they should not be made.

On the 19th of June the town was divided into twenty districts "as the tax-lists stand, each district to send one man into the service, and if any one refuse to go or to pay his proportion, the captain of the company is directed to draft him. Any widow or female refusing to pay, it shall be added to the next tax, and any district that neglects to furnish its man, the captain of its company shall proceed to draft, the tax-list to be put into the hands of the three highest on the list for the purpose of calling a meeting to carry this vote into effect."

Procuring Men and Provisions.—On the 18th of September the town voted fifteen thousand pounds for three months' men, and on October 9th, twenty thousand pounds more to purchase beef, according to the requirement of the General Court. On December 20th, the militia officers were appointed a committee to see if they can hire nineteen men, the town's quota for the Continental army upon the last call of the General Court, and one hundred and thirty thousand pounds were voted to procure beef on the call of the same. Non-residents were to be taxed for their share of expense in hiring the six months' men, and fifty hard dollars a year for three years, was to be the pay of men for the Continental service.

At the annual meeting, March 12, 1781, it was voted that "any person refusing to pay his proportion of the expense of procuring men for three years' service shall be taxed for the same and the tax collected by the officer." On the 26th of March it was voted to change the manner of raising men; voted to raise nineteen hundred hard dollars, or currency, seventy-five for one, for the purpose; ninety pounds in specie to be paid for three years' men, one-third when mustered in, and one-third at the beginning of each year for two years succeeding.

The first meeting recorded for the election of State officers was held April 2, 1781. On the 9th it was ordered that the money raised to pay soldiers should be kept by itself; and that a petition be presented to the General Court for the privilege of enlisting the men at the Castle for the three-years' service. On June 18th, "three hundred dollars, hard money, was voted for three-years' men; one-third at the beginning of each year, or fifty dollars bounty, and ten dollars per month." On the 25th of June, men were to be "hired on the best terms that could be made for six months, and if delayed longer than that to have double wages for the over time," and for this the town would give security, a proceeding reflecting somewhat upon its credit.

On the 9th of July it was voted to raise five months' and three months' men for the Continental service. On July 16th, a better prospect opened, when it was understood that "men could be had for fifty hard dollars and they to relinquish the Continental pay." It was accordingly voted to hire them. On the 8th of October it was voted to raise twenty-five hundred hard dollars to hire men for three years, the committee to have discretionary powers in the matter. Also voted that the monthly requisition for beef be complied with. November 19th, it was voted to assess immediately the State tax to make up the deficiency in Continental soldiers; and on December 10th it was voted that the tax, fourteen hundred and thirteen pounds, four shillings, and sixpence, be paid by January 1st, following, or the men procured, each of whom was to be rated one hundred and twenty-eight pounds, nine shillings, and sixpence, and every exertion was to be used to procure money and men.

Soldiers to Hull.—It appears that the men were raised with much trouble but not until after the time set, December 20th, and the superintendent refused to receive them. A petition was therefore made to the Governor and Council to be relieved from the difficulty by a grant of more time. On Sept. 30, 1782, ten soldiers were sent to Hull to assist the French in throwing up fortifications for the defense of the harbor, and these were to be paid "seven dollars per month, if not allowed that by the State;" and on December 2d, the town remitted the taxes of "Gideon Colson and Thomas Tirrell, they being in the enemies' hands when the taxes were made."

This concludes a brief sketch of the history of Weymouth during the Revolution as found upon its records. Very much of its service in men and money must be sought in other directions, and at the best the story must be imperfectly told. Of the official rolls, many are incomplete or wholly missing, but enough remain to show that of a population of about fourteen hundred people, according to the estimate of Dr. Cotton Tufts, made within two years after the close of the war, the town sent into the various departments of military service upon the calls of the State and Continental authority, at least two hundred men, one in seven of its total inhabitants; and these must have embraced very nearly all of the able-bodied men. It is true that the terms of service were very short in many instances, but however short, the burden of such a large number must have been enormous.

The number who perished upon the field of battle or died in the service cannot be ascertained, but probably not less than thirty or forty, since a list remains of fifteen from the soldiers of the South Precinct alone. The amount of expense attending the payment of the men for wages, bounties, and support, also for army supplies, it is almost impossible to estimate owing to the fluctuating value of the currency, but the various votes already quoted give some idea of its sum.

Of the officers sent into the service from this town, honorable mention is made of General Solomon Lovell, who was in command of the eastern military district of which Boston was the headquarters. He also was in active service in the Rhode Island campaign in 1778, and his brigade did efficient work in the battle before Newport, in which the general was noted for his coolness and bravery. He was also the military commander of the unfortunate Penobscot expedition of the following year, which was unsuccessful, not from any fault of his, but from the want of co-operation on the part of the fleet under command of Commodore Saltonstall, who was afterwards cashiered for cowardice and inefficiency. Among the other officers may be named Capt. Thomas Nash, who served under Washington during the siege of Boston, and was officer of the day on the night when Dorchester Heights were taken possession of; Capt. Joseph Trufant, Capt. Samuel Ward, Capt. Asa White, Lieut. Cushing, who was with Arnold in the Canada expedition, Lieut. Samuel Kingman, Lieut. Thomas Vinson, Lieut. David Joy, Lieut. Asa Dyer, and others.

The record is one of which Weymouth has no reason to be ashamed, although, at times, the work languished and the men refused to go, money came slowly or not at all, yet the times were such and the demands so many and great that its ability was not sufficient to meet them. It must also be borne in mind that this town was not alone in these deficiencies, but was even more prompt than many, and probably equal to the foremost. The fact stated that the town sent into the field fully two hundred men, of whom probably nearly a quarter perished, tells a story that it will be difficult to overcome. Hardly a family, or very few if any, but had one or more representatives in the field during some part of the great struggle, and some throughout its whole duration. The town was also peculiarly fortunate in having for its leaders men of such ability and judgment as those whose names have been mentioned, Dr. Cotton Tufts, Gen. Solomon Lovell, Maj. James Humphrey, and Deacon Nathaniel Bayley, men who were wise in council, skillful and brave in the field, and untiring in their efforts to promote the interests of their country in the momentous struggle in which it was then engaged. Some of the public papers prepared by these men in their official service are models of political documents, and will compare favorably with the best of that day.

Recovering from the Effects of the War.—The process of recovery from the desolations occasioned by the war was slow. The losses had been too great, the wounds too deep, and the exhaustion too complete to be made good at once; hence, there was great depression in trade, for there was no money upon which to transact business. The drain of men had been so severe that it was many years before the gap thus occasioned was so far filled that the ordinary duties could be done with comparative ease. The evils resulting from a currency depreciated until its value became but nominal, continued the burdens of taxation far beyond their natural limits, and thus there was stagnation and depression. Nor were these physical evils the only sources of difficulty, those of a moral nature, resulting directly from habits contracted in the army, were a calamity of far more terrible character; and not one was so fearful and far-reaching in its effects as that of the excessive use of intoxicating liquors, which had become wellnigh universal; and in consequence, large numbers of well-to-do families, who before the war were in comparative wealth and ease, became reduced, and were obliged to sell the estates that the war had left to them, to supply the demands of an exhaustless appetite. Hence, in course of the following generation a vast number of the estates in town changed hands. Nor has the effect of this wholly ceased even at the end of a full century from the close of the war, but is still felt in its hereditary power, by multitudes of the present generation, who have inherited this unnatural appetite from their ancestors.

Work-House.—For years therefore the inhabitants were obliged to struggle for a bare maintenance, and were in no condition to prosecute business enterprises or carry on the pursuits of learning; and it was a score of years before the natural resources of the town began to be developed by the enterprises of the citizens. During the latter years of the war the town, after various attempts, succeeded in building, in 1779, a work-house near the centre of its territory, not far from Tirrell's mill, for the accommodation of the poor, who had increased to such a degree as to require special attention; and this house was used for that purpose until the erection of another building for the same purpose, at Weymouth Landing, in 1809.

Local Matters.—A few items of interest occur upon the records from time to time before the close of the century, among which are the following: March 12, 1787, the town officers took the oath of allegiance agreeable to a resolve of the General Court; May 7, 1787, Dr. Cotton Tufts was chosen a delegate to the Convention in Boston, second Wednesday in January, to consider the constitution or form of government of the United States of America; April 5, 1790, the town voted to allow their representatives five shillings per day agreeably to the practice of other towns, and March 14, 1791, the town clerk was directed to read the laws of the commonwealth at the next meeting after he receives them.

Smallpox.—At a meeting held Sept. 11, 1792, the town refused to permit inoculation for the smallpox, and March 11th, following, permission was granted for the erection of a hospital for that purpose agreeable to law, under direction of the selectmen.

Norfolk County.—After the war the question of a new county was frequently raised and various action taken, sometimes favorable and sometimes opposed, but the matter was finally determined by the General Court, and the towns of Suffolk County, southerly from Boston, were set off and formed into Norfolk County in 1793; this, however, does not seem to have suited the good people of Weymouth, for, August 26th of that year, a committee was appointed to draw up a petition to the General Court praying to be set off from Norfolk County and to be reannexed to Suffolk, but the movement was unsuccessful, and Weymouth has remained to the present time a part of Norfolk County, although the attempt was afterwards renewed, the reason alleged being that the shire-town was too far away.

Attempt to Divide the Town.—In 1796 the division of the town was again proposed, this time by the North Precinct, and a petition presented to the General Court for that purpose. The feeling ran very high, the North Precinct being almost unanimously in favor, and the South as decidedly opposed. For the next half a dozen years the matter was in constant agitation in public and in private, in parish-meeting and in town-meeting, and the town was so nearly divided upon the subject that the votes were sometimes in favor and sometimes against. At that time, about the year 1802, according to a canvass made for the purpose, the population was found to have increased to 1803, 965 of whom lived in the North Parish, and 838 in the South; the ratable polls in the North 211 and in the South 200; two-fifths of the land in the North, and three-fifths in the South; of the money at interest the South had $22,950, and the North had $20,133. The Senate voted in favor of a division but the House refused, and the matter was referred to the next session, March 3, 1803, which was equivalent to an indefinite postponement of the whole subject. Thus the question has remained to the present, with spasmodic attempts from time to time to revive it, but never with much prospect of success.

Business Enterprises.—With the increase of population and wealth there came also a revival of business enterprises, and soon after the beginning of the nineteenth century a new era of prosperity dawned upon the town, commencing at Weymouth Landing, at the head of tide-water on Fore River, and gradually extending over other parts of the town. In 1805 a turnpike was built through Weymouth, opening a more direct communication between Boston and Plymouth, by which the village at the landing was largely the gainer. Under the lead of Capt. Samuel Arnold, Levi Bates, and others various branches of mechanical industry were started, and a new life infused into the community. Within a few years a large number of buildings were erected within a radius of half a mile. Many of them, in magnitude and value, have hardly been surpassed to the present day. Navigation was resumed, and quite a brisk trade carried on between the town and Boston by means of sailing packets, which ran regularly; and it was in these days that shoe manufacturing commenced, which has since grown into such vast proportions.

In 1800, March 10th, there is found for the first time upon the records the warrant for the town-meeting entered in full, a custom that has been ever since continued; and under date of May 11, 1801, are found the qualifications of voters at that time, who were to be twenty-one years of age, and to possess a freehold valued at sixty pounds, or one yielding an income of three pounds (free suffrage had not yet become the law of the land).

The town, which was always conservative, did not look altogether with favor upon the new enterprises, but viewed with jealous eyes the proposition to open new roads through its borders and construct bridges across the rivers, and went so far (3d February, 1803)

as to choose a committee to oppose them before the committee of the General Court, which had the matter under consideration,—such men as Cotton Tufts, Eliphalet Loud, and Maj. John White being foremost in the opposition,—but the roads and the bridges were built, and the town was the better for them.

Post-Office.—In 1804, February 6th, the town instructed the selectmen to petition the Postmaster-General to establish a post-office at or near the head of navigation at Fore River. This village, although the youngest in town, was already the most important. The answer to this petition was the establishment of the first post-office in Weymouth. In 1809 the new work-house at the landing was completed, costing about sixteen hundred dollars, and was used for the accommodation of the town's poor until the purchase of the present town farm, in 1839. March 12, 1810, the selectmen and the physicians of the town were appointed a committee to superintend the inoculation with cowpox.

War with England.—During the war with Great Britain, in 1812–15, many of the young men of the town engaged in the service by land and sea, but the action of the town shows very little movement in connection with the subject, there being but four votes standing upon its records relating to the matter. May 21, 1812, the town voted to pay each enlisted soldier a bounty of five dollars, and ten dollars per month pay while in actual service; and June 30, 1814, it was voted to make the pay of non-commissioned officers and privates, now or hereafter in the service, equal to fifteen dollars per month, and the same to those called out upon the alarm at Cohasset, and who remained there until legally dismissed. A committee of safety was also chosen, to consist of the selectmen (three) and six others. On the 7th of November the town voted twelve hundred dollars to pay the soldiers and build a magazine.

Alarm at Cohasset.—The nearest approach to actual hostilities that the town experienced during that war was upon the occasion of this "alarm at Cohasset," which occurred on a Sunday, Adj. Cushing notifying the militia in the meeting-houses while the people were attending divine service. It was reported that a landing had been effected from an English ship-of-war that was cruising along the coast, committing many petty depredations, and that there was necessity for immediate assistance. The infantry and artillery companies from Weymouth responded immediately, but the alarm was a false one and there was no need of troops.

Mechanical industry being then in its infancy, and needing the services of only a part of the men, numbers of these had entered into the mercantile marine, and at the opening of the war, this branch of service being paralyzed, many of them found employment in the navy and upon privateers.

A change appears upon the records in May, 1818, with respect to the qualification of voters,—an income from freehold estate of ten dollars, or one valued at two hundred dollars, being required, and an age of twenty-one years.

Town Lines.—In the beginning of the third volume of the town general records there is a full description of the town lines, as measured by James Humphrey, Esq., in 1794, probably the most correct and reliable of any to be found upon any record. Aug. 21, 1820, a committee was appointed to oppose the petition of the Hingham and Quincy turnpike to the General Court to have the allowance paid to vessels passing through their drawbridges removed.

Manufacturing Companies Discouraged.—In the years 1822 and 1824, committees of manufacturing companies were looking over the State in search of the most desirable water privileges, with a view of selecting a location, and Weymouth Back River appears to have had a preference. In the former year, 12th of August, Samuel Hubbard and others had so far decided in favor of this locality that they requested of the town the privilege of purchasing the alewife fishery, the only serious difficulty; but the town, valuing a small present income more highly than a large one in prospect, refused. Again, April 5, 1824, Gen. W. H. Sumner and others, impressed with the value of the water privilege, offered the town two hundred dollars per year for ten years, and agreeing to make a sufficient fishway by which the fish could ascend into the pond above, to employ a capital of one hundred thousand dollars, and pay a parish tax to be divided between the three parishes. But the town, with strange short-sightedness, again refused. Had better counsels prevailed, Weymouth might now be what Lowell is. On May 2, 1825, Gen. Sumner again renewed his request with a still more favorable proposition, but the town would not consent.

In 1831 the report of the expenses of the town was printed for the first time.

Surplus Revenue.—In 1836 the general government found itself in the anomalous condition of an overflowing treasury, and a large sum amounting to many millions was distributed among the States for their use as a loan. Massachusetts distributed its share among the several towns, and Weymouth, in 1837, after one of the most hotly-contested struggles in its history, having called no fewer than eight meetings upon the matter, divided its share among the inhabitants, pro rata, taking notes therefore, which was in reality a perpetual loan without interest, for on March 16, 1868, the town voted to destroy the notes, amounting to $6146.40, they being outlawed and worthless.

Anti-Slavery Resolutions.—Soon after this time the anti-slavery agitation commenced, and an earnest, determined body of its friends were found among the citizens, and so vigorous and successful were their efforts that a strong sentiment was created in the town in favor of the movement, so strong that when, in 1842, George Latimer, a fugitive slave, lay in Boston jail, at the instance of his alleged master, James B. Gray, of Virginia, a series of indignant resolutions were passed at the meeting held November 14th, protesting against the act.

In 1837 another movement was made by Jacob Perkin and others towards the improvement of the water privilege at East Weymouth, in the interest of iron manufacturers, which, after long and tedious negotiations and litigations, resulted in the establishment of the Weymouth Iron Company, which has proved one of the most important business enterprises of the town.

Pay of Town Officers.—At the March meeting, in 1843, it was voted to pay town officers one dollar per day for their services, the clerk to have no pay for town-meeting days. This seems to have been the beginning of regular payments for this purpose, but with an advance from time to time until it has increased to three times its original amount.

In 1847 a strong effort was again made for a division of the town, but like that of fifty years previous it proved unsuccessful, the vote on the question being taken by a committee going from house to house, with the following result: 460 in favor and 465 against, 72 not voting, and 56 not found; of the nays, 359 were in the South Parish. This agitation was renewed again in 1850 with similar result.

On Nov. 12, 1850, strong, denunciatory resolutions against the fugitive slave law were passed, and on March 10th, succeeding, the town voted that they be expunged from the record, which was accordingly done by writing across the face. Thus the record stood until March, 1880, when the latter vote was rescinded, and the record stands as originally made in favor of the resolutions and as the voice of the town.

Town Records.—The original town records being badly worn and in a very dilapidated condition, the selectmen were instructed to have them transcribed, also to look up the books belonging to the town, have them catalogued, and to procure a safe in which to keep them. The first and last clauses of the vote were carried into effect, but that relating to the catalogue remained unattended to.

Town Hall.—In 1852, in view of the want of a proper place for holding town-meetings, and for quarters for town offices, the town hall was built on the westerly side of Washington Street, at the corner of Middle Street, and very near the geographical centre of the town. A plain, inexpensive structure, but which has answered the actual necessities of the town in that respect for over thirty years. And again on March 13, 1854, a series of strong anti-slavery resolutions stand upon the records as the expression of the town.

War of the Rebellion.—As will be seen, the records are very bare of interest, other than that which attaches to the ordinary but necessary business of the town, until the stirring days of 1861. The long continued quarrels in Congress upon the slavery question, each year growing more intense and bitter, had culminated in a marshaling of the contending parties and the election of a Republican President. The crisis was brought about by accident, each party believing, until the actual collision, that the other would give way and not force matters to an extremity. But the attack upon Sumter and the call of President Lincoln for volunteers decided the question in favor of war. The spirit of the people was aroused to the highest pitch and the greatest enthusiasm prevailed.

A public meeting of the citizens was called at once, and the organization of a military company for actual service commenced. Volunteers for what was afterwards Company H, Twelfth Regiment of Massachusetts Volunteers, were enlisted; the company was soon filled, and made choice of James L. Bates for captain, whose after-record was the brightest in the town's military history. He passed through the various grades of service, and at the close of the war wore worthily the honorable title of brevet brigadier-general. His regiment saw the hardest service, and fought in twenty-eight battles.

On the 29th of April a special town-meeting was called, at which five thousand dollars were voted to equip this company and for other necessary expenses connected therewith. Each married man was to receive fifteen dollars per month and each single man ten dollars, while in actual service under command of its officers; the same to be paid to others who shall hereafter enlist. June 11, 1861, the selectmen were directed to furnish necessary aid, not exceeding fifteen dollars per month, to the wife, and children under sixteen years of age of men enlisted by the town in the service; also to other near relatives who might be dependent upon them at the time of enlistment.

On the 10th of March, 1862, ten thousand dollars was appropriated for aid to the families of volunteers in the field, and the poll-tax of last year's volunteers was also remitted.

Military Records.—The selectmen were instructed to cause a record to be prepared and kept of all the Weymouth soldiers engaged in the service of the government, with such details as may be obtained with respect to them and their service, names, ages, residence, and such particulars as may be necessary to a full knowledge of them and their service in the war.

Within the first year of the Rebellion Weymouth had paid out for aid to families of soldiers over fifteen thousand dollars, something over one-third of which was to be reimbursed by the State; and in order to guard against unforeseen and sudden emergency "Union Guards" were formed, for whose supplies and necessary expense the town also paid in the same time nearly a thousand dollars more.

Bounties.—During the summer of 1862, the urgency for soldiers became so great and the call so persistent that the town, upon the report of a committee appointed for the purpose, voted to pay a bounty of one hundred and fifty dollars to each inhabitant who should enlist within ten days (25th July) as a volunteer in the United States service for three years, unless sooner discharged, under the call of the Governor, as per general order No. 26, to be paid on being mustered in; volunteers for one year to be paid one hundred dollars; and nineteen thousand dollars was appropriated for the purpose.

Upon the spur of this incentive a second company was speedily raised, which was mustered into the service Aug. 12, 1862, as Company H, Thirty-fifth Regiment of Massachusetts Volunteers. Benjamin F. Pratt was chosen captain, who was promoted through the several grades of the service, and at the close of the war was breveted as brigadier-general. This regiment and the Twelfth saw very hard service in the Army of the Potomac, and their losses were very severe. On the 19th of August the town extended this offer to all who should enlist in the town's quota, whether inhabitants or not.

Town Bonds and Seal.—On the 4th of November fifteen thousand dollars was appropriated for aid to the families of soldiers who were inhabitants of the town when enlisted. At the same time it was voted to issue town bonds not exceeding thirty thousand dollars at five per cent., and March 24, 1863, the selectmen were instructed to procure a corporate seal, with the legend, "Town of Weymouth, Mass., Incorporated."

porated 1635," for the use of the town, upon its bonds and other documents, which was accordingly done.

In the fall of that year a company of nine months' men were enlisted, and mustered into the service September 13th, as Company A, Forty-second Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers, under the command of Col. Burrell. Hiram S. Coburn was chosen its captain.

On the 21st of July, 1863, the town voted three dollars per week for aid to the families of volunteers for one year, to fill up the town's quota, in addition to the sum paid by the State, and the same amount for a second year, provided they continue in the service so long; and on November 23d one thousand dollars was placed at the disposal of the recruiting committee, who were to receive no pay for their services.

Contributions.—At the annual meeting, March 21, 1864, the town voted to raise twenty-five thousand dollars for State aid, and subsequently, April 9th, it was voted to refund the contributions made by citizens for filling the town's quota of men under the calls of the President, October 14th, and February 1st, provided the contributors agree in writing to apply the same towards furnishing the men called for March 14, 1864; and six thousand five hundred dollars was appropriated for the purpose. The recruiting committee were also instructed to solicit subscriptions of money, to be used in raising men to fill the present quota. On the 20th of May ten thousand dollars were voted for recruiting under the last call.

Difficulties.—On the 8th of June the town voted to pay one hundred and twenty-five dollars to each volunteer recruited under any call of the President this year, or in anticipation of any future call, this enlistment to be made under the direction of the chairman of the board of selectmen. There seemed at this time to be great difficulty in answering the calls of the President, and so serious was the emergency that the selectmen resigned in a body, but were afterwards persuaded to withdraw their resignations. It appeared, also, that the town was justified in making serious complaint of the manner in which the enrollment of those liable to military duty was made, as appears by the following resolves: "That the enrollment of this town is fully 20 per cent. larger than the average towns in the district, large numbers of whom are unfit to be enrolled, and that the town request an equitable enrollment. That the town believes their selectmen and assessors to compare favorably with those of neighboring towns, and feels aggrieved that they should have been entirely ignored in the matter of enrollment, while those of other towns have been appointed to that duty."

As the time approached for the expiration of the term of service of the Twelfth Regiment, the selectmen were directed to proceed to Boston and receive Company H of that regiment, and to invite those members of the Eleventh Regiment, who enlisted from this town, to assist in this duty. In the summer and autumn of this year a fourth company was enlisted for one year, and mustered in as Company G, Fourth Heavy Artillery. Many of these were re-enlistments of members of the Twelfth, Thirty-fifth, and other regiments whose terms of service had expired. This company was stationed upon the fortifications near Washington and saw but little active service.

On the 8th of November the town appropriated twelve thousand dollars for bounties, not to exceed one hundred and twenty-five dollars to each man counted in Weymouth's quota under the next call. March 20, 1865, the town voted to borrow thirty thousand dollars on its bonds at six per cent., to be sold as required; and on the 22d of May the town voted to refund the money contributed by individuals to aid in filling the quota of the town in accordance with the law of April 25th of this year; a list to be prepared and payment to be made in town notes, due Sept. 1, 1866. On the 21st of December a committee was chosen to consider the subject of a soldiers' monument and report. A vote was also passed to pay two years' aid to all who had not received it; also, to pay each man drafted July, 1863, who furnished a substitute, whether the latter remained in the service or not, payable in town notes in three years with interest.

This completes the record in brief of Weymouth during the war as far as it appears upon its books; but before a correct judgment can be formed as to what the town actually did in the great struggle for existence that the country carried on during the four years from 1861 to 1865, it will be necessary to go somewhat more into detail, and to ascertain more nearly the number of men sent into the field and what became of them. It is well known that the town answered all of the calls made upon it, but what was their measure? As before noticed, there were enlisted four full companies; these were sent into the service and performed all the duties required of them, which in many instances were neither few nor light; besides these, enlistments were made for all the various branches of the service, infantry, artillery, and cavalry, in more than fifty different organizations, as well as many in the navy. The whole number actually contributed by the town probably will never be accurately known, but upon its records are the names of nearly eight hundred; without question enough have been omitted to carry the total above that number, or nearly one in ten of its population.

Of these, ninety-eight have their names upon the soldiers' monument as having been killed in battle or died in the service. Besides these, and this list is by no means complete, more than a hundred are reported as wounded, and nearly forty taken prisoners, many of whom died in rebel prisons. And of the whole number, only eight, less than one in a hundred, are reported as deserters, and some of these returned to their regiments. This certainly is an honorable record and one of which the town may well be proud; and when the history of Weymouth in the Rebellion is written, which will some day be a fact, it will be made sure that this town is entitled to a high place among the thousands that contributed cheerfully and liberally towards the accomplishment of the same noble purpose.

Final Attempt to Divide the Town.—Several attempts were made to revive the question of a division of the town, and March 19, 1866, a vote was actually passed to do this (two hundred and sixty-nine to two hundred and thirty-nine) upon the northerly line of the fifth and sixth school districts, and a committee of one appointed from each district to carry the vote into effect; but the matter appears to have been dropped, to be again called up March 4, 1878, when the selectmen and three from each ward, twenty in all, were constituted a committee to take the whole matter into consideration and report. This report was made at the next annual meeting, held March 3, 1879, and was unanimous that it was inexpedient to divide the town at that time, and the report was accepted.

Soldiers' Monument.—After various votes and appropriations, a soldiers' monument was erected upon Burying Hill, in the old North Cemetery, upon the easterly side of the highway, consisting of a plain granite obelisk, suitably commemorating the names and services of those who perished in the Rebellion in defense of their country, and was dedicated in 1868.

On the 21st of March, 1870, it was voted to divide the town into five wards, for convenience in carrying on the necessary public business. This was accordingly done, and it remains thus to the present day. In 1871, March 6th, the first appropriation was made for the celebration of Memorial day, and the vote has been annually repeated ever since.

The Two Hundred and Fiftieth Anniversary.—At the annual meeting held March 2, 1874, a committee was chosen to make arrangements to celebrate the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the settlement of the town, and the same committee was also authorized to engage some one to prepare and publish a history of the town. The first vote was carried into effect on the 4th of July of that year, by a public meeting upon King Oak Hill, with appropriate services, among which was an historical address by Charles Francis Adams, Jr., Esq., whose great-grandmother, Abigail Smith, wife of John Adams, second President of the United States, inferior to none of the honorable women mentioned in the national history, was born and reared within a short distance of the spot where the address was delivered. The occasion was one of great interest, being the second of the kind held in Massachusetts, and was celebrated with much enthusiasm by a large number of the citizens of this and other towns, who were cordially invited to the entertainment.

Water Question.—The last important business found upon the town records is upon the question of supplying the town with water from Great Pond. Many and urgent had been the calls demanding this or some other means by which the inhabitants and the rapidly growing necessities of the town should be furnished with an ample supply of water. Efforts were put forward to that end, and a charter was obtained from the Legislature of 1882-83, of sufficient powers to cover the undertaking. On the 18th of September, 1883, a town-meeting was called, at which it was voted, by a large majority, to accept the water act, and on the 25th of the same month a board of water commissioners was chosen, and instructed to cause to be made thorough surveys and estimates of all work and costs proposed by the act, and to make a report of the same at a special meeting to be called for the purpose. This, one of the most important enterprises ever undertaken by the town, has not reached its present stage without violent opposition. The unfortunate situation of the town in respect to its various villages, with their often conflicting interests, and the jealousies occasioned thereby, has shown itself in this matter, as in nearly every important movement that has ever been proposed, and its success, however much it may be desired, is not yet assured. (The final action assuring it has since been taken.)

Fire Department.—Until quite recently the town, officially, had made no attempt to afford its citizens protection against fire. What had been done was the work of volunteer companies, or of fire districts in which the town government had no part. A half century or more ago a small hand-engine, called the "Aquarius," manned by a company of volunteers, was located at Weymouth Landing, which was for many years the only protection against fire, other than the primitive hand and bucket arrangement. Some twenty years later several fire districts were erected in town, and hand-engines provided for them. At that time the town attempted some action in the same direction, and went so far as to choose a committee to purchase four engines and the necessary apparatus to go with them, for the four principal villages. This was April 29, 1844; but on the following May 7th this vote was rescinded, and the matter remained in its previous condition until March 5, 1877, when a committee of three from each ward was chosen to organize "a fire department." In accordance with the report of this committee, the town, on the 15th of May, voted to purchase 3 fire-engines, hose-carriages, etc., 2 hook-and-ladder trucks, and 1500 feet of hose. Also to build 3 engine-houses and construct 5 reservoirs, appropriating $18,000 therefor. On the 30th of January, 1878, a vote was passed making a further appropriation of $1100 for another hand-engine. On May 2d, $2000 was voted for an engine and hose-carriage. In March, 1880, a steam fire-engine was purchased for Ward 3, at a cost of $3200, and in 1883, $4200 was appropriated for a steamer for Ward 2. Thus it will be seen that the town has made a beginning in this important matter, which only needs to be supplemented by the introduction of water from Great Pond, as proposed by recent votes, or from some other source, to afford really effective protection.

Growth of the Town.—It may be of interest to note the gradual growth of the town expenses from the beginning, when almost every separate item was voted upon in open town-meeting, and there were almost no general appropriations, until the present time, when the annual expenditure of the town is not far from $100,000. On the 23d May, 1751, is noted the first general appropriation for the poor, amounting to £20. The highways were provided for by personal labor, and it was not until after the year 1800 that anything like regular, stated appropriations were made. Beginning with the year 1820, the average sums appropriated for expenses, other than schools and highways, were for the ten years from 1820 to 1830, about $1400; for the succeeding decade, from 1830 to 1840, about $2000; from 1840 to 1850, about $4000, an increase of 100 per cent.; from 1850 to 1860, about $7000; from 1860 to 1870, about $15,000; and from 1870 to 1880, about $25,000, an increase in half a century of nearly 1800 per cent., while the increase of population was but little more than 400 per cent.

The expenditure for schools, aside from the buildings, beginning at about $100, had risen in the year 1800 to about $500. From 1800 to 1810, the yearly average was about $700; from 1810 to 1820, about $1000; from 1820 to 1830, about $1000 to $1200 (in 1821 there were 895 children of school age); from 1830 to 1840, from $1200 to $2000; from 1840 to 1850, from $2500 to $3500 (in 1842 there were 1099 children of school age); from 1850 to 1860, from $3500 to $7000; from 1860 to 1870, from $8500 to $15,000; from 1870 to 1880, from $20,000 to $26,000, an increase since 1821 of 2500 per cent., while the number of school children had increased but about 125 per cent. (the census of 1880 showing 2028 children of school age).

The increase of population for the first century and a half was very small indeed, the estimate for 1643 being about 1000. The next estimate is from the Egerton manuscript in the British Museum, and dates about 1675, in which the number of houses set down for Weymouth, in round numbers, is 250; allowing 5 to a house, this would give a population of 1250. In 1750 the estimate was 1200. A census in 1765 showed 1258, while that of 1776 indicated 1471, and in 1790 this had declined to 1469. In 1800 quite a gain was shown in a total of 1803. The following ten years there was an increase of but 86, while in 1820 the number had increased to 2407. From this time the gain was rapid, the census of 1830 giving a population of 2837, while that of 1840 was 3738, and that of 1850 stood at 5369. The succeeding ten years showed an increase of over 40 per cent., giving a total of 7742. In 1870 the population was 9010, and in 1880, 10,570, a gain in the present century of almost 500 per cent.

The appraised value of the real property was in 1853, $1,138,999; and of the personal, $619,483; a total of $1,758,482. In 1875 the real estate was valued at $3,863,523; and the personal, $2,107,711; a total of $5,971,234. This was the last State valuation.

These statistics show, in a comparative degree, the wonderful development of the town in material resources, and also its rapid progress in mechanical pursuits, while the indications are not wanting that promise a long continuance of its prosperity.

CHAPTER XLIX.

WEYMOUTH—(Continued).

Ecclesiastical History—Congregational Churches—The First Church.

The First Church.—There is no record of the organization of this church. It is simply recognized by its name at the earliest mention as an established institution well known to contemporaneous writers. It has already been stated that with the Gorges Company, in 1623, came Rev. William Morrell, a clergyman of good reputation in the Church of England, of culture and learning; that he remained in the plantation for perhaps a year and a half and then gave up his charge, returning to England by way of Plymouth. He was an amiable gentleman of refinement and remarkable discretion, well suited to have the charge of an English parish, but scarcely adapted to the needs of a New England settlement at that day. Mr. Morrell brought with him a commission from the Ecclesiastical Court in England to exercise a kind of superintendency over the churches already existing or which might be established here. This commission was to empower him with authority over all churches in the colony, and as "all" meant only Plymouth, over which he was hardly in a position to claim jurisdiction, he obeyed the dictates of his good sense and refrained from any attempt to exercise his authority.

The conditions under which the settlement at Weymouth was made rendered it unnecessary to organize a parish, for it already existed as a matter of fact, and the church was a branch of the Church of England in this remote corner of its kingdom; and evidently to the care of his parish Mr. Morrell devoted himself so long as he remained. The religious element does not seem to have been predominant in this settlement, and the surroundings and influences being such as to give but little promise of future benefit, Mr. Morrell returned to his own country, leaving the remnant of his flock to the mercy of circumstances. In the following year, 1624, according to "Prince's Annals," which, from the facilities in the hands of the compiler, seems fairly conclusive, there came in another company, to join the planters at Wessaguscus, from Weymouth, England. These were probably a mixed party, with the independent element predominant, since it is stated that they brought with them a non-conformist minister by the name of Barnard, who remained with them until his death. Nothing more is known of him or of his administration over this people. There was no need to organize a church, since one after the Episcopal form already existed. It simply changed its "rector" for a "minister." There was no need even to throw off the authority of the bishop, since there was no officer of that order to claim the rule, and thus for a dozen years the affairs remained, the continual influx of planters of various religious ideas preventing, probably, any very decided opinions from becoming predominant.

There was unquestionably some kind of a house of worship erected, but probably a rude, temporary structure, corresponding to the dwellings of the people. No mention, however, is made of this, which in a few years was replaced by a more convenient and substantial building erected upon Burying Hill.

In the summer of 1635 a large addition was made to the little settlement by the arrival of a company of about a hundred people, under the leadership of Rev. Joseph Hull, sailing from Weymouth, England, but gathered from the county of Somerset and the neighborhood. Mr. Hull came in the interest of the Episcopacy, being a graduate of Oxford of 1612, and as recently as 1632 rector of Northleigh, Devon, but finding that the condition of the plantation was such as hardly to justify an attempt to establish the Episcopal form of worship in the immediate vicinity of so many dissenters, and probably with a leaning in the latter direction himself, he fell in with the current and became a moderate dissenter. There having been no minister here since the death of Mr. Barnard, the situation seemed favorable for the selection of Mr. Hull to fill that office, and he undoubtedly preached here for a time as minister of the church, but other elements were at work which soon developed themselves as an opposition. There were remnants of the Gorges Company still favoring their old order, while there were many new-comers from Dorchester, Boston, and other places who favored the Puritans and the authority of Governor Winthrop; these later seem to have been a strong party and were evidently dissatisfied with Mr. Hull, for they soon gave a call to Mr. Thomas Jenner, of Roxbury, who, in the early part of 1636, came into the settlement and became its minister, while Mr. Hull seems to have removed temporarily to Hingham.

There does not appear to have been the utmost harmony among the inhabitants, for in the following year a council of the elders was called to "reconcile the difference between Mr. Jenner and his people," and the difficulty was so serious that the Governor and his Council were compelled to step in and arrange matters. This trouble offered a favorable opportunity for a third party to throw itself into the breach in the hope of becoming possessors of the field. These, in 1637, gave an invitation to Rev. Robert Lenthal to become their minister. Mr. Lenthal had recently come from England, where many of the Weymouth people had been under his ministry; hence the invitation, which he did not hesitate to accept. He, also, remained here for several years, but was in constant trouble and difficulty, and in 1639 was tried before a council held in Dorchester for heresy, but the result was unsatisfactory, as it settled nothing. An attempt seems to have been made at this time to form another church, the difficulty was so great, but without success.

The Weymouth Church then, in 1638-39, found itself in this position: Mr. Hull claimed to be the minister, and occasionally exercised the office, with a strong body of adherents. Mr. Jenner still remained, with the official favor to sustain him; while Mr. Lenthal preached as circumstances would permit, and had a large following. This condition of things in a village no larger than Weymouth of that date could not be supported, and in the latter year, 1639, Rev. Samuel Newman, a graduate of Oxford of 1620, and a man of excellent reputation, was invited to come in as a harmonizer. How this was to be effected does not now appear; nevertheless he came, and there was displayed the extraordinary phenomenon, for those days, of four ministers of the same denomination contending for a single pulpit in one small community. This, however, did not continue, for Mr. Hull and Mr. Lenthal retired in 1639, and Mr. Jenner in 1640, leaving Mr. Newman in possession; but the conflicting elements were too many and discordant for his peaceable nature, and after a ministry of about four years, he, with a large body of his friends, removed to Rehoboth, leaving the church without a pastor.

He was succeeded by Rev. Thomas Thacher, who was settled 2d January, 1644, and remained pastor of the church for twenty years, when he removed to Boston, and was afterwards installed as the first pastor of the Third Church (Old South). He was the first minister ordained in Weymouth, all of his predecessors having received their ordination in England. He had an excellent reputation as a preacher, and was also an able physician, a man of talent and education. Under his ministrations the people, by whom he was beloved and revered, enjoyed a long period of rest and prosperity, very pleasant after the vexations of the previous ten years.

During the pastorate of Mr. Thacher the old meeting-house, which stood upon Burying Hill, on the westerly side of the present highway, and nearly opposite the site of the soldiers' monument, had become so much in need of repairs that the townsmen, Dec. 14, 1652, were directed "to do what was necessary to make it more comfortable and prevent any further decay." In the early days of the town, until it was divided in 1723 into two precincts, it constituted one precinct, and all parish business was transacted in town-meeting. The minister was hired and his maintenance provided by the town, and as it possessed at this time no parsonage, the minister provided his own dwelling, which, upon his leaving, was purchased by the town and sold to his successor, with the condition that should he leave or die without children, the town should have the privilege of buying the property.

Mr. Thacher was followed in the ministry by Rev. Samuel Torrey, who was ordained Feb. 14, 1665. Rev. Emerson Davis says he preached there from 1656, as colleague of Mr. Thacher. He was certainly there Nov. 28, 1664. Mr. Torrey was son of Capt. Wm. Torrey; born in England, in 1632; educated at Harvard College, but owing to an extension of the course of study for a year he, with some of his associates, became dissatisfied and left the institution without graduation. He remained pastor of the church in Weymouth until his death, April 21, 1707, a period of over forty-two years. He was a man of great and acknowledged ability, of excellent reputation as a preacher, and in 1684 was chosen president of Harvard College, which position he declined. Three times he preached the election sermon, an honor never before conferred.

In 1667 the meeting-house was again repaired, and a bell procured and hung. Up to the year 1671, although there is much upon the records concerning the minister's rates and providing for his maintenance, there is no amount stated for his salary. This year the matter was thoroughly discussed and arrangements were made to pay Mr. Torrey fifty pounds per year, and five members of the precinct became bound for its payment, ten pounds per man. This was to be paid in money, or its equivalent of eighty pounds in current pay. In 1673 ten pounds in wood (twenty cords) was added, and in 1680 his salary was increased ten pounds. In 1682 the meeting-house had become so old and decayed that the town voted to pull it down, and a new one was erected upon land bought of Capt. John Holbrook, the site of the present meeting-house. This house was forty-five feet by forty, and twenty feet between joints, with four gable-ends, costing, in all, two hundred and eighty pounds. In 1697-98 the town voted an addition of twelve pounds to the minister's salary.

After the death of Mr. Torrey a call was given to Mr. Peter Thacher, of Boston, a grandson of Rev. Thomas Thacher, the former minister, at a salary of seventy pounds and a "convenient settlement." It was a custom of those days to grant the minister upon his settlement a certain sum to pay his expense of removal or "setting up housekeeping," equal usually to one or more years' salary. This did not appear to be quite satisfactory, and the sum was increased ten pounds, with his fire-wood added. This call was accepted, and Mr. Thacher was ordained Nov. 26, 1707. He was a popular preacher and very highly esteemed by his people, among whom he lived in great harmony until 1718, when a prospect of a call to Boston introduced a disturbing element, in consequence of which he was dismissed, and afterwards settled, as colleague of Rev. Mr. Webb, over the North Church, Boston. He was a graduate of Harvard of 1696. His manner of leaving Weymouth was very unsatisfactory, and the cause of much ill-feeling against him on that account. During the ministry of Mr. Thacher the town purchased a parsonage for the minister, of Zachariah Bicknell, which has been a permanent establishment in the parish since that time.

On March 27, 1719, the town concurred with the church in a call given February 26th to Mr. Thomas Paine, of Barnstable, to be their minister upon a salary of ninety pounds and the use of the parsonage. He was ordained Aug. 19, 1719. He remained the pastor until April 15, 1734, when he was dismissed. It was during his ministry, in 1723, that the south part of the town was set off as the Second Precinct. This withdrew a large part of the population and property, so that it was with great difficulty that the parish expenses were met, and in consequence much trouble arose with Mr. Paine during the later years of his service, which was eventually the cause of his leaving. For several years his family had resided in Boston while he performed his official duties in Weymouth. Mr. Paine graduated at Harvard in 1717, and was, in point of ability and acquirements, the equal of any of his predecessors, with the possible exception of Mr. Torrey. He was of a kind and amiable disposition, and won the affection of his people to a remarkable degree, and had it not been for the unfortunate pecuniary condition of the parish there would have been no occasion for his leaving.

In August, 1634, after the dismissal of Mr. Paine, a call was extended to Mr. William Smith, of Charlestown, to become the minister, at a salary of one hundred and sixty pounds and three hundred pounds settlement, the latter to be paid one hundred pounds annually for three years, all in bills of credit. This invitation was accepted, and the first Wednesday of December he was ordained as pastor of the First Church and Parish in Weymouth, which office he retained until his death, 17th September, 1783, in his seventy-seventh year. He was a graduate of Harvard of 1725. The following epitaph upon his gravestone gives, probably, a correct estimate of his character: "As a Divine he was eminent As a Preacher of the Gospel eloquent and devotional in life he exhibited the Virtues of the Religion which he had taught in Death felt its Supports and closed a long and useful life with hopes full of immortality." Prepossessing and conciliatory, he soon became a favorite, especially among the young. He was lively and animated as a speaker, and through his long ministry of nearly forty-nine years—the longest on the record of the church—he was highly esteemed and beloved. He, however, is best known as the father of three daughters, who married three men all of whom became eminent. Hon. Richard Cranch married Mary, the eldest; Abigail became the wife of John Adams, the second President of the United States, and was the mother of John Quincy Adams, the sixth President; the third daughter, Elizabeth, married Rev. John Shaw, of Haverhill, a man of standing and reputation.

He was minister through the Revolutionary war with its stirring scenes, and died just as the day of peace was dawning upon the land. The difficulties of the times, with a divided town and a fluctuating currency, made it often hard to raise the amount necessary for his support, and the records are largely filled with endeavors to arrange this matter. At the commencement of his ministry, in its second year, he had a long and severe sickness, which disabled him from service for the time, and later on, in 1769 and 1770, he was again disabled by the same cause, and for several months his pulpit was supplied by James Blake, A.B., of Dorchester, a graduate of Harvard of 1769, a young man of rare excellence and promise, who came to Weymouth to teach school, and, after a little time, supplied the pulpit during the illness of Mr. Smith, in which position he died, 17th November, 1771, within a month of his twenty-first birthday. A volume of his sermons was afterwards published.

On the 23d of April, 1751, a great disaster befell the parish in the loss of its meeting-house by fire. The loss was a severe and heavy one for the people at that time, especially as the parish was passing through the most fatal epidemic that has ever been known in the history of the town, one in ten of the population perishing with the terrible "throat distemper," among others Maj. Adam Cushing, the foremost man of his day in town and in the parish. They were not discouraged, however, but set to work with energy and determination, and within a year a new house was ready for use, which was occupied by the parish eighty years. It was with the commencement of Mr. Smith's ministry that the earliest records now in possession of the church had their beginning, and these are exceedingly meagre, other than the noting of statistics, admissions to the church and baptisms, with a few marriages and deaths.

After the death of Mr. Smith there was a vacancy in the ministry for more than four and one-half years, when from various causes they were unable to obtain a pastor. Rev. Huntingdon Porter preached for a time in the year after Mr. Smith's decease. On the 24th of May, 1784, the parish voted a call to Mr. Samuel Shuttlesworth, of Dedham, in which the church concurred, but, after supplying the pulpit until August 1st, he declined the position. On the 22d of November the parish voted unanimously to invite Mr. Asa Packard, of Bridgewater, to become their minister, but he also declined.

Ever since the division of the town into two precincts there had been trouble between them concerning the parsonage property, which culminated in a suit, in 1785, by the South Parish for claimed rights, which were denied by the North. The issue of the contest was in favor of the latter. During the summer and fall of that year Rev. Mr. Judson supplied the pulpit, but on the 16th of January of the following year (1786) the parish made choice of Mr. Israel Evans to fill the vacancy in the pastorate. This invitation he accepted under date of 24th of March, but some unfortunate reports reaching his ear before settlement, he felt obliged to decline, which he did in a letter dated 26th of September. Soon after this Mr. Jacob Norton was hired to preach, and on the 12th of March, 1787, the committee was instructed to engage him for a further time. His ministrations proved so acceptable that on the 9th of April it was voted to give him a call, at a salary of ninety pounds per year, his fire-wood and two hundred pounds settlement, fifty pounds per year for four years (the latter instead of parsonage, which had been first voted). Mr. Norton accepted the call, and was ordained 10th of October, 1787. He was a graduate of Harvard of 1785 or 1786, a man of strong mental powers, with thorough intellectual training, and a keen controversialist. He excelled as a classical scholar, and had a high reputation as a Hebraist. During his ministry he was frequently engaged in theological discussions, which he sustained with great learning and ability. He was, however, changeable in his religious belief, particularly during the later years of his ministry, which was the cause of great trouble in the church and parish, and eventually led to a dissolution of the pastoral relation, which took place 10th of July, 1824, after a service of nearly thirty-seven years. He was a man of irreproachable character, and highly esteemed for his amiable qualities.

On the 23d of August, 1824, a hearty call was extended to Rev. Josiah Bent, Jr., of Milton, by the parish to become pastor, at a salary of six hundred dollars and his fire-wood. This call he accepted, and he was ordained Oct. 13, 1824, to the pastorate of the First Church of Weymouth, which position he held until Oct. 10, 1833. His ministry was a very successful one, one hundred and twenty-nine persons having united with the church during the nine years. While Mr. Bent was the pastor of the church the meeting-house, having become old and out of repair, was taken down in 1832 and a new one erected upon the same spot, which, with some important changes, has been occupied by the parish until the present time. This is the third meeting-house built upon this spot. Mr. Bent was a graduate of Harvard of 1822, a man of deep piety, in excellent standing among his associates, and holding a warm place in the affections of his people.

After the dismission of Mr. Bent, Mr. John C. Phillips, of Boston, was employed to preach during the month of November, 1833, which he did with such effect that a unanimous call was given him by parish and church, at a salary of seven hundred dollars per year, which he promptly accepted, and was ordained on the 18th of December, 1833. He remained pastor until Nov. 13, 1837, a ministry of a little over four years, the shortest in the history of the church since the settlement of Rev. Samuel Newman, about two hundred years before. Mr. Phillips was a graduate of Harvard of 1826, and of Andover Theological Seminary. He also completed a full course of legal study with Hon. Samuel Hubbard, judge of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts. He was a fine scholar, a strong thinker, and a close reasoner. His rare social powers made him a general favorite, and it was with deep regret to his many friends that circumstances compelled him to ask his dismission.

The interval was very short after Mr. Phillips left until the call to Rev. Joshua Emery, Jr., of Fitchburg, Jan. 2, 1838, at a salary of eight hundred dollars per annum. He accepted the invitation, and was installed on the 25th of the same month. This is the first installation unaccompanied by ordination in the history of the church for two hundred years. His pastorate extended until April 1, 1873, a period of over thirty-five years, when he was dismissed at his own request, feeling with the advance of years that the burden of the parish was too great for his strength. His ministry was a long and successful one, during which one hundred and eighty-five were admitted to the church. He was a forcible and energetic speaker, especially gifted in prayer, and the estimation in which he was held by his people may be measured by the length of his pastorate. He was also a valuable citizen, being strongly interested in education, for many years the chairman of the school committee, performing at times nearly the whole duties of the board. At the beginning of his service the parish built a new parsonage house, that now used for the purpose, upon the site of the old house, some parts of which had stood there for one hundred and fifty years. During many years the social meetings of the church had been held in the hall of the school-house, opposite the meeting-house, for want of a chapel or vestry, a need that was greatly felt, and which was provided for in 1856 by the erection of a neat and commodious chapel by the church, and attached to the rear of the meeting-house, with which it communicated.

On the 28th of July, 1873, the parish concurred in the unanimous call of the church to Rev. F. P. Chapin as pastor, at a salary of fourteen hundred dollars and the use of the parsonage. This call was accepted, and Mr. Chapin was accordingly installed, and remains in the pastoral office to the present time. An important event in the history of the parish took place in 1875, when it fell heir to a legacy of ten thousand dollars, for the "support and maintaining of the present religious doctrines of the parish," by the will of Mr. Joseph Loud, lately deceased, who for many years was an active member of the church and parish, and who thus gave substantial evidence of his good will.

This ancient church has suffered greatly from circumstances beyond its control; first, in the establishment of the Second Church, in 1723, its hundredth birth-year, whereby a large number of its active supporters were withdrawn; and again, in 1811, upon the formation of the Union Church of Weymouth and Braintree, a large part of whose members came from this church. Still later, in 1822, its membership was once more greatly depleted by the withdrawal of many to form a Methodist Church in East Weymouth; and last, in 1852, the most serious loss of all, in the removal of fifty-one members to form the Pilgrim Church in Old Spain. Thus the mother has been exhausting her resources and impoverishing herself in the establishment of a family of vigorous and prosperous children; but it has been at a serious cost to her, since the removal of so many members, and the decline of business in the village near, has reduced it from the one only church in the town to the smallest of six of the same fellowship. Yet she still keeps on her way and bravely sustains the burden that is thus cast upon her, doing her work with diligence and fidelity.

The Second Congregational Church and Parish in South Weymouth.—The causes that led to the separation of the town into two precincts, and the formation of the Second Church, have been already alluded to. The long distance and poor roads, with other causes of dissatisfaction, gave rise to the determination of the dwellers at the South to separate, while the opposition, steady and persistent, on the part of the old parish and church, served only to solidify the determination, which resulted, in 1723, in an act of the Legislature established the Second Precinct, and on the 21st of June the parish met and organized. On the 15th of July a call was given to Mr. James Bayley, to settle with them, at a salary of seventy-six pounds, and a settlement of one hundred and thirty pounds. A church, however, was not formed until the following 18th of September. A meeting-house had already been erected, and Mr. Bayley had been preaching there probably for a year or more. He accepted the call, and was ordained Sept. 26, 1723, as pastor over this people, and remained such until his death, Aug. 22, 1766, a period of forty-three years. He was a native of Roxbury, a graduate of Harvard of 1719, and served his first and only pastorate in Weymouth. During his extended ministry there were added to the church in all two hundred and seven persons. He seems to have been much beloved by his people, and was held in estimation by the neighboring parishes.

After the death of Mr. Bayley, on the 15th of January, 1767, Mr. Ephraim Briggs received a call from the parish, in concurrence with the church, to become their minister, but with so strong opposition that he declined. Through that season the pulpit was supplied by five different ministers, each preaching several Sabbaths in succession, and in March, 1768, a call was given to a Mr. Fuller which was declined, after which Mr. Simeon Williams, of Raynham, preached for several months and then received a call which he accepted, and was ordained Oct. 26, 1768.

Here he remained until May 31, 1819, the date of his death. He was born in Eaton, and was a graduate of New Jersey College of 1765. His ministry extended over a period of more than fifty-one years, the longest ever recorded in the town. In 1784 and 1785, the old meeting-house was torn down and a new one erected.

Upon the repeated request of Mr. Williams for a junior pastor, on Dec. 14, 1818, the church called Mr. William Tyler to that position, and on the 24th of February following he was ordained, but the death of Mr. Williams, so soon after, left him sole pastor. Mr. Tyler remained as pastor of this people until Oct. 17, 1831, when he was dismissed at his own request, after a ministry of nearly thirteen years. For more than a year the church was without a pastor, and on Nov. 8, 1832, a call was extended to Rev. Charles I. Warren, who accepted the invitation and was installed Jan. 1, 1833, but, after a brief pastorate of little more than a year and a half, he was dismissed Aug. 13, 1834, at his own urgent request and much to the regret of his people. It was four years after this before the office was again filled, and this period was one of great trouble that nearly proved fatal to the church. The difficulty was so serious that on account of religious differences the church seceded from the parish, worshiping in a hall, and a new society, the Edwards Society, was organized. The breach, however, was healed in 1837, and the church and parish united in the old meeting-house, although an unsuccessful attempt had been made to form another church. During the separation, a call had been extended to Rev. Joshua Emery, Jr., which he declined. In 1836, the society gave Rev. Mr. Biscoe a call, which he also declined. After the reunion of the church and society, in August, 1838, Rev. Wales Lewis received a call, which he accepted, and was installed on the 12th of September. During his ministry there was serious trouble which increased to such a degree as in the end to cause his dismissal, which took place in June, 1847, after a pastorate of about nine years. During the troubles in the pastorate of Mr. Lewis, in 1842, and as a consequence to them, a strong party drew off and formed the Union Church and society, which became a permanent organization.

After the dismissal of Mr. Lewis Rev. Joshua Leavett preached for a time, and an effort was made to give him a call, but without success. There was felt very great discouragement as to their future prospects, which gave way to a feeling of hope when Rev. James P. Terry accepted their call, and was installed July 6, 1848. Matters at once began to assume a more cheering aspect, so much so that in the year of his settlement the present parsonage house was built for the benefit of the parish, and about five years later, in 1853, the present meeting-house was erected at a cost of about fifteen thousand dollars, and the church and society stood once more upon firm ground. In February, 1868, Mr. Terry's health gave way, and he was obliged to suspend his ministrations. He was granted leave of absence for six months, during which time the people worshiped with the Union Church, under Rev. S. H. Hayes. In March of the following year, 1869, finding that his health did not improve, Mr. Terry felt obliged to ask to be relieved from his pastoral relation, and his request was reluctantly granted.

About the same time a plan for a union of the two societies and churches was arranged and an agreement made to adopt it, but it failed to be carried into execution. Rev. Dr. Labaree preached for about a year and a half, when the present pastor, Rev. George F. Stanton, began his work here. He received a call to settle with this people, which he accepted, and was installed 27th October, 1870, and it was in the third year of his ministry that the church and society celebrated their one hundred and fiftieth anniversary, with appropriate services, amid much rejoicing. The church is yet strong and vigorous, notwithstanding the years it has survived and the struggles it has encountered, and bids fair to live far into the future.

The Union Religious Society of Weymouth and Braintree.—This society and the church connected with it, although its meeting-house is located a few rods over the line in Braintree, is comprised so largely of Weymouth people that it fairly deserves a place in this record. Its members were drawn mainly from the first churches of Weymouth and Braintree, who, on account of the considerable distance of those two meeting-houses and the increasing importance of the village of Weymouth Landing, coming from a rapid influx of population and the commencement of business enterprises, desired better accommodations for religious services. The society was formed March 13, 1810, and the Hollis Street Church, Boston, then about to be taken down, was purchased, its material removed by vessel to its present location in East Braintree, where it was rebuilt, and, with many alterations, remains still as the house of worship of the people. The society was incorporated 21st February, 1811, and a church organized August 14th of the same year. A call was at once given to Mr. John Frost, who declined it. In the following November, Mr. Daniel A. Clark was invited to a settlement. He accepted the invitation, and was ordained on the following 31st of December. After a short pastorate (less than two years), owing to the disaffection of a few members of the church and congregation and a difficulty in raising his salary, Mr. Clark resigned, and was dismissed 20th October, 1813. After a year or more of financial distress, during which the pulpit was supplied from Sabbath to Sabbath, in January, 1815, Mr. Jonas Perkins, of Bridgewater, was hired for three months, and before that time had expired he was given a call, which was accepted, and he was ordained June 14th of that year. After a long and prosperous ministry of forty-six years, at the age of seventy, in accordance with long-expressed plans, he resigned his pastorate, and the connection was severed 15th October, 1860. He remained in the village, taking an active interest in the affairs of his old church until his death, which occurred June 26, 1874. After the resignation of Mr. Perkins a call was extended to Rev. E. Porter Dyer, of Hingham, Sept. 28, 1860, which he declined. In the following December, Rev. Lysander Dickerman, of Gloucester, was invited to the vacant pulpit, which invitation he accepted, and he was installed Jan. 17, 1861. After a very stormy pastorate of about six and a half years, during a part of which a bitter quarrel existed between the pastor and about half of the congregation, which in the end seriously threatened the very existence of the church and society, his official connection with them closed in July, 1867. The results of this quarrel were very disastrous, so that they had no pastor for about two years, when matters began to assume a better aspect, and April 1, 1868, Rev. A. A. Elsworth, of Milford, was hired to supply the pulpit, which he did very acceptably for about three years. After this time, affairs having been somewhat accommodated and extensive alterations made in the meeting-house, a hearty call was extended to Rev. Lucien H. Frary, of Middleton. This call was accepted, and Mr. Frary was installed April 13, 1875. He is now in the eighth year of his ministry, with a united people and a strong and prosperous society, that has, through his exertions, just relieved itself from a heavy debt incurred in the remodeling of the house, and which had seriously crippled it in its work.

Union Church and Society of South Weymouth.

—As before stated, the organization of this church and society grew out of the trouble in the Second Parish, from which the members of the new organization withdrew. The society was formed June 20, 1842, and the church November 1st of the same year. The meetings were first held in Rogers' Hall, until a meeting-house could be erected, which was effected the same year. On the 3d of July, 1843, a call was extended to Rev. George Denham, which he accepted, and he was installed November 1st. This connection was held until May, 1847, when he was dismissed. On the following 17th of November, Rev. Willard M. Harding, having accepted a call, was installed, and continued his ministry until 1858, when he resigned, and was dismissed April 8th by a council, which installed as his successor Rev. S. H. Hayes, who retained his position as pastor over that people until Nov. 17, 1870, when he asked and received his dismission. From February, 1871, to September, the pulpit was supplied by Rev. Henry E. Cooley. During the years 1870 and 1871, a new meeting-house was erected, at a cost of forty thousand dollars, and a parsonage at a cost of four thousand dollars. A call was extended to Rev. James McLean, which he accepted, and was installed February 27, 1872. He was dismissed May 29, 1876. Rev. George N. Marden followed him as acting pastor, from February, 1877, to August, 1881. On the 1st of September of the latter year, a call was extended to Rev. William H. Bolster, which he accepted, and was installed April 12, 1882. He is the present pastor.

The Congregational Church of East Weymouth.

—This church was formed from a division in the Methodist Episcopal Church, a majority of the society remaining and forming a new church, called the First Evangelical Methodist Church, the minority retaining the old organization and building a new house of worship. This church was formed March 4, 1843, with ten members. In 1860, February 25th, it changed from the Methodist to the Congregational form, and joined the Norfolk Conference of that denomination. It is now, numerically, the strongest church of that order in the town. It has been obliged to enlarge its meeting-house, to accommodate the increased call for sittings. Its congregation is an enterprising and prosperous one, and its list of pastors, notwithstanding its comparatively recent date, is altogether too long to be here enumerated. It has also a large Sabbath-school connected with it. When the old society divided, the meeting-house was sold and torn down, and a new one erected upon the same spot, which remains to-day, with the enlargement above mentioned.

The Pilgrim Church and Society of North Weymouth.

—The growing necessities of the prosperous village of Old Spain were the cause of the movement that resulted in these organizations. The society was formed May 14, 1851, and a meeting-house erected the same year. The church was organized March 11, 1852. In May of the same year, Rev. Calvin Terry was called to be the first pastor. He accepted the call, and was installed May 18, 1852.

This connection was a very unfortunate one, on account of long continued and great dissensions with the pastor, who, after much trouble and difficulty, was dismissed Dec. 25, 1856. On Sept. 14, 1857, Rev. Charles E. Reed, of Taunton, was invited to the pastorate, but declined. In the spring of 1858, Rev. Samuel L. Rockwood accepted a call, and was installed March 12th. His ministry continued until July 31, 1871, when he was dismissed at his own request, on account of ill health. He was succeeded by Rev. Louis B. Voorhees, who was ordained December 6th, same year, and continued his ministry until his resignation was accepted, July 1, 1876. On the 23d of November following, Rev. George Dodson, having accepted a call, was installed, and remained pastor until Dec. 23, 1879, when ill health compelled him to resign the active duties of his office. Rev. A. H. Tyler commenced his services as acting pastor May 17, 1880, and resigned in the spring of 1884. In 1881 a parsonage was built.

The Methodist Episcopal Church of East Weymouth.—The first movement looking to the formation of a Methodist Church in East Weymouth was made in 1822. The trouble in the old North Church, consequent upon the changes in religious belief of Mr. Norton, the inconvenient distance from meeting, and the fact that a large portion of the people were gradually becoming restive under the severe Calvinistic creed then held by the two churches in town, induced a desire for more freedom in religious thought and belief. The first class was organized in 1823, and the new society erected its first meeting-house in 1825. The rapid growth of the parish necessitated an enlargement of this building, which was made in 1828. During the first ten years of its existence not far from one hundred members were received from the North Parish. About this time trouble began to show itself, and the desire to be removed from the higher authority of the Methodist Episcopal government to return to the ancient freedom of the Congregational Church caused a majority of the people to separate from the Conference and continue their organization as a Protestant Methodist Church. The minority, who preferred their original form, withdrew and formed a new society, retaining the old name. They built their first meeting-house in 1844, and such was the increase that they were obliged to enlarge the building in 1850. This house was destroyed by fire 13th December, 1851, and, with its contents, was a total loss. This was a heavy blow, from which, however, it soon rallied, and another house was erected in the following year, dedicated October 12th. This becoming too contracted for the growing necessities of the society, was enlarged in 1864. This building was also burned 23d February, 1870. Another, and the present, house of worship was erected on Broad Street the same year, and dedicated December 23d. It has free sittings. The church belongs to the New England Southern Conference. The society has also a fine parsonage, built in 1867. The present membership of the church is about two hundred and sixty. It has been from its organization an energetic church, and the centre of good influences. It has also a large and flourishing Sabbath-school.

The Methodist Episcopal Church at Lovell's Corner.—The initial steps towards the formation of this church were taken in the autumn of 1866, in recognition of a long-felt need of that growing and prosperous village, when Rev. D. W. Waldron, pastor of the Congregational Church at East Weymouth, began there on Sabbath afternoons a preaching service (at five o'clock). This was continued as long as he remained pastor of the East Weymouth Church, and for about a year after. During the latter time the neighboring ministers preached there in turn. After this a regular pulpit-supply was obtained until a Congregational Church was formed, on the last Thursday in October, 1872. Rev. Joseph C. Halliday, the first pastor, commenced his work there on the first Sabbath of the following December, and held the position until July, 1877, nearly five years. From that time until November of the same year there was no regular minister. In that month Rev. Henry P. Haylett, a student of Boston University (Methodist Episcopal), was engaged. During his pastorate the church changed its denominational connection and united with the New Bedford Methodist Episcopal Conference in April, 1879, and in April, 1882, it was transferred to the New England Southern Conference of the same denomination, where it still remains. Mr. Haylett was succeeded May 1, 1880, by Rev. Charles H. Farnsworth, who in turn gave place, in the following year, to Rev. E. G. Babcock, the present pastor. A Sabbath-school was gathered by the efforts of Rev. Mr. Waldron, in the spring of 1867, which has continued an active existence in connection with the work of the church ever since. This church has no meeting-house, but has held its services in a hall.

The First Universalist Society of Weymouth.—This society was organized at Weymouth Landing July 21, 1836, in consequence of a desire on the part of many of the people of that village, then the largest in the town, for a wider privilege in the interpretation of the Bible than the belief of the Union Church would permit. Rev. Matthew Hale Smith was hired to preach once a fortnight in Wales' Hall. A movement was soon made towards the building of a meeting-house with such success that a house was finished at a cost of six thousand four hundred dollars, including land, bell, and furniture, and was dedicated Sept. 13, 1839. Mr. Calvin Gardner preached on the next and three following Sabbaths. Rev. John S. Barry was the pastor from November, 1839, to April 1, 1841. He was succeeded at once by Rev. John M. Spear, who remained until April, 1845, when he closed his service, and was followed by Rev. Mr. Coffin until November of the same year, when Rev. Mr. Dennis supplied the pulpit. In 1846, Rev. Mr. Barry returned, and remained as minister until Jan. 1, 1850. He was then succeeded by Rev. Mr. Hemphill and others, for about two years, when Rev. D. P. Livermore was hired, and remained about two years. After him Rev. Mr. Davenport preached for a year, whose successor was Rev. Charles Mellen, who remained from April, 1855, to April, 1860, when the pulpit was supplied for a year and a half by Rev. D. T. Goddard. Following him there was no regular minister until April, 1864, when Rev. Miss Olympia Brown was engaged, and held the position until September, 1869. After an interval of two years, Rev. B. Davis became pastor, and continued in that position from October, 1871, to April, 1873,—a year and a half. Rev. L. S. Crosley was the next pastor, beginning his service November, 1876, and closing March, 1878. The next pastor, Rev. Anson Titus, Jr., began his work November, 1878, and ended April, 1883, having charge also for the greater part of the time, first of the church in Old Spain, and then of that in South Weymouth. This society still worships in its original meeting-house on Washington Street, and its present pastor, recently engaged, is Rev. B. F. Eaton, who has the charge also of the West Scituate Society.

The Second Universalist Society of South Weymouth.—The first services in the Universalist faith in South Weymouth were held in Columbian Hall in 1835, during the trouble in the Second Congregational Church, when Rev. Sylvanus Cobb preached for a time. There was then no organization, the movement meeting with bitter opposition, and it was not until 1848 that an association was formed known as the "Washington Corporation," out of which grew the Second Universalist Society. Rev. John Parker, the first regularly settled pastor, was installed in 1849, and remained in that service for six years. During his pastorate a chapel was erected, in 1850.

The next pastor, Rev. Elmer E. Hewitt, was installed on Sunday evening, July 8, 1855, and retained his position for more than fourteen years, when he was succeeded by Rev. Jacob Baker, who was installed in 1869. His term of service extended over a period of nine years, to 1878, since which time there have been several pastors,—Revs. E. A. Perry, Anson Titus, B. F. Bowles, the present pastor, and others.

The Third Universalist Society of North Weymouth.—This society was organized Nov. 19, 1853, and a Sabbath-school gathered on the succeeding fast-day. The first minister was Rev. R. L. Killam, of Scituate, who commenced April 1, 1855, preaching on alternate Sabbaths in Harmonial Hall. His term of service continued for three years. During the next year only evening services were held, conducted by different clergymen, after which Rev. E. H. Hawes, of Stoughton, supplied the pulpit on alternate Sabbaths for one year, beginning May 1, 1859, and Rev. R. L. Killam for the summer following.

During the ten succeeding years the services were conducted by clergymen of Weymouth and the neighboring towns. Rev. G. W. Skinner, of Quincy, was the next preacher, his work dating from April 1, 1871, and continuing one year, when he was followed by Rev. G. W. Whitney, of Quincy, who was pastor from April 1, 1872, to July 1, 1878. During his ministry a chapel was erected, which was dedicated Jan. 16, 1873, and a church of twenty-two members was formed June 28, 1874. Mr. Whitney was succeeded by Rev. Anson Titus, Jr., of Weymouth Landing, who preached from September, 1878, to July 1, 1880, when he resigned his position. Rev. E. A. Perry was pastor from the latter date to April 1, 1882, the present pastor, Rev. R. T. Sawyer, of Quincy, commencing his labors on September 3d of the same year.

The First Baptist Church and Society in Weymouth.—The first movement towards a union of the members of the Baptist denomination and those favoring its belief, for some kind of associated effort on behalf of their special views, in the village of Weymouth Landing, was made in the years 1851–52, in the establishment of a regular weekly prayer-meeting, and, also, of a sewing circle, the proceeds of whose labors were devoted to the renting of Union Hall, where preaching services were held as often as circumstances would permit by the Baptist ministers of the neighboring towns. After a little more than a year arrangements were made with Messrs. Leander P. Gurney and Noah Fullerton, of the South Abington Church, for regular preaching on the Sabbath; and, on the 13th of March, of the same year, a Sabbath-school was commenced. This state of things soon produced the desire for a church, which was formed on Feb. 7, 1854, but it was not until June 21, 1855, that the society was organized and the congregation became fully equipped for its work. Rev. H. C. Coombs, of Middleborough, supplied the pulpit for a few weeks, when it was placed under the care of Rev. Henry Fitz, missionary of the State Convention, and its preachers were mainly from the Newton Theological Seminary. The first pastor was Rev. Andrew Dunn, of Bridgewater, who commenced his labors April 1, 1855, and a chapel was erected, which was dedicated on July 12th. Mr. Dunn remained as pastor of the church until Jan. 31, 1858, and was succeeded on May 1st by Rev. Levi A. Abbott, of Milford, who continued with the people for five years, until the end of May, 1863. On Nov. 1, 1863, Rev. Gideon Cole, of Sheldonville, having accepted a call commenced his work in this place. During his pastorate a new meeting-house was built on Washington and Broad Streets, nearly opposite the chapel, and dedicated Jan. 31, 1866. Mr. Cole was succeeded in the spring of 1871 by Rev. C. H. Rowe, who was followed in the autumn of 1874 by Rev. W. C. Wright. He remained in the pastorate about four years, when he was dismissed, and a call extended to Rev. P. A. Nordell was accepted, who began work in the spring of 1878, which he continued until 1882, when he resigned, and was succeeded by Rev. Seth J. Axtell, the present pastor.

Roman Catholic.—The Parish of St. Francis Xavier was the first parish of this denomination, and embraced territorially the whole town. The first priests of the parish were Rev. Fathers Roddan and Lynch, who came to the town in 1851, and the first services were held in East Weymouth that same year, in private houses. After a few months the place of worship was changed and services were held in Tirrell's Hall, at Weymouth Landing. In 1854, Rev. Father Roach took charge of the parish, but it was not until 1859 that the first church was erected, which was located upon Middle Street, not far below the town hall. Father Roach was succeeded, in 1866, by Rev. Father Hennigan, who remained until 1869, and in the fall of that year the church was burned. Rev. Father Smyth followed Father Hennigan in 1869, and soon after the church on Pleasant Street was erected, in 1870. In 1873, the Parish of the Sacred Heart was constituted at the Landing, the tavern property purchased and services held in the hall of the building. In 1876, a church of brick and stone was begun, which, when completed, will be the costliest church edifice in the vicinity. The basement was soon finished and occupied, and the audience-room of the church itself has been in use for a year or two.

The Parish of the Immaculate Conception, at East Weymouth, was formed, and a church built in 1879, dedicated November 23d. In 1881, a parish was constituted in Old Spain, called the Parish of Saint Jerome, and a church erected. Rev. Father Smyth had charge of all these parishes (with one or more assistants) until 1882, when Rev. Father Millrick was placed over the Parishes of the Immaculate Conception and Saint Jerome, Father Smyth retaining the other two until 1883, when he was succeeded by Rev. Father Murphy, the present incumbent.

Episcopalian—The Trinity Church at Weymouth Landing.—This parish was organized Nov. 11, 1867, at the time and in consequence of the trouble in the Union Congregational Church, in connection with the Rev. S. Dickerman. Services had been held in Williams' Hall, as early as July 7th of that year. On September 10th, the homestead of the late Atherton W. Tilden, on Front Street, was purchased, and the house reconstructed into a church. These changes were completed, and the first service held there Dec. 8, 1867, but the church was not consecrated until May 21, 1874. From March 4th to July 1st of that year, 1867, Rev. S. R. Slack, of South Boston, was the officiating clergyman, when Rev. Mr. Burroughs was called to the rectorship, which he resigned Oct. 1, 1868, and was succeeded in December by Rev. T. W. Street, who in turn gave way to Rev. F. O. Barstow, December, 1869. He was followed in June, 1870, by Rev. W. F. Lhoyd, who resigned in 1873, and was succeeded by Rev. William C. Winslow, who remained but one year. The next rector was Rev. Samuel R. Slack, in June, 1874, who retained that position until April 12, 1877, when he resigned, and was followed by Rev. John A. Jerome, who occupied the position until March, 1883. In November, of this year, Rev. Charles L. Wells became officiating clergyman.

CHAPTER LI.

WEYMOUTH—(Continued).

Educational Institutions—Public Schools—Weymouth and Braintree Academy—Newspapers—Weymouth Historical Society—Social Libraries—Mutual Library Associations—Tufts' Library.

NEXT in importance to the ecclesiastical interests come those of education, of which the public schools form the prominent feature; and for these the town has always taken special care. In the early days of its history the records are exceedingly brief, and only slight and incidental mention is made of many things of which now there is great need of fuller information. The first notice of matters connected with schools occurs on March 10, 1651, when the town voted to pay Capt. Perkins ten pounds for six months schooling. Capt. William Perkins was a prominent man in town in those days, being "townsman," and probably held other important offices. In subsequent history it was found that it was to men of this character that the town intrusted the education of its children.

It is a singular fact, and one which shows that the interest of the town in education was not confined to its own borders, that the second mention should be that of a subscription of ten pounds, sixteen shillings, and sixpence by Weymouth to Cambridge College, in 1652. After Capt. Perkins, the next schoolmaster named is William Chard, who was also town clerk, and attended to the drawing up of such legal instruments as the necessities of the people demanded. He is first mentioned in that capacity April 10, 1667, where the town voted him three pounds and ten shillings, the rent of the flats in addition to his other pay. On the 25th of August thirty shillings was also added. On Nov. 29, 1669, he was engaged at ten pounds per year, probably employed only a portion of the time. He was also sexton, and the pay of both offices was sometimes included in one vote. On Sept. 18, 1678, his pay had advanced to twenty-four pounds, and the town was to furnish a school-room. The selectmen with the elders were also "to rate each pay-scholar for his benefit." The next year a house and orchard were rented for him at forty-five shillings, and in 1680 the house of James Stewart was bought for forty pounds for the use of the schoolmaster; this was to be paid for by subscription, which failed, and a tax was laid for it. In the following year, 1681, a school-house was built on a part of the land bought of Capt. John Holbrook, the other part of which was afterwards occupied by the new meeting-house erected in 1682. The house with the furnishing cost thirty-six pounds. In 1684 Mr. Chard's salary was advanced to thirty-three pounds and fourteen shillings. His duties were "to keep a free-school and teach all children and servants sent to him to read, write, and cast accounts."

On Nov. 28, 1687, for some reason the town voted "not to continue Mr. Chard in the work of a public schoolmaster at the public charge, but he is at liberty to use the dwelling and school-house until next March meeting, for which he is to ring the bell and sweep the meeting-house." Probably this was for want of funds, as he was in office during the year 1689, and continued a town schoolmaster until 1696, when he removed to Abington. Mr. John Copp was appointed to succeed him at thirty pounds per year, and he was also chosen town clerk the same year. Mr. Copp does not appear to have remained in his position quite two years. At the March meeting, 1697, the town voted that "parents shall pay three shillings for each child sent to school between the ages of eight and fourteen years." This was to pay in part the schoolmaster's salary, the remainder to be made up by a tax upon all who lived within two miles of the school-house. By this time the increase of scholars was so large that the town found it necessary to employ more teachers, and Joseph Dyer was employed to teach in the school-house, with John King as assistant, and Edward Bate was to teach in his own house. To follow the precedent, now well established, Edward Bate was elected town clerk. The pay of schoolmaster was to be not over thirty pounds, one-third of which was to be paid by those who sent their children to school and the remainder by tax. The next year the whole was raised by tax, and John Torrey was employed, probably, in the place of John King, as Edward Bate still retained his position the following year, 1699, and later Torrey appears as Bate's assistant.

During the summer of 1700, five women were engaged to teach school for six months at twenty-five shillings each, besides the usual rate paid by those who sent children. On the 21st of October of that year Samuel Hunt, son of Col. Hunt, was hired as schoolmaster at £15 10s. in money for six months, or twenty-three pounds "as the rates run." In January, 1705, Ebenezer White, of Dorchester, was appointed schoolmaster for half a year at fifteen pounds, and on March 3, 1707, Thomas Thornton was engaged at twenty-five pounds, of fifteen pennyweights each (silver). To him, in 1709, succeeded John Torrey at fifty shillings per month. In 1717 school was kept in each school-house four months, and it seemed that now there was a school-house in the south part of the town. John Galt was teacher for a part of this year. In September, 1719, Ebenezer Rolie was hired for a year at £42 10s., and Mr. Calder in 1723, at the same price. And this year, 1723, a new school-house was built at a cost of £42 7s. 11d., between Joseph Lovell's and John Shaw's. Mr. Calder taught two months here, and two months in the North school-house. In 1729 it was voted that the South Precinct should have a school one-third of the year, and be at the charge of having a school-house, and the North two-thirds of the year. In May, 1730, Joseph Torrey was hired as schoolmaster at fifty pounds.

After the division of the town into two precincts, a large part of the school business was transacted at the precinct meeting, the town appropriating money and dividing it between them according to the amount paid by each. The appropriations commencing in 1733, at seventy-five pounds, had risen, in 1800, to five hundred dollars. A new school-house was built by the North Precinct in 1730, where the old one stood near the meeting-house, and Ezra Whitmarsh was the schoolmaster. He was a graduate of Harvard, also town clerk and selectman, one of the fathers of the town. He continued his position as schoolmaster until 1760, teaching sometimes in one precinct and sometimes in the other, according to the various votes of the town. During this time the precincts maintained their separate woman's schools. In 1760 the name of David Wyre appears upon the record as schoolmaster, and in 1769 and 1770, Mr. Lemuel Cushing taught for about a year. Mr. James Blake, A.B., also taught a few months about this time. The necessities of the times during the Revolutionary war rendered the raising of money very difficult, and probably the school interest among others suffered in consequence. There is no other teacher mentioned by name until Dec. 11, 1780, when Samuel Reed was engaged to teach in the North Precinct, "at his offer," six shillings per week in money, "or its equivalent in necessities at prices before the war." Jan. 24, 1785, Nathaniel Bayley, Esq., was appointed to answer to the General Court on behalf of the town for neglecting to keep a grammar school; thus it appears that the town had become a delinquent in this matter, but the lesson was a good one and did not need to be repeated.

After the close of the war prosperity began to dawn upon the town; the schools soon felt the impetus, and new houses were built and new schools established in various parts. Samuel Reed and James Humphrey (3d) were employed at two pounds per week, and the latter to have three shillings per week extra, "he having been at the expense of fitting himself for a grammar-school teacher." Both of these were men of mark in town as well as schoolmasters, having been town clerks, selectmen, and also village notaries. Both held long terms of service as school-teachers, with excellent reputation.

In 1796, the school system, which had been sufficient for the needs of the town in its earlier days, was found to be greatly wanting, and a committee was chosen to take the whole subject into consideration and report a new plan. This was done, and in 1799 the town was divided into eight school districts, substantially as it remained for seventy years. Each district was to furnish its school-house and teacher, paying its expenses from its proportion of the school money raised by the town. The business was to be in the charge of a prudential committee-man selected by the district, but chosen by the town. The school money was divided, sometimes according to the number of families, sometimes according to the number of scholars, and sometimes according to the amount of tax paid, but more generally, a part equally, and a part according to the number of scholars.

In 1810, the employment of "Latin and Greek" masters was authorized, and also "English masters who shall teach equivalent to twelve months in the year." In 1814 each district was ordered to report in detail to the town. In 1816, the "alleviate money" was appropriated for school purposes. In 1821, a census reported four hundred and thirty-four families and eight hundred and ninety-five scholars. In 1827 the town chose a committee of seven under a new State law, to have the oversight of the schools, or the general charge and superintendency of them. This was called the High Committee. They examined and approved the teachers, and kept a close watch upon the schools to see that they were properly taught. This system was retained until the abolition of the district system, in 1869, when this committee became the school committee, combining its former powers with those of the prudential committee. The High Committee reported to the town at its annual March meeting, and in 1839 these reports began their publication. In 1842, a second enumeration of the children of school age showed ten hundred and ninety-nine, an increase of over two hundred and four in twenty-one years. In 1845 the Fourth District was divided, and the Ninth set off from it. In 1847 the Tenth District was set off from the Second, and several years later the Eleventh was taken from the Eighth. Various minor changes were made in process of time, but this arrangement was that substantially kept until 1869.

Attempts were made at various times looking to the establishment of a high school, but without success until about 1852, when the town hall was built, in which a room was fitted up for that purpose, but it was not until the next year that the town directed the school committee to go forward, appropriating one thousand dollars for the purpose. For several years it was a matter of some doubt whether or not the school would succeed on account of the exceeding inconvenience of its location, being far away from nearly all of the scholars. Experiments were made, trying one school at the town house for a time, and then changing to two schools, one at the North and one at the South, and it was not until 1865 that the present arrangement was permanently adopted, that of having one school in each of the two sections.

In 1859 the town voted to abolish the district system and appointed a committee to take the necessary measures to carry the vote into effect, but the following year a return to the old system was made. Again, in 1863 the same thing was voted, and in the next year rescinded. Thus the matter remained in uncertainty until 1869, when the old arrangement was set aside and the present town system finally adopted. The same indefinite attitude was taken by the town with respect to the employment of a school superintendent. The first one was hired in 1863, and from that time to the present, although a superintendent has been employed for the greater portion of the time, so many changes have been made and so uncertain the action that might be taken, that little benefit has been derived from the services of that officer.

The treatment of the schools by the town seems at last to have settled down upon a more permanent basis that bids fair to continue, and which will raise the schools to a much higher plane than they have ever occupied. The town system appears to have little if any opposition, and the superintendency seems also to have become an established fact. That this is the true course is very evident, from the fact that the town has now 48 schools in operation, under the charge of 54 teachers, with a school population of 2006, between the ages of five and fifteen years, according to the report of the year 1883, necessitating an appropriation of not far from $32,000. Of the schools 2 are high, 12 grammar, 20 intermediate, and 14 primary.

Weymouth and Braintree Academy.—Feeling the need of a higher seminary of learning than any that had been sustained hitherto in the town, in the early part of the present century a project was undertaken by some of the prominent citizens of Weymouth Landing for the establishment of an academy of high grade, and an act of incorporation was obtained, dated 28th of February, 1828, in which Cotton Tufts, Joseph Loud, Noah Fifield, and others, were named as incorporators. A suitable building was erected the same year upon land donated for the purpose by Capt. Warren Weston, on the side of the hill a short distance above his dwelling, on the Weymouth and Braintree turnpike, and the institution was begun. The first principal was Thomas or Samuel Gregg, and soon after a Mr. Goodell was furnished him as an assistant. Mr. Gregg remained but a short time, and was succeeded by Samuel Thomas Worcester, afterwards judge, with Miss Mary F. R. Wales as assistant,—this was about the spring of 1830. These were soon married to each other and left the school together. Calvin E. Park, a brother of Professor Park, of Andover, followed Mr. Worcester, and Miss Lucy M. K. Brastow took the place of Miss Wales. Mr. Eldridge succeeded Mr. Park, and was probably the last that taught for the corporation. There were several who attempted private schools in the building, but, like the academy, they were financial failures, and in 1833 the building was sold and converted into a double tenement dwelling-house, having previously been used for a short time by the public schools. The building was burned in 1844.

Newspapers.—As far as information can be obtained, the first attempt at newspaper publishing in the town was made about fifty years ago, by Josiah White, of North Weymouth, an amateur printer with very limited facilities. Only a few numbers were published, and those at irregular intervals. It soon ceased to appear for want of sufficient encouragement. For many years succeeding this Weymouth was without a local press, although occasional attempts were made by publishers of neighboring towns to introduce their own papers here with a slight change in the form and with a local heading. In 1867 the Weymouth Gazette, published by C. G. Easterbrook, made its first appearance, and it has since that time been issued regularly every week. It has made itself a local necessity, and bids fair to become permanent. During the existence of the Gazette, several attempts have been made to introduce rival sheets, the first of these being the Weymouth Courier, which began its publication, in 1876, in East Weymouth, under the charge of Jones & Co. It survived about one year. The Weymouth Advance was the next candidate for the position,—started, in 1877, at East Weymouth, by C. F. David, and had an existence of about two years. Spooner & Webster undertook to resuscitate the latter enterprise, but, after a few weeks, the attempt was abandoned, as was also the effort to revive the Weymouth Courier by Mr. Spooner.

The Weymouth Historical Society.—This society was organized in the spring of 1879, by several gentlemen, for purposes indicated by its name. The growing interest in historical matters and the absence of any history of this ancient and important town encouraged the effort, and its object has been to collect and preserve historical material, mainly that connected with this town. Elias Richards, Esq., has been its president since its formation, and it has succeeded in collecting a valuable amount of historical matter. It has also a small but constantly increasing library of historical works. Its meetings are of much interest and are held monthly in the Tufts' Library Rooms, where also are located its library and other collections.

Social Libraries were formed in several of the villages in the town in the early part of the present century. The shares were owned by the members and the expenses paid by a small annual fee. These proved of great benefit, but the foundations upon which they rested were not calculated for permanence, and in a few years they gradually disappeared. The first permanent organization of the kind was the Mutual Library Association of South Weymouth, formed Nov. 13, 1863, with eighty members, holding about one hundred and thirty-five shares, and a library of four hundred volumes, which has now increased to fifteen hundred. Previous to Dec. 24, 1881, the library was supported by annual fees, fines, and occasional entertainments. Since that date it has been free to the public, depending upon private contributions and extra entertainments for its support. It is well patronized and promises permanence.

The Tufts' Library.—This is a free, public library, located at Weymouth Landing, and was established from a fund left by will, for this purpose, by the late Quincy Tufts, and his sister, Miss Susan Tufts, grandchildren of Dr. Cotton Tufts, one of Weymouth's most valuable citizens during the whole of the latter half of the eighteenth century. The estimated value of the fund is about twenty thousand dollars, and came into possession of the trustees of the Tufts' Library in 1879, who immediately proceeded to apply it to its intended purposes. A part of the fund consisted of two buildings at the Landing, the lower story of one being fitted up for the library, and the income derived from the remainder of the fund devoted to furnishing and sustaining it. Books were purchased and arranged, a librarian engaged, and the library opened to the public the 1st of January of the year 1880, with about two thousand three hundred volumes. Since then the library has been rapidly increased from the income of its funds and from liberal appropriations by the town, until its volumes have reached the number of about seven thousand five hundred (Jan. 1, 1884), and is one of the most valuable and best selected for its size of any in the land. It is highly appreciated and extensively used by almost the whole body of inhabitants of sufficient age; and the call has been so large from the other villages of the town that the trustees have made arrangements by which these can be supplied with the books without expense to the takers, thus making it available to all the people, although it is located in one of the villages. The income of a part of the fund was set apart by the devisee for free lectures upon educational matters, and two courses of these have already been provided. The library is in the control of a board of trustees, consisting of the selectmen of the town, ex officio, and others chosen by the town according to the terms of the legacy.

Military Organizations: Early Companies, Company for the Castle, Weymouth Light-Horse, Weymouth Artillery, Weymouth Light Infantry, Franklin Guards—Grand Army of the Republic: Lincoln Post, No. 40, Reynolds Post, No. 58 —Societies and Associations: Masonic Orphans' Hope Lodge, Delta Lodge, South Shore Commandery, Pentapa Royal Arch Chapter—Odd-Fellows: Crescent Lodge, Wildey Lodge, Wompatuck Encampment—Knights of Pythias: Delphi Lodge—Knights of Honor: Pilgrim Lodge—Weymouth Agricultural and Industrial Society—Other Organizations.

Military Organizations.—Very early, in fact from the beginning of the settlement, the necessities of the times called the attention of the people to military matters. They were obliged to furnish themselves with arms, and to have some kind of organized associations to resist their savage enemies, who were ever on the alert to surprise them. Consequently, among the earliest movements recorded are the formation of military companies and the employment of men "to train" them. The records of Weymouth show its interest and participation in these organizations in the first years of its existence.

As the various wars began and ended this feeling became active or dormant, and new movements were made from time to time, as fresh occasions called for them. Of the earlier organizations nothing very definite is known. In the first century of the colony, Weymouth had its troop of horse, besides its regular enrollment of militia, covering all able-bodied men of military age, formed into companies and officered. This system, if the rude organizations can be dignified by such a term, continued for two hundred years.

Near the close of the first half of the eighteenth century an independent company was formed in Weymouth for service at Castle William, in Boston Harbor, under command of Maj. Adam Cushing. Its officers were Ebenezer White, captain; Ebenezer Porter, lieutenant; and John Porter, ensign; with a roster numbering sixty-six persons, most of whom were young men, from eighteen to twenty-five years of age. A full list of its members is in existence at the present time.

During the latter part of the century the troop of horse was revived, and in 1798 the Weymouth Light-Horse Troop was regularly organized, with John White as its first captain, whose commission dates August 13th of that year. This company held its existence about a dozen years, and included on its rolls a large portion of the active, prominent citizens.

The next organization was the Weymouth Artillery Company, formed in 1801, with Nathaniel Shaw as its first captain, his commission dating October 5th of the same year. This company enjoyed an active life of more than forty years, and was composed of the "first young men" of the town. It disbanded about 1843.

The Weymouth Light Infantry was a local organization, formed at Weymouth Landing in 1818, Levi Bates being its first captain, the date of whose commission is recorded as Feb. 9, 1818. It was composed of the active men of the village, and continued its existence for about fifteen years.

The Franklin Guards, of South Weymouth, was a local organization, as indicated by its name. Its first captain was Samuel P. Bayley, commissioned Feb. 26, 1822. The company was continued for ten or fifteen years.

Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Massachusetts.—Lincoln Post, No. 40, named for our lamented President, was organized Jan. 2, 1868, at North Weymouth, having for its first Commander, Gen. B. F. Pratt, who had previously been a comrade of Post 15, in Boston. In August, 1873, it surrendered its charter and united with Post 58.

Reynolds Post, No. 58, was formed July 14, 1868, and numbered, Dec. 1, 1883, three hundred and nineteen members. It was named in honor of Gen. John F. Reynolds, of the First Army Corps, under whom many of its comrades served. Its first commander was Gen. James L. Bates, and its present, Col. B. S. Lovell. Its charity fund amounts to $13,000; and up to the beginning of 1883, the post had expended, in relief and benefits to sick comrades and to widows and orphans of deceased soldiers, the sum of $6768.83. During its later years the disbursements for these purposes have been about $1000 annually. The funeral expenses of a comrade, to the amount of $50, are borne by the post, in cases where the family or connections of the deceased would find it a burden to provide them. All of the members are uniformed. The post is a most useful organization, and was never more prosperous than at present. Its regular meetings are held on the first and third Tuesdays of each month.

Societies and Associations.—Masonic.—Among the most important associations in the town are the Masonic organizations, of which there are three.

The Orphans' Hope Lodge of Ancient, Free and Accepted Masons was instituted June 8, 1825; the charter was granted to John Edson and others. In 1830, during the Anti-Masonic excitement, the charter was returned to the Grand Lodge, and Sept. 10, 1856, was reissued on petition of Lovell Bicknell and others. John Edson was the first Master and Timothy Gorden the first Secretary. From the return of the charter the lodge has always been in a prosperous condition and never more successful than at the present time. Its meetings were held first at Weymouth Landing, then at North Weymouth, and since at East Weymouth, always in hired apartments; but a new hall is now in process of erection by the lodge in the latter village, and will probably be ready for occupancy in the fall of 1884. The lodge numbers one hundred and sixty-six members.

The Delta Lodge, at Weymouth Landing, was chartered July 2, 1869, by the Grand Lodge; the first meeting having been held on May 12th of the previous year. Edward Avery was the first Worshipful Master; N. F. T. Hunt, Senior Warden; A. S. White, Treasurer; C. G. Thompson, Secretary. The present officers are Alden Bowditch, Worshipful Master; E. E. Richards, Senior Warden; John M. Walsh, Treasurer; Wm. S. Wallace, Secretary.

The South Shore Commandery of Knights Templar was duly constituted by charter Oct. 13, 1871, Z. L. Bicknell, Commander; George Wyman Fay, Generalissimo, and E. Waters Burr, Captain-General. Its place of meeting is at East Weymouth, and its present membership (September, 1883) is one hundred and fifty-three. Its present officers are E. W. H. Bass, Commander; William Fearing, Second Generalissimo; Charles N. Marsh, Recorder; and Andrew J. Garey, Captain-General.

Pentalpa Royal Arch Chapter held its first meeting June 14, 1870, Stephen S. Bradford, High Priest; William Humphrey, King; A. A. Holbrook, Scribe; Samuel A. Bates, Secretary. Its present officers are Francis K. Slack, High Priest; Joel F. Sheppard, King; John M. Walsh, Scribe; William Cushing, Secretary; and its membership is one hundred and twenty-four.

The Independent Order of Odd-Fellows has two lodges in the town.

The Crescent Lodge, No. 32, at East Weymouth, was instituted Aug. 22, 1845. It has received into its membership three hundred and forty-six, of whom forty-five have died.

The Wilcey Lodge, of South Weymouth, was instituted March 9, 1875, with eighteen charter members, and has now a membership of one hundred and eighteen. Its growth has been steady and permanent, and it stands second to none in sustaining the objects of its organization. It has a fine building erected by its members, which, with its furnishing, has cost fifteen thousand dollars. In this building are a hall for the use of the lodge, a public hall, and two stores.

The Wompatuck Encampment, No. 18, was originally organized in Hingham, but surrendered its charter Feb. 2, 1851. It was reinstated at East Weymouth Oct. 27, 1875, at the petition of Stephen Cain and thirteen others, with George W. Pratt, C. P.; A. H. Leonard, Scribe; and K. Chamberlain, Treasurer.

Knights of Pythias.—The Delphi Lodge, No. 15, was organized Dec. 17, 1869, with thirteen charter members, at Weymouth Landing; was burned out Sept. 15, 1870, sustaining a loss of six hundred dollars. The lodge now occupies a fine, new hall, well furnished, and is growing rapidly, with a present membership of one hundred and twelve.

Knights of Honor.—The Pilgrim Lodge, No. 485, at East Weymouth, was organized Feb. 27, 1877, with thirteen charter members; first named "Cooper," in compliment to its first Dictator, but two years after this, for obvious reasons, the name was changed to "Pilgrim." Its growth has been slow but steady, and now numbers sixty members. This is a benevolent association, and pays two thousand dollars to the heirs of each member upon his death. Frank W. Lewis is the present Dictator.

The Weymouth Agricultural and Industrial Society was formed Oct. 31, 1864, for purposes indicated by its name, to promote the interests of agriculture and industry. Its first president was James L. Bates, and its present, Alvah Raymond. It owns about thirty-three acres of land in the southeasterly part of the town, upon which there is a half-mile track, with horse-stables, etc. Its stock is held at ten dollars per share, of which there are about nine hundred, held by four hundred and seventy members. The society holds an annual fair upon its grounds, and is in a prosperous condition.

There are also several other organizations of similar character, among them the Hibernians of East Weymouth, a Council of the Royal Arcanum, at Weymouth Landing, and many temperance associations, Temple of Honor, Reform Club, Good Templars, Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and others, of which fuller mention cannot be made for want of space.

WEYMOUTH—(Continued).

Mills.—Weymouth has always, from its settlement by the English, been noted for its excellent mill privileges. Mill River, from its departure from Great Pond to its mouth at tide-water, abounds with valuable sites which have been improved during almost if not quite its entire history. The mill of William Waltham is mentioned in his will in 1640. In the following January, 1641, a difficulty arose between Henry Waltham, to whom the property had passed, and Wealthean Richards, wife of Thomas Richards, whose husband was absent from the country and had left her in charge of his interest. This was submitted to a reference consisting of Rev. Mr. Newman, James Parker, Esq., and Edward Bates. In 1642, Henry Waltham sold one-half of his grist-mill (the same property) to Joseph Arthur, of Weymouth, England, for one hundred and forty pounds, with other property. In 1651, after the death of Mr. Richards, who seems to have obtained possession of the whole property, the mill was set off to his widow. The town records of that date say it "was on the road to Hingham Plain." This locates it at Back River, below Whitman's Pond. The mill (or mills) seems to have passed into the hands of Elder

Bates, and was used as a grist-, saw-, and fulling-mill, probably in two different buildings and a short distance apart. After several changes the privileges passed into the possession of the Weymouth Iron Company in 1837, which has since improved them.

The Tide-Mill.—As early as 1669 the "tyde-mill" is mentioned. In 1682 it is called "Nash's grist-mill." In 1696, James Nash, the second of the name, left it to his grandson, James Drake, from whom it passed into possession of the Burrells, and soon after, the Webbs, with whom it remained for a hundred or more years. It was used for mill purposes until the present generation. It is now dismantled, and the privilege is not used. Its location was on Mill Cove, on the easterly side of Fore River, and not far from the original Weston settlement.

Tirrell's Mill.—This mill is situated very near the centre of the town, and dates from 1693, when the town granted a permit to Gideon Tirrell to set up a fulling-mill at "blade mill." Whether the latter name refers to the name of the owner or of the kind of a mill previously there is not known. It remained in the family of its original builder until quite recently, when it was bought by J. Loud & Co., and by them sold to Howe & French, the present owners.

Reed's Mill.—Following the course of the stream for about two miles towards its source, where it crosses the old Plymouth road, Reed's mill is found, built probably near the close of the last century by Jeremiah Shaw. It came into the hands of Ezra Reed about 1811, and was used as a grist-mill until 1855, when the present building was erected, which was occupied by E. & C. Sherman as a box-factory for a dozen years. The upper mill was built in 1866, and was used as a saw-mill until 1877, when it was leased to Cyrus Sherman and used for the manufacture of boot- and shoe-lasts, at which business he employs about twelve hands.

Loud's Mill.—This was probably the oldest mill above Tirrell's. It was built near the beginning of the last century, and was known as Sayle's mill. That family is now extinct in the town. At that period quite a village clustered about this mill, of which only the ruined cellars remain. The present mill was erected in 1836 as a grist-mill by Mr. Loud, where, in 1850, he commenced making boxes. He still carries on the business there, employing about ten persons. This mill is a short distance above the Reed Mill.

Vinson's Mill.—This mill, formerly known as Colson's, is located not far from Great Pond, and was erected about 1765. It passed into the hands of Mr. Vinson, and was used as a grist-mill until about 1837, and afterwards for a time as a bucket- and shingle-mill. The property is now owned by Mr. Elon Sherman, and used as a box-factory, with about fifteen workmen. A few years since the old mill was burned and a new one erected. Mr. Sherman has also, within a year or two, commenced the manufacture of paper cartons for shoes.

Dyer's Mill.—This mill is located on Marsh River, on Pleasant Street, and was probably built by William Reed before 1700. In 1716 it is named in the will of John Porter as the "saw-mill." It subsequently passed into the hands of the Dyers, and was used by them as a grist-mill. It has not been used for mill purposes for about fifty or sixty years.

Turnpikes, Railroads, etc.—The primitive means of communication with Boston and other towns was by private conveyance,—horses, ox-wagons, and afterwards carriages,—with the sailing packets, the latter being the main dependence for this purpose. From the earliest times the packet was the favorite, being quicker, cheaper, and more convenient, and was in constant use for more than two hundred years, one or two of them always finding ready employment in passengers and freight. As the roads improved, and the needs of the people became greater, the stage-coach made its appearance and ran regularly between this town and Boston, until the necessity of still better roads for the accommodation of the increasing travel became apparent. Turnpikes were projected in various places, and several were proposed that should pass through Weymouth. The conservative element prevailed so strongly that the town strenuously opposed every attempt to locate one through it, especially those crossing the rivers. Notwithstanding all the endeavors of the town, charters were granted for three.

The Weymouth and Braintree Turnpike, crossing from Weymouth Landing southeasterly to Hingham on the line from Boston to Plymouth, was chartered March 4, 1803, and opened for travel in 1805. This was continued for nearly fifty years, when, owing to the changed condition of things with new modes of conveyance, it was thrown upon the town, July 15, 1852, and became a public road, now known as Washington Street.

A second, the New Bedford Turnpike, obtained a charter 29th February, 1804, and was laid out from the Weymouth and Braintree turnpike, beginning about a mile from the landing, running nearly south to the Abington line, on the route from Boston to New Bedford. The northerly part of the road was never a paying concern, and before many years it lapsed into private hands and is now Main Street.

The Hingham and Quincy Bridge and Turnpike Corporation was chartered 5th March, 1808, and opened for travel, with its two bridges over Fore and Back Rivers connecting Quincy and Hingham, in 1812. These bridges, with their tolls from travelers and tolls to vessels passing through the draws, were a continual source of vexation and contention, which did not cease until the whole property was thrown upon the towns as a public highway, 25th September, 1862.

Railroads.—Succeeding these, and the main cause of their failure, came the railroads; and the same spirit that had opposed the turnpike came forward in great strength against the railroad, and the town opposed every attempt to locate one across its territory, but the genius of progress prevailed, and in March, 1844,

The Old Colony Railroad received its charter, and located its track across the southwest corner of the town from Braintree to Abington, passing a little south of the village of South Weymouth. The road was speedily built, and was opened for travel 10th November, 1845.

The South Shore Railroad soon followed the Old Colony, its charter dating 26th March, 1846, and was opened to the public 1st January, 1849. This road crosses the town near the villages of Weymouth Landing, North Weymouth, and East Weymouth, the principal centres of population and business. It was run at first connecting with the Old Colony at Braintree, and was afterwards hired by the latter. In May, 1877, it was bought by that corporation, and is now one of its branches.

The Express Business has grown in a half-century—at the beginning of which private teams were the only means of transportation aside from the sailing packets—until it numbers a dozen companies, employing scores of men and twice as many horses, requiring not far from sixty thousand dollars of capital.

The Telegraph and the Telephone have also become indispensable to the wants of the inhabitants, several lines of the former running through the town, and the latter being freely used by many business houses. It also is found very convenient for families.

Financial Corporations.—The increase of mercantile business and the springing up of manufactures consequent upon revival of trade at the beginning of the nineteenth century demanded greater financial facilities than were previously enjoyed. In the circles immediately concerned there was not capital enough to do the necessary business, and exchanges were difficult. As the grand panacea for all these evils banks were proposed and established, and Weymouth did not refuse to encourage such enterprises. Consequently

The Union Bank of Weymouth and Braintree was proposed, one hundred thousand dollars capital contributed, an act of incorporation obtained, dated March 17, 1832, and the company organized on the 11th of April, with choice of Josiah Vinton, Jr., as president, and commenced business as soon as the necessary details could be arranged. In 1853 an increase of $50,000 was made to its capital. On Sept. 6, 1864, the bank reorganized under the United States National Banking Act as the Union National Bank of Weymouth, and Jan. 12, 1865, the capital was increased to $300,000; and again, April 12, 1869, another $100,000 was added, making its present capital $400,000. It has a building of its own, and has always been located at Weymouth Landing.

The First National Bank of South Weymouth was organized Oct. 31, 1864, in consequence of the increase of business in that part of the town, and to employ a part of the capital rapidly accumulating there. Hon. B. F. White was its first president, and its capital was $150,000. In 1866 it purchased the building it now occupies.

The Weymouth and Braintree Institution for Savings was incorporated Feb. 16, 1833. The original incorporators named were Asa Webb, Whitecomb Porter, and Warren Weston. It began business the following February, 1834, Dr. Noah Fifield being the first president. By act of Legislature March 19, 1872, its name was changed to Weymouth Savings-Bank. Its assets, Jan. 1, 1883, were $565,432.06.

The South Weymouth Savings-Bank was incorporated March 6, 1868, in the name of Benjamin F. White and others, and commenced business the following month. Its assets amounted to $395,176.20 at the last report.

The East Weymouth Savings-Bank was incorporated in 1872, and began business. On Jan. 1, 1883, its assets were reported at $247,357.56.

The Weymouth and Braintree Mutual Fire Insurance Company was incorporated in 1833. Asa Webb was chosen president; F. A. Kingsbury, secretary; and Ezra Leach, treasurer. After fifty years of active business, it is now closing its affairs.

Manufactures.—For nearly two hundred years Weymouth was eminently an agricultural community. It had fine, large farms, well cultivated and productive. A hundred years ago a much larger proportion of its area was under cultivation than at present, and many of the best farms of that date or earlier are now grown up to wood or bushes. Its dairies were celebrated throughout the State. With the introduction of manufactures a new condition of things was called into existence, and the young men instead of following the occupation of their fathers began to learn trades, and the farms being neglected, the town gradually changed from agriculture to manufactures, and is now almost wholly given up to the latter.

Boots and Shoes.—This interest largely predominates, and employs more men and capital than any other branch of industry. As late as the beginning of the present century there were probably not more than three or four persons who manufactured this class of goods for other than the home market, and those only gave employment to a few apprentices, besides what they could do themselves. These goods were carried to Boston market either upon the backs of the manufacturers, who made the journey on foot, or else in saddle-bags upon horses. The business gradually increased until it became necessary to use wagons to carry in the goods and bring out materials. The beginnings of this trade were at Weymouth Landing, spreading thence to the north and south villages, reaching latest of all the east, which now surpasses all of the others in the magnitude of its business in this line. It was a whole generation before it became necessary to employ a "baggage wagon," the clumsy pioneer of the present express, and the buildings used in carrying on the manufacture would hardly suffice for offices at the present day, the goods being made wholly at the homes of the workmen, nearly all of whom had little shops in or near their dwellings, the work being prepared and packed only, at the factory. As late as 1840, it was a large factory that produced five hundred dollars' worth of goods in the week. About that period South Weymouth received an impetus from its Southern trade (some of its manufacturers having gone to New Orleans and established sales-rooms in that city), which placed it far ahead of its rivals at the Landing and North Weymouth. The increase in the volume of the business was, however, very large in all parts of the town, especially after the opening of California, in 1849; and the large demand from that State for this class of manufactures the town was forward to meet. From these small beginnings the trade has increased until there are now forty establishments, employing upwards of two thousand five hundred persons, and using more than a million dollars of capital. The annual production of the various classes of goods is about four millions of dollars in value. Six or eight of these factories furnish work for one hundred to five hundred people each.

Iron.—In the spring of 1771 iron ore, in sufficient quantities to pay well for gathering, began to be found in the ponds of the town, and a contract was made with Thomas Hobart, of Abington, by a public sale, for the ore found in Great Pond at forty shillings per ton, with an agreement to defend him against any claims for damages that might be advanced by other parties who might contest the town's right to the ore; a committee was also chosen by the town to prosecute any others who should be found taking ore from this pond.

This contract remained in force until the 20th of May, 1773, when a lease was given to Mr. Hobart for thirty years, at sixty pounds per year, for the privilege of taking ore from Great, Whitman's, and Whortlebury Ponds. Ore has been found at various times and places besides, and attempts made to utilize it, but the quantities were so small and the expense of getting it so great that competition with more favored deposits could not be maintained, and the enterprises were abandoned. After the expiration of Mr. Hobart's lease the town appears to have made no other.

The East Weymouth Iron Company is one of the largest manufacturing establishments in the town. It was incorporated 4th March, 1837, with a capital of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, which has since been increased to three hundred thousand dollars. It owns the splendid water privilege at Bank River, at the foot of Whitman's Pond. For many years it was exceedingly prosperous, making enormous dividends. From various causes its business gradually declined, and it ceased for a time to pay a profit, but quite recently its trade has begun to revive and its prospects are again more encouraging. At present it manufactures only nails, and these have a very wide reputation. It employs two hundred and seventy-five men when running full.

Fish Company.—In the early part of the seventeenth century a company was formed by a number of the prominent men of the town for the purpose of carrying on "a fishing trade to Cape Sables," and the town granted to it the use of "so much of Hunt's Hill, with the lowland and beach adjoining, at the mouth of Fore River, as may be necessary for the purpose." As far as the record shows, this was the first joint-stock company formed in the town. Of its history but little is known.

After this, by nearly a century, came the "Weymouth Commercial Company," in 1805, formed for the purpose of carrying on a foreign and domestic trade. This company employed a capital of not far from twenty thousand dollars, the shares of the several stockholders varying from three hundred to three thousand dollars each, Eliphalet Loud, Esq., being the treasurer. It owned several vessels, among which were the ship "Commerce," Capt. Joseph Tirrell, the brig "Adamant," and the schooner "Venus." This company does not appear to have had a prolonged existence.

Ice Companies.—The ice business is carried on to considerable extent, there being several companies in various parts of the town engaged in supplying the local demand, while the "South Boston Ice Company" cuts large quantities for export. The ice-houses of the latter are located at Great Pond, and have a holding capacity of forty thousand tons, from which they ship to Boston about twenty-five thousand tons annually. The season for cutting lasts from four to six weeks, during which the company employs from seventy-five to one hundred and fifty men, and from twenty to thirty horses, the quality of the ice being the finest in the market. The company commenced business here in 1874.

Lumber, Grain, and Coal.—The navigable waters bordering the northern part of the town have ever been improved by the inhabitants as sources of convenience and profit in the transportation of passengers and freight. From the early settlement sailing vessels ran with more or less regularity between this town and Boston, as well as other places about the bay, but it was not until the present century that there began to be anything like commercial adventure. Quite early in the nineteenth century the lumber trade was opened with the Maine ports, and several freights annually came into Fore River. After 1826 the trade increased rapidly, and Weymouth Landing became the market for the lumber traffic of the towns lying to the southward for many miles. The business was carried on with enterprise and success for many years, and was a source of profit to the village, until the opening of the railroads diverted much of this trade to other places. There is still, however, a large business done in this line at the Landing. Following the opening of the lumber traffic the importation of grain from New York and other places was begun, and soon after, coal became a staple commodity. All of these branches of business have been continued until the present, and are now prosecuted largely and successfully by several concerns, who employ large numbers of men and many vessels, and it is no uncommon sight to witness lying at the wharves half a dozen vessels laden with coal and lumber, some of them carrying a freight of four or five hundred tons each.

Among the various industrial interests not before named are the "Bradley Fertilizer Company," formed in 1872, for the purpose of manufacturing various kinds of fertilizers, successors of William L. Bradley, who had previously been engaged in the same business for eleven years. The company owns a large tract of land upon Eastern Neck, the northernmost point on the mainland of Weymouth, upon which they have erected about thirty buildings, with wharves and landings, where they employ about one hundred and seventy-five men, and are manufacturing about sixty thousand tons of their productions in the year. They also own and use the tow-boat "Peter B. Bradley," the largest and strongest in Boston Harbor, with five "lighters," two of three hundred tons each, one of two hundred tons, and two of one hundred tons each; also a brig of three hundred and fifty tons.

Ship Building.—Although Weymouth has been during most of its history largely interested in mercantile marine affairs, owning vessels and furnishing men, yet it has never been largely engaged in the construction of these vessels. About half a century ago a ship-yard was established at Weymouth Landing by Atherton W. Tilden, which he carried on for a few years, and built a number of vessels of various sizes, some of several hundred tons burden. From that time until 1876 but little if anything was done at the business. In the latter year N. Porter Keen commenced the construction of vessels in Old Spain, near Hunt's Hill, and since that time he has built eleven vessels, sail and steam, averaging a cost of about forty thousand dollars each. There is on the stocks at present a large vessel intended for a four-masted schooner (since launched). Mr. Keen employs about thirty men.

The Bay State Hammock Company, Augustus Beals, proprietor, has a factory in "Old Spain." Commenced in 1876, making about two hundred per year, and now produces twenty-five thousand annually, employing about fifty workmen.

Howe and French purchased, about ten years since, the old Tirrell Mill, where they manufacture fish glue, working about five months in the year, and employing about seventy individuals.

Fire-Works.—About the year 1850, Edmund S. Hunt, of this town, began his first experiments in the manufacture of fire-works, but it was not until 1856 that the business was fairly established. Since that time it has been carried on with success, and has a well-earned reputation for the quality and variety of its productions. The factory is at Weymouth Landing, and in the busy season employs about thirty operatives.

Tanning and Currying.—In former days these branches of business were carried on in many small establishments scattered in various parts of the town, but these have nearly all disappeared, and are represented by three concerns, who employ in all from twenty to thirty men. One of these factories, that of W. Humphrey & Co., has been in existence, under various owners, for considerably more than a hundred years.

There are also three firms occupied in extracting the oil from the calf-skin skirtings collected at the boot- and shoe-factories, and in bleaching them. This business employs eight men, and extracts about two tons of grease per week. The work is done at East Weymouth.

At South Weymouth, Clarence A. Hunt has a large factory, in which during the trade season he employs one hundred and twenty hands, mostly girls and young men, in the production of various kinds of mittens and gloves, including all kinds of leather and yarn work, about one hundred dozen being a day's work.

There are also many small manufacturers of different kinds of which space will permit only the mention, among them a furniture factory at North Weymouth, a factory at East Weymouth for the canning of fruits, vegetables, and meats, several stamping and gilding establishments; also others for making heels and counters for boots and shoes.

CHAPTER LIV.

WEYMOUTH—(Continued).

Military Record, 1861-65.—The following record of soldiers sent by the town of Weymouth, Mass., into the Union service during the great Rebellion of 1861-65, with the exception of a few errors corrected by the compiler, is taken chiefly from the town archives, kept in accordance with acts of the Massachusetts Legislature, approved March 7 and April 29, 1863, and is believed to be substantially correct. There are, doubtless, errors and omissions, as it is almost necessary there must be in such compilations, judging from the universal experience of the past. Names are extremely liable to error, since there are so many ways of spelling the same. Dates also are sources of difficulty, as all know who have ever attempted to verify them. Defective memories are exceedingly fruitful in mistakes in matters that are not made the subject of record at the time of their occurrence.

Much care and labor have been bestowed upon this list, yet it claims to be at best but a good basis upon which to rest a full and thorough history of "Weymouth during the Rebellion," and is perhaps sufficiently accurate for ordinary purposes.

A great many of the men here enumerated served in other organizations during the war than that to which they are credited; to name them all would extend the work too much for the general purpose; that here given is usually one in which the first enlistment was made. The rank named is the highest held during the term of service, without regard to the organization in which it was held. When no State is named Massachusetts is understood, and the alphabetical arrangement has been used to facilitate reference. The necessary abbreviations will be readily understood. The name being first given, then the rank, afterwards the branch of service, and last, casualties where any occurred.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

GEN. APPLETON HOWE, M.D.

From the most authentic records we have been able to obtain it appears that the Howe family of America—many of whose members have attained honor and distinction in various walks in life—are descended from the Howes, of Warwickshire, England, where the name has a very honorable record, "two branches at the least having received earldoms, and several having been knighted for meritorious services rendered their sovereign." James Howe, the first American ancestor, was made freeman in 1637, married Elizabeth Dane, of Ipswich, where he spent most of his life; he died 1702. Deacon Abraham Howe—probably a grandson of James—married Lucy Appleton. Their third son was Nathaniel, born 1764. He became a celebrated divine. He was pastor of the Congregational Church, at Hopkinton, Mass., from 1791 to 1830, when he retired from the ministry after an active service of forty years. He died seven years later, aged seventy-three. He was of marked originality of character, Puritan in every fibre of his being, uncompromising in his convictions, with a quaint humorous vein in his composition, he had the faculty of saying original things in an original way that arrested and chained the attention of all. His celebrated "Century Sermon" made his name familiar to the reading public, both of this country and Europe, where it was republished. He married Olive, sixth daughter of Col. John Jones, Jr., of Hopkinton, and granddaughter of Col. John Jones, who came from the Old South Church, Boston, to Hopkinton in 1727.

Gen. Appleton Howe, M.D., son of Rev. Nathaniel and Olive Howe, was born in Hopkinton, Mass., Nov. 26, 1792. He fitted for college at Phillips' Andover Academy. He entered Harvard College, where he availed himself earnestly of every advantage that famous institution could offer, and graduated in class of 1815, receiving the degree of A.B. He was a classmate of Jared Sparks, afterwards president of Harvard College, John G. Palfrey, Dr. Jeffries, Rev. Dr. Hodges, John G. Lowell, Ebenezer Francis, and others who became distinguished in after-years. Upon leaving college he taught school winters, and studied medicine with Drs. John C. Warren and John Ware, two of Boston's most noted physicians. In 1819 he received from Harvard College the degree of M.D., and shortly after received—what is a very unusual thing—a written call, signed by a committee representing the Second Parish of the town of Weymouth, to come and settle there as a medical practitioner. This committee was composed of the leading citizens of the community, and this quaint document is still in possession of Dr. Howe's family. He accepted this "call," and began practice as a physician in what is now the village of South Weymouth, where he was the leading physician and citizen for fifty years, or until the day of his death. He soon became widely known and respected, his many sterling qualities of mind and heart, united with an earnestness in study and application, made him much sought for medical advice, in critical cases, outside his own town. He was for many years president of the Norfolk County Medical Society, was a member of the Massachusetts Medical Society, and also of the Massachusetts Historical Society. He was much interested in military matters, as in all other affairs of public interest, and many military honors were bestowed upon him. In 1839 he was chosen major-general of the First Division Massachusetts Militia, and again under the new law in 1841. He was chosen captain of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company in 1840. He always took a foremost stand in the cause of education, and was chairman of the high school committee many years.

It has been remarked of him that "he was a man whom office and honor sought, he never sought them." He filled many positions of trust. He was an officer in the Weymouth and Braintree Mutual Fire Insurance Company, and was for many years president of the Weymouth Savings-Bank. He was State senator from Norfolk County in 1841-42. He was always one of the foremost to press all needed improvements and reforms. This was true not only in matters of local interest, but in the great questions and measures in which a nation was interested. He always earnestly and zealously espoused and advocated the measures he believed right. He was among the earliest disciples of the anti-slavery movement, and throughout his life was a bitter foe to intemperance and all other vices which tend to degrade and destroy a noble manhood. Dr. Howe was a remarkably strong man physically, mentally, and morally. There was in his make-up a wonderful, persevering energy that would not succumb to or acknowledge defeat. This characteristic marked his boyhood and developed with his manhood. The son of a poor clergyman, he made for himself all the advantage he ever enjoyed. He taught school and earned the money to defray his expenses through college. This done, he taught school and earned the money necessary for the prosecution of his medical studies. Having qualified himself, he practiced that profession with the same earnestness and assiduity that characterized all his undertakings through life. He labored not only to build up a competence for himself and family, but he labored with equal zeal for whatever would benefit his community or mankind at large. Starting in life with an object and purpose, he had the courage to pursue that object, and attain that purpose against all opposing circumstances or temptations. Like most earnest, broad-minded men, he possessed a wonderful personal magnetism. Genial, spontaneous, candid, he had the faculty of winning to him and to his views those with whom he came in contact. He was one who stood in the front rank in that noble army of New England's gallant sons, who, starting in life with only brave hearts, clear heads, and willing hands, carve for themselves a career of honor, and write their names in enduring characters on the scroll of their country's history.

Dr. Howe was twice married, first to Harriet, daughter of Hon. Eliphalet Loud Weymouth. By this marriage there was no issue. His second wife, who survives him, was Eliza, daughter of Joseph Loud, of Weymouth. There were two children, a son, who died in infancy, and a daughter, still living. Dr. Howe died at his home in Weymouth, Oct. 10, 1870.

JAMES TIRRELL.

James, son of James and Hannah (née Kingman) Tirrell, was born in Weymouth, May, 1797, where he resided until his death, Nov. 5, 1865. He was the second son in a family of seven,—Kingman, James, Betsey (Mrs. Richards), Minot, Wilson, Albert, and Mary (Mrs. Vining). The family is traced back to Gideon Tirrell, who settled in Weymouth about 1658, and died Oct. 13, 1730. He was an extensive land-holder, prominent in the affairs of the town and in the church, whose descendants, thirty years ago,—two names excepted,—were believed to constitute the largest number of voters in the town. At the age of eighteen James was left fatherless, and he assumed his father's place in the care of the family. His mother lived to the age of eighty-seven, and died in the Christian faith in 1858. He pursued his business with various success till about 1831, when the firm of James Tirrell & Co., consisting of the three brothers,—James, Minot, and Albert,—was formed for carrying on the boot and shoe business. Minot was early sent to New Orleans, and was soon followed by Albert, who, by energy and economy, succeeded in establishing a successful business. But James was the leading spirit. He was cautious and enterprising. He had means, experience, and the confidence of business men. He was a man of commanding presence, great firmness, and persistent energy. He felt a large interest in the public welfare, and was ready for any movement that commended itself to his judgment. He was early the commander of a company of artillery, which gave him the title of captain, which he wore by an apparent right the rest of his life. For many years he was one of the overseers of the poor. He was one of the founders and directors of the bank in South Weymouth. He was a Whig in politics in the days of Daniel Webster, as were most of his brothers, and great national questions stirred him deeply. He was an active member of the Union Congregational Church, whose welfare was dear to him. He built its first house of worship from his own funds, the society repaying him after the pews were sold; and often when there was a deficit at the end of the year in the parish expenses, he would ask them to raise what money they could, and he would pay the balance. Thus, though his business was in Boston and his days spent there, he was ever thoughtful of home interests, ever helpful to the common welfare, and it cannot be doubted that his personal influence and example encouraged many of his fellow-townsmen to successful enterprise.

He married Betsey Whitmarsh, a most fitting companion, who still survives, surrounded by her children and grandchildren in a pious and serene old age. Their children are Hannah (the constant companion and tender guardian of her mother in her declining years), Tirzah (the wife of Moses T. Durell, and resides in Boston), Alfred (who married Frances Hastings, and early entered upon a successful business career in Boston and New Orleans), Mary Jane (the widow of the late Gen. James L. Bates, of the Massachusetts Twelfth, who did honorable service in the late war), and James (who married Helen Sprague, and while a young man became a member of the firm of J. & A. Tirrell). Two children died young.

NATHANIEL SHAW.

Nathaniel Shaw was born in Weymouth, Mass., Jan. 24, 1804. He was the son of Capt. Nathaniel and Jane (Tirrell) Shaw. Capt. Nathaniel was born in East Abington, Mass., Aug. 5, 1769. Early in life he moved to Weymouth, and became one of the pioneers in what has since grown to be New England's greatest industry, the manufacture of boots and shoes. He was a man of character and integrity, and much respected in the community. His children were Nathaniel (1), Jane (1), Lydia (1), and Oran (1) (all of whom died young), Nathaniel (2) and Jane (2), twins (she married Josiah Torrey and died 1839), Cynthia (married Thomas Reed and died 1878), Theron V. (died 1878), Sophronia (married Thomas White, died 1871), Oran P. and Lydia T., twins (she married Adoniram Vining and is still living in Weymouth). Oran is also still living. Capt. Shaw died Nov. 17, 1835. Mrs. Shaw died Sept. 7, 1833.

Nathaniel Shaw had no exceptional advantages in the way of schooling beyond that furnished by the common schools of his day and locality. At these schools only the rudiments of learning were taught, but many, if not the majority of our practical successful business men were brought up under the same régime, and while they were denied the privileges and pleasures of classic attainments, yet they were sufficiently instructed in the fundamental principles of mathematics and other useful branches to enable them to successfully conduct the various transactions incident to a business life. As soon as Mr. Shaw was old enough to be of practical service in his father's shop he was initiated into the mysteries of the craft, and by the time he had arrived at manhood he had acquired a thorough practical knowledge of the business in all its details. Soon after attaining his majority he came to Boston and engaged as clerk in the store of Joseph Smith, on Hanover Street. On Jan. 20, 1831, he married Emily L., daughter of Eliphalet and Anna (Blanchard) Loud, of Weymouth, and soon after, on account of the ill health of his wife, he returned to his native town and took an interest in the manufacturing establishment of his father. Upon the death of his father (1835) he took entire control of the business, and for some years conducted it alone. He soon developed remarkable tact and energy in the conduct of his business, and rapidly extended his trade until it became, for those days, a large concern. Some time prior to 1849, Theron V. Shaw was admitted to partnership; but this copartnership only continued a few years, when Theron V. withdrew, and Nathaniel conducted the business alone until 1855, when William Appleton Shaw (Nathaniel's eldest son), becoming of age, he and Hon. B. F. White were admitted as partners, under the firm-name of Nathaniel Shaw & Co., and this copartnership continued until Mr. Shaw's death, Feb. 21, 1860. A few years later, Hon. B. F. White, owing to ill health, retired from business and removed to California. Upon his retirement, Theron V. again took an interest in the business, which he retained to the time of his death (1870). Since then William A. Shaw has conducted the business alone.

Nathaniel Shaw was in many respects a remarkable man,—remarkable for energy, courage, perseverance under difficulties, and for the equanimity of temper and courtesy of demeanor which he maintained under all, even the most trying circumstances. He was of a quick, active disposition, with a wonderful facility for the dispatch of business. The large business which he built up from a comparatively small beginning, and conducted successfully through the most trying ordeals, was beset by more than ordinary obstacles and discouragements. At times there seemed an epidemic of failures among his customers, notably during the great panic of 1837, and later, in 1857; but through all his embarrassments and adversities he carried a smiling face, an undaunted heart, and an active, persistent energy that eventually tided him successfully over all difficulties. It was often remarked among his acquaintances that he seemed to "carry sunshine with him wherever he went." Probably no employer ever was more respected or better beloved by his employés. He was the soul of honor and one of the most charitable of men, always looking after the interests and seeking the comforts of the families of those in his employ. He shrank from public notice or public office, and the only office he ever accepted from the people was that of representative to the State Legislature in 1857. He was one of the directors of the Weymouth National Bank. In politics he was a Whig and Republican, and was a strong anti-slavery advocate. He was a warm friend to the temperance movement, and gave a great deal to its support. He was very public-spirited, and many marks of his handiwork are observable in the improvements of his town. He was a regular attendant at the Second Congregational Church at South Weymouth, and was never absent unless on account of illness. He was twice married. By his first marriage there was one child, William Appleton (born Jan. 28, 1832; educated at Braintree Academy and Phillips' Andover Academy; married Harriette P. Reed, April 8, 1858). Mrs. Shaw died Jan. 17, 1833. Mr. Shaw married, as his second wife, Diantha, daughter of Stephen and Susan (Loud) Tirrell, Feb. 18, 1840. She was born Oct. 10, 1817. They had three children,—Emily L., born April 8, 1842, died in infancy; Mary R., born March 23, 1844; and Wendell, born Feb. 1, 1848, educated at Weymouth High School and at select school at Auburndale, Mass., and married Lydia G., daughter of John Urquhart, of Gloucester, Mass. They have two children living, Theron B. and Stacy W. Wendell is a farmer, and resides at the old homestead in Weymouth. Mary R. Shaw is now the wife of Stephen W. Harmon. He was born at Buxton, York Co., Me. After attending the common schools of his town, and also Linnington and Limerick Academies, he fitted for college at Maine State Seminary (now Bates College), at Lewiston, Me. He graduated at Bowdoin College in 1865, and subsequently taught the high school at Saco, Me., the academy at Hampton, N. H., and the Parsonfield Seminary at North Parsonfield, Me. He read law at the office of Wells & Marshall, at Buxton, Me., and was admitted to the bar at Saco, Jan. 18, 1869. The following

March he came to Boston, Mass., and since that time has practiced his profession in the courts of that city.

JOHN S. FOGG.

John S. Fogg, well known as a boot and shoe manufacturer, and also as a prominent banker in Boston, was born in Meredith, N. H., April 16, 1817. He is the son of Josiah and Mary (Roberts) Fogg. His ancestors came originally from the South of England, where large estates are now held by Sir Charles Fogg. Younger brothers of this family came to America about the middle of the seventeenth century, and were among the early settlers of Exeter, N. H. Their progeny went westward, and were pioneers in the settlement of the territory about Meredith. Mr. Fogg's parents removed to Stanstead, Canada, when he was a year and a half old. They were poor, and the only opportunities afforded him for an education were the very limited advantages of the public schools. The winters in that climate being long and severe, prevented a regular attendance at these during the winter months, and in summers the necessities of the family compelled him to be placed at labor as soon as he was old enough for his services to be of any value. The death of his mother when he was only nine years old added to the disadvantages under which he was placed, and this was followed, when in his fourteenth year, by the death of his father, leaving a family of five children, of whom John S. was the elder. The children were now compelled to separate and find homes in different families. Mr. Fogg remained in Canada until his nineteenth year, when he came to Meredith, his native place, and attended school that and the following winter, working on a farm the intermediate summer.

On the 1st day of April, 1836, he started by stage-coach alone for the city of Boston to seek his fortune. At Lowell he saw his first railroad train, boarded it, and that (Monday) afternoon he stepped from the cars in the city of Boston, with scant means in his pocket, with not an acquaintance in the entire city, with no definite plan or object in view save that he was determined to do something to earn a living and if possible to win his way to fortune. He procured cheap lodgings and board, and proceeded during the following week to cast about for something to do. In this he was unsuccessful, and the following Saturday found him penniless and sadly discouraged. On the afternoon of that day, while standing at a place called the "loafers' stand,"¹ near the place where he boarded, ruminating as to what should be his next move, he was approached by Martin S. Stetson, of Stetson & Blake, East Abington, boot and shoe manufacturers, and offered a job "treeing" boots. It is needless to say the proposition was accepted. He continued with them a few months, until the business became slack, when he accepted a like position with Daniel Blanchard. Here he worked very hard for a year, when this firm likewise failed, and Mr. Fogg lost more than half his wages. In the mean time Stetson had managed to get under way again, and Mr. Fogg returned to his employ, where he continued till 1840, treeing and crimping boots. In April of this year he began business for himself as a boot and shoe crimper, at South Weymouth, Mass. About the first of the year 1841 he bought stock and made a few cases of best quality boots, brought them to Boston, and sold them to retailers. With the funds thus acquired he replenished his stock, paid his hands, and thus embarked in the boot and shoe manufacturing business. He soon built up quite a trade, and in 1842 he built his first factory—a large one for those days—at Columbian Square, South Weymouth. This was the first large factory in that part of the town; was heated by steam, and was looked upon by Mr. Fogg's more conservative neighbors as rather a risky and extravagant venture. After having met with some losses, through failures among his customers, he confined himself exclusively to the supplying of the wholesale houses. His first deal with a wholesale house was with Alexander Strong, one of Boston's leading dealers. Mr. Fogg's goods were the best that could be made, and he experienced no difficulty in finding customers among the best dealers, such as Atherton, Stetson & Co., Joseph Whitten & Co., and other prominent houses.

On Jan. 1, 1850, he formed a copartnership with Wilman Burbank, who was also a partner with Alexander Strong, and they established a boot and shoe store on Central Street, Boston. In July of the following year, 1851, Mr. Burbank died. Mr. Fogg then associated with himself William S. Houghton. They removed their store to Pearl Street, and under the firm-name of Fogg & Houghton, they did a large and rapidly-increasing business. About 1861, Albert L. Coolidge was admitted as a partner, and the firm became Fogg, Houghton & Coolidge. In the mean time, about 1859, they began to secure quite a trade in California; they manufactured a class of goods especially adapted to that trade, and their sales in this market continued to increase so rapidly that in 1866 they did a business of more than a million dollars, and were at that time quoted as the largest boot and shoe manufacturers in the United States. In 1878, Mr. Fogg withdrew from this firm, but still continued manufacturing at Weymouth. In the mean time, in 1867, his brother, Parker S. Fogg, returned from California with a cash capital of nearly a hundred thousand dollars, which he had amassed in the boot and shoe trade, and for which he sought investment. John S. placed an equal amount with him, and together they established themselves as bankers, at No. 20 Congress Street, Boston, with Parker S. Fogg as active business manager. John S. continued to give personal attention to his manufacturing interests at Weymouth until June 1, 1871, when his brother died, and he then assumed the management of the bank, and to this interest he has devoted his chief attention to the present time. Upon the dissolution of the firm of Fogg, Houghton & Co., 1878, Mr. Fogg formed a copartnership with N. B. Thayer, who had been foreman of the Weymouth factory and who had shown good business qualities, and under the firm-name of N. B. Thayer & Co. the manufacturing at Weymouth was continued until March, 1882, when the firm of Fogg, Shaw, Thayer & Co. was formed, with factories at South Weymouth, Westboro', and Marblehead, Mass., and Farmington, N. H. In their banking operations Messrs. Fogg Brothers & Co. made a specialty of dealing in western commercial paper, and in this connection one remarkable fact may be mentioned,—during the last five years they have handled over one hundred million dollars western paper and have never lost a dollar. In 1865 the First National Bank of South Weymouth was incorporated, and Mr. Fogg was chosen president, which position he has held to the present time. In this same year Mr. Fogg was elected president of the Agricultural Industrial Society. After acting in this capacity eleven years he resigned. In 1879 he was elected president of the Putman Horseshoe Nail Corporation, in which concern he is a large shareholder. He still holds this position. Mr. Fogg is a Republican in politics, and has been a member of the Union Congregational Church since 1850. His business career has been a phenomenally successful one, and through all his various and multitudinous dealings and interests he has always paid dollar for dollar, and never asked an extension. Of his personal traits and characteristics, one of his neighbors speaks as follows: "Mr. Fogg is a man of fine personal appearance, splendid physique, in perfect health, and weighs something over two hundred pounds. His personal manners are easy, address and manner of speaking kindly and sympathetic. He is noted among a very wide circle of business and other acquaintances for his perfect self-control under even the most exasperating circumstances." Neighbors of forty years testify that while they have on very rare occasions seen him angry, they have never known him to exhibit other than the most composed external bearing. This habitual 'ruling of his own spirit' has always given him great influence over his many employés, and has preserved between him and them an unusual degree of harmony. He is candid and frank in his natural disposition, and has an especial sympathy for struggling young men of merit who are evidently trying to help themselves. More than one such has received from him substantial tokens of his sympathy. His early advantages in the way of education were scanty, but he has by diligence and persistence largely surmounted these difficulties. Mr. Fogg is highly esteemed in the community where he has so long resided and is best known. He is a man of decided religious convictions and character, though never obtrusive, always quietly firm whenever occasion arises for a declaration of his principles in this regard. He is, besides a giver to many good causes, a generous supporter of the Union Congregational Church, of which he has been for so many years a valued and influential member."

MARSHALL CURTIS DIZER.

Marshall C. Dizer was born in Weymouth, Mass., Sept. 23, 1822. He is the son of John and Sophia (French) Dizer, and grandson of John Dizer, a German immigrant to this country about 1790. This John Dizer was a seafaring man, and made his home in Boston, where his only son was born. John Dizer, Jr., learned shoemaking when a young man, and followed that occupation until between fifty and sixty years of age, when he retired to a farm, where he still resides, at the advanced age of eighty-seven. Marshall C. is the oldest son of seven children. In his youth he had no educational advantages further than the schools of Weymouth afforded, and as soon as he had arrived at such age that his services were useful he was placed in the shop to help his father at the shoemaker's bench. He was brought up to this vocation, and worked at his trade until he attained his majority. He then took a case of shoes to make for a manufacturer, for which, when finished, he received thirty-five dollars. With this capital he embarked in business for himself, and from that day to the present he has never worked a day as an employé. He purchased stock, made shoes, and sold them to merchants, and with the money thus acquired would replenish and increase his stock and employ assistants,—gradually but continually building up and advancing. He practiced the most rigid economy, and labored with the most persevering energy. As an instance of the self-denial and restraint he practiced, he has frequently, when business called him to Boston, made his noon meal off an apple and doughnut costing a cent each. To the young men of the present day this would seem ridiculous and contemptibly penurious, but many if not most of those who are to-day the leading, substantial business men of New England laid the foundation of their fortune and success by the exercise of similar frugality. In about three years Mr. Dizer purchased and conducted a grocery-store as an adjunct to his manufacturing business, his shoemaking being conducted in one-half the store. It is worth recording that the only material aid Mr. Dizer ever asked or received from any one in the building up of his business was a loan of one hundred dollars from Mr. Jonathan Denton, of Boston (afterwards his father-in-law), and this debt caused him so much mental uneasiness that he determined never to repeat the process. In a few years his business had so far increased as to render new and larger quarters necessary. He had also married in the mean time, and so he fitted up the grocery-store as a dwelling and leased a larger factory in which to conduct his business. Here he remained only a few years, when, in obedience to the demands of his rapidly-growing trade, he leased a much larger factory, gave up the grocery-store attachment, devoted himself exclusively to manufacturing, and continued in this factory until 1861, when he built a shop where his present immense establishment now stands. Up to this time, however, Mr. Dizer's career had not been one of uninterrupted prosperity. Like other business men, he had encountered many unlooked for obstacles and met with many reverses, but, unlike many others, he never lost heart or courage, but overcame obstacles as best he could and kept energetically at work. In the great financial crash of 1857 he lost almost the entire accumulations of previous years, and it was only by the most unyielding efforts that he managed to avoid suspension. Again, in 1861, the loss of his Southern trade through the outbreak of the civil war, and the consequent failure to collect outstanding dues in that quarter left him once more almost penniless. Again, however, he began almost at the beginning, built up new trade, and once more conquered adverse fortune. When he began the erection of his new factory he had no surplus money, but paid all bills of its construction (as they fell due) from the proceeds of his business. Up to this time he made only shoes. He now began making calf boots, and for about three years made a specialty of army shoes.

Since 1861, as Mr. Dizer's business has increased, he has increased his facilities and made additions to his factory more than half a dozen different times, until he has now the largest factory in the world for the class of goods he makes. He has never had any partners in business except his two brothers, John T. and Jacob F., who at different times have had an interest, until Mr. Dizer's two sons became of age, when the brothers retired and the sons were admitted as partners, the firm-name being M. C. Dizer & Co. Mr. Dizer's factory now furnishes employment to nearly six hundred persons, and they do a business of about eight hundred thousand dollars per annum. The writer of this sketch was conducted by Mr. Dizer through the various departments of his immense establishment, where hundreds of curiously-fashioned machines, many of which are original with this house, each perform with the most astonishing rapidity some part of the process of making a boot or shoe, where each of these various machines has in attendance a skillful manipulator who operates the machine with such wonderful skill and does his work so deftly and with such mathematical regularity that one involuntarily wonders whether by long months and years of routine work he too has not become a machine, a veritable automaton that could not go wrong if he would. A visit to an establishment like this is full of instruction and interest; it serves to so forcibly and impressively illustrate the rapid strides which have been made in inventive science in the last quarter of a century, that but little seems left for succeeding inventors to do.

Mr. Dizer has always devoted himself strictly to his business, and almost invariably refused any official position tendered him. He has been director of different banks and corporations for short periods, but always gave up such positions as soon as he could consistently do so, believing one interest at a time sufficient for one man, if that interest be properly attended to. The only position of trust he now holds is that of vice-president of the Union National Bank of Weymouth and Braintree. In politics he is a staunch Republican. He is a member of the Baptist Church, which is largely sustained by his liberality, and of which his father is deacon. He has always been strictly temperate, never using either tobacco or liquor. As an evidence of the character Mr. Dizer has always sustained among his business acquaintances, a single incident will suffice to illustrate. During the great panic and upheaval in business circles caused by the outbreaking of the civil war in 1861, one of Boston's leading business men was approached by another, who had a very slight acquaintance with Mr. Dizer, and asked what he thought of Mr. Dizer's responsibility. The gentleman referred to replied, "If I knew to-day that M. C. Dizer was not worth one dollar in the world, I should not hesitate to trust him for ten thousand dollars."

He married, first, Sarah A. Denton, of Boston. She lived but little more than a year, and Mr. Dizer married as his second wife a sister of the first, Miss Delia A. Denton. They have had five children, two are dead, two sons and one daughter are living,—Silas C., who married a daughter of Gen. Luke Lyman, of Northampton, and now resides in Longwood, near Boston; Walter M. married a Miss Eggleston, of Westfield, and resides in Weymouth, and Alida R., now Mrs. George W. Baker, of Weymouth.

ELIAS SMITH BEALS.

Elias S. Beals was born in Weymouth, Mass., Oct. 20, 1814. He is the son of Lewis and Sarah S. (Harding) Beals, and is descended in a direct line from John Beal, who came from the parish of Hingham, in Forehoe Hundred, County of Norfolk, England. He came to America in the vessel "Diligent," arriving at Boston on the 10th of August, 1638, with his family, consisting of wife, five sons, three daughters, and two servants. He settled in Hingham, probably on account of his wife being the sister of Rev. Peter Hobart, who had chosen that town as his residence, and was the first minister there. John Beal became a man of influence in the new colony, and his progeny, which has been somewhat numerous, has been distinguished for intelligence, integrity, and good citizenship. The line of descent from John Beal to Elias S. is: John (1), Jeremiah (2), Lazarus (3), Lazarus (4), Lazarus (5), Lazarus A. (6), Lewis (7), Elias S. (8).

Lazarus, of the fifth generation, was a physician in what was then the Second Precinct of Hingham (now Cohasset), it being set apart as a new town in 1770. From the meagre data obtainable at this late day, it is evident that this Dr. Lazarus Beal was a man of more than usual enterprise and ability. He was a leader in all measures of advancement in his town, and was one of those who joined with Rev. N. Hobart in signing the church covenant, and was an early deacon in the church. A copy of this document, now in the possession of Mr. Quincy Bicknell, of Hingham, shows it to be remarkable for its liberality, "being sufficiently broad to embrace all denominations of Christians." Dr. Beal's wife was named Lydia. They had a large family, of twelve children. He lived to be seventy-two years of age, dying Oct. 31, 1797.

Lazarus A., son of Dr. Lazarus, was born Sept. 30, 1753; died Nov. 23, 1822. Early in life he moved to Weymouth, where he married, Oct. 29, 1776, Bethiah Lewis. She was born April 8, 1756; died Aug. 5, 1805. They had a family of six children, of whom Lewis was one. He was born Oct. 13, 1793. His education was such as could be obtained at common schools of his town at that period, and when about seventeen years of age he chose brick-masonry as a trade, and this he followed assiduously as an occupation till between fifty and sixty years of age. By habits of economy and thrift he had during these years accumulated some means and purchased a farm, and to the avocation of agriculture he devoted his declining years. He, like his father, was an orthodox Congregationalist, and was a member of that church for more than fifty years of his life. He married Sarah S., daughter of Capt. James and Mary (Ford) Harding, of Weymouth. Their children were Elias S., Mary H. (afterwards the wife of Francis B. Bates, now deceased), Sarah L. and Lewis A. (who is a mason by trade, and resides with Sarah L. at the old homestead). Both are unmarried. Mr. Beals lived to the remarkable age of more than eighty-eight years, retaining his faculties to the last. He died May 10, 1882.

Elias S. had in his youth no educational advantages other than the common schools afforded. He worked when a boy, about three years with his father at masonry. When about eighteen he learned shoemaking, and for a few years worked at cutting and making shoes for neighboring manufacturers. In 1838 he took a large lot of boots and shoes, the property of various manufacturers in Weymouth, on board a vessel and sailed for Savannah, Ga., where he disposed of part of the same to advantage, the remainder he shipped to Charleston, S. C., and then sold the larger part of what he had left from the Savannah market. This was Mr. Beals' first business venture out in the world, and the fact that his neighbors trusted him, a young inexperienced man, showed the esteem in which he was held by his fellow-townsmen. On his return from Savannah to Charleston he sailed on board the steamer "Savannah," celebrated as being the first steamship that ever crossed the Atlantic Ocean. On the voyage to Charleston she broke her starboard shaft in a gale of wind and came to anchor. The gale was so furious that she parted all her cables but one, and the vessel was in imminent danger of being lost with all on board. During the prevalence of the storm, however, the passengers were transferred at great risk of their lives to a passing steamer, and carried on to Charleston. After a week or so spent in Charleston Mr. Beals took passage on the ship "Leland," and after a very rough voyage arrived again in his native town, Weymouth. He then began in a small way manufacturing boots and shoes, and soon connected with this pursuit a small store of general merchandise. Later on he built a factory at Torrey's Corners, and continued as manufacturer and merchant until 1849, when he connected himself with others in a jobbing boot and shoe trade in New Orleans, from which he retired some two years later. Returning to Weymouth, he built a larger factory, and became regularly established as a boot and shoe manufacturer. Having by intercourse and contact familiarized himself with the peculiar requirements of the Southern market, he made a specialty of catering to that trade. He studied the tastes and requirements of his patrons, and took pains to keep abreast of the times, and, if anything, a little in the leadership in the matter of styles, etc., in his goods, and by these means established a paying trade in first-class goods in his line. As an instance of the enterprise which has always characterized Mr. Beals' business career, it may be mentioned that he purchased and ran the first sewing machine ever used in North Weymouth; he soon after bought another, and they proved paying investments. He took pains to note their value as compared with hand labor, and it is a noteworthy fact that in the first year of their use these two machines saved him a matter of one thousand dollars, in increased production and diminished expense. The outbreak of the civil war destroyed all of Mr. Beals' trade, as his customers were all in the South, consequently he gave up manufacturing. He deliberated long as to whether he should offer his services to his country, but physical infirmities deterred him; he however, sent a substitute, and one of his sons (Frank) enlisted and served until the first battle of Fredericksburg where he was severely wounded. After considerable delay and trouble Mr. Beals succeeded in getting his son home, where he was tenderly nursed by his parents through a long confinement from his wound, but he eventually recovered and was afterwards honorably discharged, being unfit for further duty.

Mr. Beals served as selectman in Weymouth in 1855 and in 1856. When a young man he was the principal auctioneer in the northerly part of Weymouth, and has always been greatly interested in all kinds of public improvements. The Hook and Ladder Company in his ward have assumed his name, had it painted on their truck, and hung his portrait in the front end of their hall.

He has done a large business as insurance agent for many years, and has been so fortunate as to never have had a single loss for any one of the more than one hundred different stock insurance companies that he had placed risks in, and less than one thousand dollars for all the several mutual insurance companies that he is agent for.

He has been a director at different times in two national banks; and is, and has been for several years, president of the North Weymouth Cemetery Association, and also treasurer of his religious society.

In 1859 he was a member of the State Legislature, and assisted in the revision of the laws of the commonwealth, which were published as "The General Statutes of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts." He often served on school and special committees, such as for the erection of public buildings and other important purposes. It was almost wholly through the unwearied and unremitting endeavors of Mr. Beals, continued through a period of three years and against the most inveterate and unyielding opposition from various quarters, that toll privileges of the Quincy and Hingham bridges were abolished by act of the Legislature, and the bridge was made free to all. The account of Mr. Beals' efforts, the strenuous and bitter opposition he met with, and his final victory in the achievement of his object would be too long to be accorded space here, but the entire story is ably, concisely, and wittily told in a pamphlet published at the time, entitled "The Hingham and Quincy Bridges: their Freedom, and the Manner in which it was Obtained."

Through his earnest endeavors in this matter he was brought in contact with, and formed the personal acquaintance of, almost the entire senatorial body, and as an evidence of the impression he made, it may be mentioned that in the winter of 1862 a petition was circulated in the Senate, directed to the authorities at Washington, requesting the appointment of Mr. Beals as Internal Revenue Assessor for the Second District of Massachusetts. This petition was signed by every member of the Senate (forty in all), by about one hundred members of the House, and by many other prominent men. It was forwarded to Washington, and in due time he received an appointment signed by Hugh McCulloch, then Secretary of the Treasury, appointing him to the position sought. On Feb. 28, 1863, a second commission was issued, signed by President Lincoln, continuing him in the office. He held this position until shortly after the accession of Andrew Johnson to the Presidential chair, when for political reasons a successor was appointed. Three months later Mr. Beals received a telegram from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue at Washington, asking him if he would "travel as special agent for the Treasury Department, to instruct Internal Revenue officers in the discharge of their duties." This he did, and for a year and three months he traveled all over the country this side the Mississippi River in the performance of this duty, which he discharged to the entire satisfaction of the department. He served until there was a general act passed, which went into effect July 4, 1868, discharging all special agents of the Treasury Department under the United States government. One act of Mr. Beals in this connection is especially worthy of mention: he alone and unaided recovered for the government from the First National Bank of the District of Columbia, at Washington, on incorrect returns, many thousands of dollars more money than all he ever received from the government as compensation for services and expenses; this he did while temporarily located in Washington between his tours in the prosecution of his regular duties, and the work was not in the strict line of his legitimate duty.

In 1868, Mr. Beals' son (Frank) commenced business as a boot and shoe dealer in Milwaukee, Wis. Two years later Mr. Beals and also Alexis Torrey took a partnership interest in the business, and about the same time Mr. Beals' youngest son, James L., engaged as book-keeper for the firm. For a number of years Mr. Isaac G. Mann was also a partner, but in 1877 they purchased Mr. Mann's interest and he retired. James L. then became a member of the firm. The firm-name is Beals, Torrey & Company, and they do a business exceeding half a million dollars per year, which the young men of the firm have built up through their own efforts.

Mr. Beals married, July 27, 1837, Betsey, daughter of Ancill and Eliza Burrell, of Weymouth. Their children are Augustus, Elizabeth, Elias, Frank, James, and Mary S.; Mary died at the age of nineteen, the rest are living.

Augustus was chief clerk in his father's office while he was in government employ. In 1866-67 he was United States Internal Revenue Agent in the Second District of Massachusetts, for collection of delinquent taxes. In 1868 he began manufacturing boots and shoes at his father's old stand, and in 1878, under the name of Bay State Hammock Company, he also engaged in the manufacture of nets and hammocks. He married Abbie F. Lovell, of Weymouth, and has three daughters,—Clara E., Gertrude F., and Alice S. Elizabeth married Josiah H., son of Capt. Cornelius Pratt, of Weymouth. They have one son,—James H. Elias Frank married Emily C. Torrey, sister of Alexis Torrey. James married a lady in Milwaukee, and has one son,—Frederick Elias.

Mr. Beals was one of the town auditors for many years prior to 1883, at which time, on being again elected, he declined serving longer. He was appointed a justice of the peace in 1851, and now holds his fifth commission as such officer, doing no small amount of gratuitous service in that line for pensioners and others. In politics he is a pronounced Republican. In religion he is a Universalist, and has contributed liberally in various ways, not only to the erection of a suitable house of worship, but also to the support of the society of which he is a member. Mr. Beals is frank and outspoken in his opinions and sentiments, and honorable and earnest in all matters.

Whatever he has taken in his hand to do he has always done with a will, and his efforts throughout life have been crowned with that success which must accrue to intelligently directed and persistent energy. In 1878 he made a tour through England, France, Germany, Switzerland, Italy, Austria, Prussia, Belgium, etc., and while on this trip contributed a series of letters to the Weymouth Gazette.

He says he neither hopes for nor desires any new official position whatever, as his business interests and connections require all the labor, time, and attention he is able to bestow.

He now, in his seventieth year, fully realizes that the evening shades of this earthly life are drawing closely about him; and his full faith in God and His providence makes to him the future more and more bright and glorious as time rolls on, and his scenes of earthly things are vanishing into the past.

JAMES TORREY.

Deacon James Torrey was born in North Weymouth (Old Spain), Sept. 2, 1811. He is a son of James and Hannah (Holbrook) Torrey, and grandson of Lemuel and Sarah (Lovell) Torrey. The Torreys were among the pioneer families in this ancient and historic town, and they have always been noted for their integrity of character and good citizenship. James Torrey was a farmer in North Weymouth, and had three children,—Sarah, married Jacob Dyer, of Weymouth, had seven children, and died June 26, 1880; Lemuel, born Oct. 30, 1806 (married Nancy Bicknell, of East Weymouth, and had seven children. Mrs. Torrey, after suffering much from rheumatism, died Jan. 5, 1864, and Lemuel married, as his second wife, Mrs. Ann Maria Batchelder, née Stoddard, of Upton. She is still living). Mr. Torrey died June 5, 1880; the third and last child is James, whose portrait accompanies this sketch. James Torrey, Sr., died in 1815, in his thirty-eighth year, from lung fever brought on by cold contracted while mustering in militia. Mrs. Torrey married as her second husband Stephen French, of East Weymouth. By this marriage there was no issue.

James, Jr., was only about four years of age at his father's death. The family were left with small means, and of course the children were compelled to work at an early age to help support the family. At thirteen years of age James was hired out to work on the farm at three dollars per month, and worked at this price seven months of that year, and the following year he worked a number of months at the same price. About this time his mother married the second time, and he returned home to live with her and his stepfather. Here he remained until the death of his mother, which occurred when he was in his twenty-first year. During his minority he had learned boot and shoemaking, and he now went to work for various manufacturers. Nov. 12, 1834, he married Catharine Whitmarsh, daughter of Peter and Ruth (Webb) Whitmarsh, and granddaughter of Thomas and Jane (Reed) Webb. About the time of his marriage he began in a small way manufacturing boots and shoes. In company with his brother he bought out and conducted a small store at North Weymouth. This copartnership lasted eleven years, when he sold his interest to his brother, and established business for himself. He built up quite a large business for those days, and was uniformly successful. About 1865 he took into partnership his nephew, Lemuel Torrey, Jr., furnishing the funds and superintending the general affairs of the firm, while Lemuel assumed the actual charge of affairs, and gave his personal attention to the manufacturing. This copartnership continued until 1872, when Mr. Torrey withdrew his capital from the concern, and permanently retired from active business, after having spent nearly forty years of his life as a manufacturer.

Since his retirement he has not been idle; he has settled many estates, some of which were in a very complicated condition. This he has done to the general satisfaction of those concerned.

During the course of a long and very active life,

Deacon Torrey so deported himself as to win the confidence and esteem of those who know him, and he, though never an aspirant for office, has been honored with many trusts. He was elected director of Quincy Stone Bank, afterwards called National Granite Bank, in 1853, and has held that position to the present time. He has been for many years, and is at present, trustee of the Weymouth Savings-Bank. He has been, since its incorporation, a director in Dorchester Mutual Fire Insurance Company, covering a period of about thirty years. He was postmaster at North Weymouth under the administration of four Presidents, has been selectman three years, and overseer of the poor one year. He was on the board of selectmen at the time when there was a dispute as to the boundary line between Weymouth and Abington. They petitioned the Legislature, and Mr. Torrey was one of the commissioners appointed to survey and establish the line. This proved to be a very arduous and laborious work, as it was done during the most inclement weather of a severe winter, and through a badly-constructed route. The line was established, however, according to their survey, the Legislature accepting their report. Deacon Torrey is an earnest and faithful worker in Masonry. He joined first the Old Colony Lodge, F. A. M., at Hingham, Mass., was made a Master Mason at this lodge, and continued his membership there until the renewal of charter and reorganization of Orphans' Hope Lodge at East Weymouth. He changed his membership to this lodge, and has been its treasurer since its organization, a period of more than a quarter of a century. He is a member of the North Weymouth Pilgrim Church (Congregationalist), and has been a deacon of this church from its organization, in 1852, to the present time, and for ten years or more superintendent of the Sunday-school.

Though never an active politician, he has always acted with the Republican party in most measures, and in this, as in all other matters, he is liberal in his views and opinions. Deacon Torrey is one of the most highly-respected citizens of his town, and together with his estimable wife is passing a serene and quiet life's autumn near the spot where he was born, surrounded by warm friends, and in the enjoyment of a competence secured by years of active industrious toil and traffic.

No children have blessed their union, but many little sons and daughters of neighboring people will remember with pleasure in after-years their kindly-received visits to Deacon Torrey's.

CHAPTER LV.

WRENTHAM.

BY HON. SAMUEL WARNER.

At a General Court holden at Newe Towne, Sept. 2, 1635, it was ordered "that there shall be a plantation settled about two miles above the Falls of Charles River, on the northeast side thereof, to have ground lying to it on both sides of the river, both upland and meadow, to be laid out hereafter as the Court shall appoint."

On the 8th of September, 1636, the General Court ordered that the plantation to be settled above the falls of Charles River shall have three years' immunity from public charges, as Concord had to be accounted from the 1st of May next, and the name of said plantation is to be Deddham; to enjoy all that land on the southerly and easterly side of Charles River not formerly granted to any town or particular persons, and also to have five miles square on the other side of the river.

This was the original grant as appears in the first volume of the records of Massachusetts of that tract of land which includes the present townships of Dedham, Medfield, Wrentham, Needham, Bellingham, a part of Sherborn, a part of Natick, Franklin, Medway (which was attached to Medfield until 1781), Walpole, a part of Foxborough, Norfolk, and Norwood.

In about the year 1647 the records of Dedham say that John Dwight and Francis Chickering gave notice of hopes of a mine near certain ponds thirteen miles from town. It is supposed that the ponds here meant were at Wollomonpoag, the Indian name of the plantation afterwards made a town by the name of Wrentham. It is probable that at the date of this grant of the General Court the inhabitants of Dedham had little knowledge of this part of their township. But it must have been somewhat explored before the year 1649, as we learn that in that year, on account of the scarcity of grass in Dedham, the inhabitants went to Wollomonpoag to cut grass from the meadows there.

But the earliest movement regarding the occupation of Wollomonpoag of which any record is found was made in the year 1660. It is as follows:

"Dedham, 22, 4, 1660. At a meeting of the selectmen there, Lieut. Fisher, Sergt. Fuller, Richard Wheeler, Ensign Fisher are deputed to view the lands both upland and meadow near about the ponds by George Indian's Wigwam, and make report of what they find to the selectmen in the first opportunity they can take." This was in obedience to the desire of the inhabitants expressed "formerly in a lecture day."

The selectmen reported on the 31st of Tenth month (December), 1660, that they had deputed men to search and view the place, whose returns encouraged them

"to depute two men to endeavor to compound with such Indians as have a true right there.' And they approved of the establishing a plantation there in this careful language, viz., 'To us it seems that it might be helpful to conduce to public and particular good that the place might be planted with meet inhabitants in due time.' They also suggested that the present care thereof be left to a committee to explore the place further, and to consider what measures are proper in the premises, and 'propose them to the town in some public meeting to be considered and resolved as the case may require.'"

At a town-meeting in the following month a committee was chosen "in respect of Wollomonpoag."

On the 27th, 1st, 1661 (March), at a general town-meeting, the question being put whether there should be a plantation erected or set up at the place called Wollomonpoag, it was answered by a vote in the affirmative. The question being further put whether the town would lay down six hundred acres of land at the place before named for the encouragement of the plantation, it was answered by a vote in the affirmative. This vote, however, was not unanimous. Thirteen voters dissented, and their names were entered upon the record.

A committee was appointed also at this meeting,

"to settle and determine such things as shall be mentioned needful for the plantation before named. First, they shall determine when men present themselves for entertainment there who are meet to be accepted. Second, they shall proportion to each man his part in the six hundred acres. Third, they shall order the settling of the plantation in reference to situation, highways, convenient place for a meeting-house, a lot or lots for church officers, with such other things necessary as may hereafter be proposed."

In case the committee should reject applicants the right of appeal to the town was reserved to them.

It will be noticed that in this legislation in the Dedham town-meeting, it was especially provided that the Indian title to the lands at the place intended for the new plantation should be extinguished by purchase. As early as 1629 the Governor of the New England Company advised the Governor and Council for London's Plantation, in the Massachusetts Bay, that "if any of the savages pretend rights of inheritance to all or any part of the lands granted in our patent, we pray you to endeavor to purchase their title, that we may avoid the least scruple of intrusion." And in a second communication similar advice was repeated. In the year 1652 the General Court solemnly resolved, "that what lands any of the Indians within this jurisdiction have by possession or improvement by subduing of the same, they have just right thereunto according to that in Genesis 1 and 28, and chapt. 9, 1, and Psalms 115, 16."

In 1662, Timothy Dwight and Richard Ellis made a report of their doings in extinguishing the Indian title to the Wollomonopoag lands. The substance of this report was, that by the assistance of Capt. Willett, they had obtained, under the hand and seal of the sagamore, a release from the Indians of their title to six miles square of land, the captain making the payment of the consideration on behalf of Dedham. Upon reading of this report, the town voted a letter of thanks to the captain for his kindly services, and that he be requested to procure a deed, signed by the sagamore, that may be sufficient according to our laws. It was also voted that a rate be made upon cow-commons to pay the captain £24 10s. for the purchase of the lands.

In 1661 the boundaries of the plantation were established at a general meeting of the town (Dedham) as follows: "It is ordered that the bounds of the plantation at Wollomonopoag shall be upon Stop River towards the East, beginning at Medfield bounds, and so all along as the river lies, up stream until it comes about half a mile above the falls in that river, near about where the path to that place at present lies, and from thence Southward to Dorchester line; and the West bounds shall be at or about the end of five miles from one of the ponds in Wollomonopoage, to be a line running parallel with the line at the East end of the plantation, Always provided that it extend not to any lands but such as are at present our own; And the south bounds shall be Dorchester line, and the North bounds shall be Medfield bounds in part and Charles River in part."

Dorchester at this time extended from its northern line, at Boston, nearly to Rhode Island, and Rehoboth included Attleborough and Cumberland, now in Rhode Island. It is said that the above-named south line ran from the southwest corner of the present township of Walpole southwesterly, south of the Maj. Mann house (now S. W. Grant's), and northerly of Turner's Mill (now Hawes'), crossing Thurston Street north of Mr. Hodges' house, and Madison Street a little south of Mrs. Gage's house, and then continuing in the same course over Line Hill to the end of Dorchester line as above. This was the line until 1753, when a gore of land on the southeast line was annexed to Wrentham.

In this same year (1661-62) the proprietors voted to sell their rights to lands in Wollomonopoag for one hundred and sixty pounds, to persons fit to carry on the work in church and state, provided the plantation be entered on within two and one-half years.

Wollomonopoag seemed now in a fair way of being planted. Two years had now elapsed since the good people of Dedham began to agitate the question. The place had been viewed, as they expressed it, favorable report had been made, and the fathers of the town had given it their cautious approval. Some few persons had already broken ground and made improvements, and these were recognized in after divisions of the land. It seemed, therefore, that the settlement had begun to exist. But difficulties were started, and those who had intended to go from Dedham to live at Wollomonopoag asked for a meeting of the proprietors, "that then and there such questions may be answered as shall be proposed."

Accordingly, a meeting is called for the 12th of Eleventh month, 1662 (January), "to attend the propositions of such brethren and neighbors as have intended to go to Wollomonopoag." The proprietors "presented a paper of some considerations." A conference ensued between the proprietors and the proposed colonists. The committee of the latter were Anthony Fisher, Robert Ware, Richard Ellice (Ellis), Isaac Bullard. Their statement was, that ten men had been accepted by them to go to Wollomonopoag, and had agreed with the proprietors about their rights there, but that this number is not sufficient for encouragement to goe on with the plantation. But, further, if they have sufficient encouragement to goe on, they will pay the money rate of any of the proprietors who remain in Dedham, with whom they have agreed or can agree, and that they "are not in a capacity to settle rights of those who have not subscribed." And, "all things considered, as they are now circumstanced, they cannot go on to make a plantation as the town intended, . . . that although they are not free," yet they are not desirous to leave the world altogether, "but are willing to proceed, if the town will enable us to proceed in a safe way." That they have been at charges in making improvements there, and are not able to bear burthens here (Dedham) also, and desire the town would relieve them. The proprietors, in answer, propose to lay out to each proprietor in town his part proportionably, in that six hundred acres for a plantation as first intended, by which means they say possibly they, the colonists, may be supplied, each man being left to bargain for himself. And secondly, that payment should be made for their improvements, if their improved parcels should fall to others in the drawing of lots, or compounded some other equal way, or they be allowed to retain those parcels with the lots they might draw. Hereupon others who had intended "to go to Wollomonopoag," did disown what the four men (committee) had subscribed unto, and accounted themselves not at all engaged thereby, "but agreed to sit down by the advice of the major part of the proprietors." These were Nath. Whiting, John Kent, Nath. Bullard, James Thorpe, John Evered, Robert Freeman, Nath. Stearns, Dan Makiah, Samuel Fisher, Job Littlefield, Job Perry, Samuel Parker, Cornelius Fisher.

It thus appears that the whole number of men who proposed to settle at Wollomonopoag was twenty-three. But they conceived they had poor encouragement from the parent town. Their isolated condition in this wilderness was intensely real to them, and they gave utterance to their feelings in the declaration that they "did not wish to leave the world altogether." Moreover, Capt. Willett's bill had not yet been paid, although the selectmen, being also a committee having charge of the Wollomonopoag affairs, on the 27th of February, 1662, "doe judge it meet that the case should speedily come to an issue and resolution that so the engagement to Capt. Willett may be performed and our own future power be settled and continued."

On the 2d of March, 1663, the proprietors resolved by unanimous vote that they "could not advise the parties to proceed to make it a plantation, all things considered, as they are now circumstanced." But they voted "that the charges of those persons who had been accepted by the committee, which they had necessarily expended upon breaking up of lands at Wollomonopoag, should be reasonably and equally satisfied." Thus, it seems, the first attempt at settlement had failed.

At the same meeting, however (March 2, 1663), the proprietors took a decisive step (one consideration being Capt. Willett's bill yet unpaid, for the payment of which a tax had been ordered, as before stated, some of the proprietors refusing to pay on the ground that those who were to have the lands should pay for them), viz., they voted "that there shall be six hundred acres of land layed out at Wollomonopoag for a general dividint, that so every proprietor may have his proportion therein, according to the general rule of division of lands; and the six hundred acres to be layed out with as much convenience as may be with reference to a plantation, if the Providence of God shall make way thereunto, viz., that the six hundred acres shall be such lands as to be so laid out for house-lots, and all highways, officers' lots, burial-place, and training-grounds. And all other lands necessary to be reserved and used for all public uses within the trat (tract) of the town shall be over and above the six hundred acres before mentioned, and also all manner of roughlands, the circumference of the six hundred acres to be taken before the last of this month." On the 23d of the same month the proprietors met to draw their lots in the Wollomonopoag plantation, which it seems had been surveyed and platted. It was agreed "on behalf of them that have improvements there that they might take the lots they had already subdued and improved, and not draw lots with the rest of the proprietors. The persons who were thus allowed to choose were Anthony Fisher, Jr., Sergt. Richard Ellis, Robert Ware, James Thorpe, Isaac Bullard, Samuel Fisher, Samuel Parker, Josh Kent, and Job Farrington. These persons, with Ralph Freeman, Sergt. Stearns, and perhaps Daniel Makiah, were the first persons to break up and improve land at Wollomonopoag. The proprietors then proceeded to draw their lots, the same being numbered from one to thirty-four inclusive. The first lot was "to be where the Indians have broken up land, not far from the place intended to build a mill at." This was undoubtedly in the neighborhood of the mill site now occupied by the Eagle Factory. This appears from the depositions of aged persons taken in 1724, who were then old enough to remember the first occupation of these house-lots, and who say "that they were east or easterly of the mill-pond, and that the first was James Draper's, the second Nathaniel Whiting's, who improved them several years; and many other lots there were improved by their owners." The first settlers beyond question located their improvements (so called) upon the easterly and southeasterly side of Whiting's Pond, or the Great Pond (previously known as the mill-pond), but their houses were at some distance from the pond, probably on what is now Franklin Street and on South Street. An ancient map (1738), showing the position of these first house-lots, confirms this supposition, showing also some lots occupied on what is now called East Street. The whole number of proprietors was seventy-three; the number of lots drawn was thirty-four, and the order and numbers given, but the boundaries were not determined. The shares were unequal, the division being made "according to the rule for dividing lands in Dedham."

In the year 1663 the first highway was confirmed by the selectmen of Dedham, at the request of those who had drawn lots at Wollomonopoag, "at the east end of their lots." This was the first authoritative recognition of a highway in this plantation, and was probably a part of a way now known as South Street.

After this date the affairs of the plantation were very quiet until the year 1666-67, when the proprietors voted that the meadows "appertayning to that place" be all measured, and appointed a committee for that purpose, Lieut. Joshua Fisher being named as measurer, and he was directed to "lay out all the lots that are granted and drawn in succession together." For the preservation of wood and timber a penalty of two shillings sixpence was imposed upon the transgressor for each tree by him felled without the consent of Lieut. Fisher and Sergt. Ellis; and in 1667 a committee was appointed to define the east boundary of the plantation upon the suggestion that there was some mistake about it.

At a general meeting of the town, April 11, 1668, the proprietors, upon the request of the Indian Sarah, of Wollomonopoag, "grant her one parcel of upland near a pond about two miles westward from the situation of Wollomonopoag, in exchange for that land the said Sarah, her son, or George, her brother, possessed or claimed there to be set out to her by Robert Ware and Samuel Fisher, estimated at ten acres, and she to have liberty to take fencing stuff, and is enjoined to keep it sufficiently fenced. The Indian Sarah, and George, her brother, and John, her son, being all present, do all declare themselves to accept of this grant upon these conditions as above expressed." The pond to which Sarah went is supposed to be the small one which we call Uncas Pond, now in Franklin. The men of Dedham thus determined to recompense this Indian woman for the loss of her claim, although they had purchased the land of her sovereign. In 1668, upon complaint made by Samuel Sheeres, a committee was appointed "to repayre to Wollomonopoag to settle the lines between his lot and those of John Alders (Aldis) and Job Farrington."

Sheeres was at this time an inhabitant of Wollomonopoag, having come here to live, according to Rev. Mr. Man's record, about the year 1666. He says, under date of Aug. 12, 1709, "Old Goodman Sheeres died,—a man eighty years and somewhat more,—the first English inhabitant in this town, and who had lived here about forty-three years." The first birth recorded at Wollomonopoag was that of "Mehitabel Sheeres, the daughter of Samuel Sheeres and Mary, his wife," who was born the 1st of February, 1668. It is supposed that Sheeres lived on the place now occupied by Mr. Isaac F. Bennett, on South Street, and that in 1668, John Ware also built on the Bean place and Samuel Fisher on the Luther Fisher place (Mr. Barnes'). John Littlefield also is supposed to have built about this time.

About this time some of the proprietors sold their interests in the lands to such persons as wished to go there and remain as inhabitants or engage in the settlement of the plantation. Sheeres does not appear to have been named as one of those who joined in the first attempt at settlement, but he now became a purchaser. He lived in Dedham, but was not a proprietor. John Thurston, of Medfield, also purchased rights in lands at Wollomonopoag, as it is said, and became active in promoting the settlement. As the proprietors at Dedham conveyed their rights to others, these purchasers of course became independent of them. The proprietors of Dedham and the proprietors of Wollomonopoag were no longer the same.

In order to understand the nature of the land titles here and the meaning of the words (often met) "according to the rule for the division of lands," some further explanation may be necessary. Mr. Worthington, in his history of Dedham, gives a history and an explanation of this matter substantially as follows: The second grant of the General Court, in 1636, for a plantation was made to nineteen persons. These grantees were sole owners until they admitted new associates.¹ At first these were admitted without asking any compensation, lots of land being freely granted them; and after the home-lots of the inhabitants were cleared of wood, leave was asked to cut it from the common lands. In 1642 two hundred acres were made a common tillage-field, in which each proprietor's share should be assigned to him by seven men chosen for that purpose. These men proceeded, not upon any arbitrary rule, but upon the various considerations of personal merit, usefulness, ability to improve, or the amount of taxes paid. Thus the minister had twenty-three acres set off to him, while the deacons had fourteen acres each, and Maj. Lusher modestly received thirteen; other inhabitants taking from eight to one acre each. In 1645 they divided three hundred and seventy-five acres of woodland on the same plan, but in 1656 they ceased to make free grants to strangers of the common lands. This led to the adoption of some rule for division of those lands among the proprietors and their heirs. No one pretended that all should have an equal share. They agreed on this principle, that each man's share should be proportioned to the valuation of his property. They then found that the number of acres in the herd-walks, or cow-commons, was five hundred and thirty-two, and the number of cattle fed thereon somewhat less; and that by allowing one cow-common for every eight pounds' valuation of estate the whole number of cow-common rights or shares would be four hundred and seventy-seven, and this would make the number of cow-commons the nearest to their then number of cattle.

Five sheep-commons were equal to one cow-common, and were used as fractions of a whole right.

This rule bearing hardly on several poor persons, the proprietors so far departed from it as to give them twenty-five more cow-common rights, which, added to the former number, made five hundred and two common rights or shares. This arrangement as thus far made became permanent.

But the proprietors went further, and voted that non-resident owners of land should not have any right to put cattle into the cow-commons, although they should have dividends in the lands. Henry Phillips and some other non-resident owners made complaints. The General Court appointed referees to settle this dispute, the contending parties agreeing. These gentlemen made an award, which they supported by quotations of Scripture, giving to Phillips and other aggrieved persons twelve more cow-common rights, and to the church eight more, making the whole number five hundred and twenty-two. The parties acquiesced in this decision, and the selectmen assigned to the eighty proprietors their due shares. The commissioners further decided that the majority in interest should hereafter govern.

After this decision there were two distinct bodies, the proprietors and inhabitants (including non-proprietors). But for many years this distinction existed only in theory, for there were not for many years people in town who were inhabitants and at the same time non-proprietors. In process of time the two separate bodies had meetings on the same day, and their doings were recorded in the same book. The number of shares determined the number of cattle each could pasture on the common lands, but this privilege was limited to those who belonged to this body of proprietors, which was a sort of a corporation; other persons might be inhabitants of Dedham without having any interest in the common lands. They could acquire an interest in those lands by purchasing of some proprietor. The proprietors had the ownership and power to convey and manage the undivided lands, while the inhabitants took the management of town affairs upon themselves.

These rules regarding the division of lands were, of course, applied throughout the whole township of Dedham, and included the lands at Wollomonopog.

It will be remembered that Dedham had, through Capt. Willett, paid the sagamore Philip, in the year 1662, for his right and title to the lands at Wollomonopog, £24 10s. But Philip now, in 1669, set up a claim to a tract said to be within the limits of his former grant. He addressed the following letter to two of the principal men of Dedham:

"Philip Sachem to Major Lusher and Lieutenant Fisher :

"GENTLEMEN,—Sirs, thes are to desire you to send me a holland shirt by this Indian, the which att present I much want, and in consideration whereof I shall and will assuredly satisfie you to content between this and the next Michelmas, for then I intend to meet with you at Wollomonuppouge, that we may treat about a tract of land of four or five miles square, which I hereby promise and engage that you shall have ye refusall of, and I make no doubt but that we shall agree about said tract of land, which I shall sell you for ye use of your town of Dedham. I pray fail not to send me a good holland shirt by the bearer hereof, for I intend next week to be at plimoth Court, and I want a good shirt to goe in. I shall not further trouble you at present, but subscribe myself your friend,

"PHILIP SACHEM'S P MARK.

"MOUNT HOP, ye 25 May, 1669."

We are not informed whether the liberality or the fears of the good men of Dedham provided Philip with the Holland shirt in which he wished to appear before the wise men of Plymouth; but we find that on "the 8th of the 9th mo., 1669, upon notice from Philip Sagamore yt he is now at Wollomonopouge and offers a treaty about sale of his rights in ye lands yr within the town bounds not yet purchased, A committee was appointed, viz.: Timothy Dwight, Anthony Fisher, Robert Ware, Richard Ellice, and John Thurston, to repayre to Wollomonopogue on the morrow, and treat with the said Philip, in order to a contract with him to clear all his remaining rights within the town bounds, provided he make his right appear, and to secure our town from all other claims of all other Indians in the land contracted for."

It seems that a contract was made, for on the 15th of the same month (November, 1669) a rate was made for the payment to Philip "for his right lately purchased." The sum thus assessed was £17 0s. 8d., to be paid in money. "Tradition informs us that Philip, in this second treaty, showed the northern boundaries of his kingdom, being the southern boundary of the Sachemdom of Chickotabot, in Walpole; and that the shape of the land was somewhat like that of a new moon, enclosing a part of the first grant within its horns." Seventy-nine persons were assessed to pay this rate. Ensign Chickering's tax was the largest, being 11s. 10d. Rev. John Allen's was next in amount, being 8s. 9d. This tax was assessed upon the cow-commons of the proprietors. Adding this £17 0s. 8d. to the sum previously paid through Capt. Willett, we find the whole amount paid to Philip for his title to Wollomonopog was £41 10s. 8d.

Second Attempt at Settlement.—Although, as we have seen, an attempt to settle a colony at Wollomonopog had failed in 1663, yet the idea was not absolutely abandoned. Proof of this is seen in the transactions had in the interim between that date and that which we have now reached,—1669. We instance the drawing of lots, the laying out of a highway, surveying of the meadows, the grant to Indian Sarah, the settling of lines of lots, the purchasing of proprietors' rights, and the second treaty with King Philip.

Although previously to 1669 no white man perhaps, except Samuel Sheeres, had come here to dwell, nevertheless those who had made improvements by breaking up ground, etc., kept their lots or transferred them to others who retained the title.

And now in December, 1669, the proprietors of Wollomonopoag (now independent of the proprietors of Dedham) met at the public-house of Joshua Fisher, in Dedham. This was their first meeting as a body distinct from the proprietors of Dedham. The purpose of the meeting was "to adopt some rules as to the ordering and due management of the said place for the furthering and settling a plantation there." They voted first that "all rates, etc., for defraying public charges hereunder written shall be and remayne in full force to all ends, intents, and purposes to all proprietors there until the intended plantation become a town.

"2d. Every proprietor shall annually pay towards the maintenance of a minister there 1s. 6d. for each cow common right, besides what shall be assessed upon improved land.

"3d. That the libertie to call or invite a minister to exercise to the people there is left to the inhabitants there and such of the principal proprietors as may be advised without difficulty, provided it be by the allowance and consent of the Rev. Mr. Allin, of Dedham, and the ruling Elder of the Church there, and Elea. Lusher.

"4. That a convenient meeting-house shall be built, to which end 2s. per cow-common shall be paid, whereof Mr. Theo. Deane, Capt. Willm Hudson, and Mr. Job Viale promise to pay accordingly in money, which is accepted. John Thurston, Robert Ware, and Sergt. Fuller are appointed a committee for the ordering the building and finishing that meeting-house in convenient time."

The meeting-house was not finished until about the year 1682. But on the 27th of December, 1669, the Rev. Samuel Man was invited to become the minister at Wollomonopoag. The letter of invitation was as follows:

"ESTEEMED SIR,—We, the subscribers, being by the Providence of God proprietors, and some few of us inhabitants in that place called Wollomonopoag, in Dedham, and according to our best observation and understanding concerning that place capable of affording competent subsistence according as the employments of husbandry use to produce to so many families as might be a small town if it be duly improved by an industrious people according to the rule of the word of God, and in his name and fear, and that the kingdom of the Lord Jesus may be enlarged, and several families at present streightened might be relieved, and some benefit might arise to the public, which are the ends we propose to ourselves; these things being considered by us, we thinke it our duty to indeavor the settling a plantation there, so far as lyes in our power, and in order thereto we would in the first place, with the greatest care, provide that the ordinances of the Lord Jesus may be there dispensed and duly attended, that his blessing may be upon us and presence with us, remembering that he have promised that where his name is recorded there he will come and there he will bless his people; and whereas we have already enjoyed encouraging tast of that measure of fitness that God hath bestowed upon yourself to dispense his mind to us in the public ministry of his word, we therefore do jointly declare with one consent we desire you to accept of these few lines as a solemn and unanimous desire and invitation to that work of the ministry of the gospel to us and among us at that place, hoping that though our beginning be small yet our latter end shall much increase; and that knowing that until the house and ordinances of the Lord Jesus be carefully provided for, few, if any, serious godly people, they that we desire to encourage, will be willing to settle themselves there with us, we so much the more earnestly desire you would not refuse our request and wish, and doubt not but that the Lord of his goodness will make us in some measure able and willing to attend the rule of Christ for your due encouragement in all outward supplies; and if you please to accept of this our invitation and earnest desire, we do engage ourselves to be careful not to neglect our duties therein, and such of us as are Inhabitants shall also attend the same according to our proportion in our estates there at such time as we shall reside and dwell there; but wheresoever we, the late proprietors, dwell, we shall be ready and willing to bear charge thereunto according to our late (vote)."

This letter is dated 27th Tenth month, 1669, and was subscribed by thirty-nine names. It was indorsed as follows:

"We whose names are hereunder written declare our approbation of the within invitation, and desire that a blessing from the father of Merceys may be upon it and the work intended.

"ELEA. LUSHER,

"JOHN ALLIN,

"JOHN HUNTING."

Eleazer Lusher, whose name is frequently mentioned in connection with town and proprietary affairs, was a prominent man in the Colony of Massachusetts Bay. In Dedham he was concerned in all important matters, which of course included Wollomonopoag. Hence the invitation to Mr. Man must have his approval. It is said he came to Dedham with Mr. Allin, and was more learned than any other man in town, excepting Mr. Allin. He kept the records, and it is to his care that we are indebted for the facts that have been preserved regarding the settlement here. He was frequently a deputy to the General Court, of which body he was a useful and influential member. He participated in all the momentous affairs of the colony whenever there was occasion for the counsel and services of the wisest and most patriotic.

In April, 1670, the proprietors appointed John Thurston and Samuel Sheeres to be fence-viewers at Wollomonopoag; attended to some complaints against some land-takers outside of the six hundred acres, and voted a dividend of lowlands, fit to be improved for English grass, half an acre to each cow-common, if so much may be found, otherwise less.

At a general meeting of the proprietors held on the 1st of the Second month, 1671, "the question being put, who are the persons that will engage (God willing) that themselves and their families shall be settled at the place called Wollomonopoag, before the end of the fourth month, called June, Anno 1671, persons answering were John Thurston, Thomas Thurston, Robert Ware, John Ware, Joseph Cheeney. It was thereupon voted, that the proprietors desire that these men and John Aldis should settle themselves and their families." They also confirmed the bounds of the plantation as established in 1661, and ordered a book "for the entering such acts as concern Wollomonopoag, and such transcripts as may be made from Dedham town book, and contributed three shillings, sixpence for the purchase, and appointed Eleazer Lusher to make the entries and transcripts and paid him three shillings eightpence in part satisfaction."

It will be noticed that June is called the fourth month. At that time the year commenced on the twenty-fifth day of March throughout his majesty's dominions. In the twenty-fourth year of the reign of George II. (1751), Parliament enacted that the year should begin (after Dec. 31, 1751) on the first day of January next following.

It seems, then, that six persons with their families were to be settled at Wollomonopoag before the end of June, 1671. These, with Samuel Sheeres' family, would make seven families that were probably dwelling here in the wilderness, before the close of 1671.

In January, 1672, a grant for a corn-mill was made. The mill was to be built "upon that stream that comes out of the ponde and runns into Charles River, in the neerest convenient place to the lower ende of the ponde in Wollomonopoag, and made fitte for work, and doe grinde corn as such a mill ought to doe before the first daye of Maye, which shall be Anno 1673, and be so kept and attended that the Inhabitants there be supplied with good meale from time to time of the corne they shall bring to mille." To the builder the whole power of the stream was granted, and he was also to have a house-lot out of any unappropriated land not exceeding ten or twelve acres.

This action was some ten years after the first steps taken by Dedham about the plantation, and tends strongly to show that the first comers were only temporary dwellers, looking after their improvements and returning home when their tasks were done.

This time the settlement began in earnest. The Thurstons, Wares, and others agreed to go up and settle at Wollomonopoag, with their families; the building of a corn mill was provided for, the establishment of a blacksmith,—hardly less important,—and an able and faithful minister was invited.

A committee, of which Maj. Lusher was a member, entered into a contract with Robert Crossman to build a mill on the conditions above stated. Robert engaged for himself and his heirs to build and equip the mill, "God permitting," according to the propositions of the proprietors, whereunto he did subscribe by making his mark.

This was the last service rendered the settlement by Maj. Lusher. His death occurred this year, and in January following a committee was appointed to "recon with Mrs. Lusher for the writing written in the booke by the Hon'd. Major Lusher."

The mill, it seems, made slow progress; for in 1674, Crossman requesting that the land he was to have might be laid out to him, was answered that when he should finish the mill according to his engagement, he should have it laid out by Sergt. Thomas Thurston and others. And in 1680 it was voted that "if Robert Crossman do not speedily put his mill in good repair the inhabitants 'will see out for the procuring another mill.'"

There is a tradition that a son of Crossman was killed below the mill by an Indian, by which the father was so alarmed and discouraged that he abandoned his mill and let it go out of repair. The record of the son's death is as follows: "Nathaniel Crossman, the son of Robert Crossman and Sarah, his wife, was killed by the Enymy Indians, March ye 8, 1675-6."

Anticipating a few years, it appears that in 1685 the grants formerly made to Crossman were conferred upon John Whiting upon similar terms. He was the son of Nathaniel, who had a corn-mill on Mother Brook, in Dedham, and who drew lot number two in the six-hundred acres dividend "not far from the place intended to build a mill at." He did not come to Wollomonopoag. But he must have been the owner of Crossman's rights in the mill, as his widow, Hannah Whiting, conveyed them by her deed to this son John, with other property, describing it as coming to her from her deceased husband, Nathaniel. This deed was dated Nov. 9, 1688, in the fourth year of King James II. John married Dec. 24, 1688, and lived upon the land granted to Crossman, near the outlet of the Great, or Mill Pond.

In the year 1821 the town of Wrentham investigated the question whether the successors of John Whiting, viz., the Eagle Manufacturing Company, were not bound to grind corn, etc., for the inhabitants according to the conditions of the ancient grant to Crossman. It appears in the course of this investigation, from the depositions of Capt. Lewis Whiting, Joseph Whiting, and Jemima Fisher, grandchildren of John Whiting, "that their grandfather built the mill on the present dam on the grant made to Crossman to grind particularly for the inhabitants of Wrentham." And it further appeared that the dwelling-house built and owned by their grandfather, John Whiting, now (1821) owned by Eliphalet Whiting, stands on the two-acre lot granted by the proprietors to their grandfather, John. (Two acres were granted John when he succeeded to Crossman in 1685.) It further appeared that the original site of the corn-mill was some eighty rods above the present dam, one of the deponents saying he had dug out mortised timber there, and seen the remains of a dam, and that such remains were believed to be visible even then (1821). The deponents had been told, and always understood that their grandfather, John, was the son of Nathaniel, of Dedham, and that before he was married, when he was about eighteen years old, he came up from Dedham, and "tended the mill;" and that his mother came with him and purchased all the lands, buildings, and rights of Crossman. These deponents were more than eighty years of age, and must have known their grandfather, John, who died in 1755. That house, the dwelling-house of that John Whiting, some portions of which were erected nearly two hundred years ago, and which were standing in 1821, is still standing, probably the oldest building within the bounds of the plantation, and still in the possession of descendants of John Whiting. It is doubted if a parallel case can be found in the ancient Wollomonopoag.

As to the obligation of the factory owners to grind for the inhabitants, such eminent counselors as William Prescott and Solicitor-General Davis united in the opinion that the owners were under that obligation, and that suits might be maintained against them. But here the matter was dropped. Besides the grain-mill, there were formerly a fulling-mill and a saw-mill where the dam now stands.

The precise time when the first minister, the Rev. Samuel Man, came to abide at Wollomonopoag is not known. The people had, as appears from their letter, heard him preach probably at Dedham, and probably between the date of that letter (1669 and 1672) he preached to the little group of settlers in this wilderness occasionally, if not regularly.¹ However this may have been, in 1672 the proprietors voted that "a rate should be made of 1s. 6d. per cow-common towards the maintenance of the present minister at Wollomonopoag." And the "inhabitants moved there might be a committee chosen to treat with Mr. Samuel Man in reference to his settling and carrying on the worke of the ministrie ther."

After this preliminary step in the most important matter of settling a minister, they began to care for the highways and to procure a blacksmith, next to the miller a man of the greatest importance in the infant settlement.

They, the proprietors, voted to give ten acres of upland for the encouragement of "such a man as may be approved of the calling of a blacksmyth." This was in 1672. But they did not then succeed, for in 1674 they voted "for further incoragement of a blacksmith in case there appere a man that is suffichant workeman and other wayse Incorageabell and do supply the towne with Good and suffichant ware, too acres of meaddow and 2 or 3 acres of low swampy land, on condition that he inhabitt in the toynne 7 years, but if he remove from the town within 10 years the too acres of meadow to returne to the towne againe." And in 1675 a small parcel of meadow containing two acres, lying below "Slate Rock," was left for a smith. This was granted to James Mosman upon the condition of the vote of 1674. The inference is that Mosman was the first blacksmith in the place. But he did not remain here long, and in 1685 it was voted that "considering the want of a blacksmith Sergt. Fisher is requested to treat with Samll. Dearing respecting the same and make report to the town." Two years later the town invited Samuel Dearing "to settle with us to folow the calling of a blacksmith." In 1687 the town, for his encouragement to settle, granted him "liberty of wood for firing and for coal for his worke and feeding and timber for his use upon the comon land so long as he continue in the calling of a blacksmith in the town; this and what was proposed to him att our meeting last year." On the 23d of June, 1688, the inhabitants being at work in the highway, Samuel Dearing also being present, agreed to accept the land assigned for a blacksmith upon the terms stated at the meeting in 1672, and the inhabitants agreed "to confirm said land, and also y^e parcel of meadow and swampy land which was assigned for the encourgement of a smith, to the said Saml. Dearing; and do also appoint a committee to lay out the house-lot of ten acres near the Meeting-House." The committee "did forthwith lay out said ten acres abutting upon the highway in part southwest and near to the land for the Burying place Northeast and common land on all other parts." Other grants and promises of land were also made to him. He decided to locate here. In 1708 he was married to ¹ As he died in 1719, and this was the forty-ninth year of his ministry, as Mr. Bean was informed, he must have commenced about the year 1671.

Mary Man, the daughter and oldest child of the Rev. Samuel Man. Mr. Dearing was one of the selectmen in 1706. He died in 1753, at the good old age of ninety-six. The grant of ten acres made to him includes the land where the present Congregational and Episcopal houses of worship stand.

In 1672 a committee, previously appointed, reported to the proprietors as follows, substantially: "Imprimis, to grant Mr. Man a convenient house-lot out of the public lands, so much as shall arise upon ten cow-commons, and all rights and privileges thereto belonging, as also libertie to choose half his proportion of meadow, the rest to take as other men." Further, the proprietors tender fifty pounds towards building him a house, and the inhabitants engage to pay as they have intimated. This on condition that he settle at Wollomonopoag; but "if he is called to move, then he shall choose two or three men who shall judge and determine what shall be presented to them, and if they agree that his call is clear to remove through default of the people, then Mr. Man shall enjoy the house and all the lands formerly mentioned; but if they do not so judge, and yet Mr. Man remove, then the former grants to return to the proprietors." To these terms Mr. Man agreed as follows: "I do accept of these propositions in case they be performed within the space of a year and a half. (Signed) Samuel Man."

A committee was at the same time chosen to collect the money and build the house.

Such was Mr. Man's settlement. The prospect was not cheerful. His call had been pending some three years. He knew, for he had preached among them, that this small company of farmers could barely maintain themselves and their families. He came into almost a wilderness, where there was not only no meeting-house to receive him, but even no dwelling-house for a shelter and home, and, as Mr. Bean says in his century sermon, only sixteen families.

He was the only son of William Man, who came from Kent County, England, where he was born about the year 1607. He married Mary Jarrard, and settled in Cambridge, Mass. His son Samuel was born there July 6, 1647. He was graduated at Harvard University in 1665; married Esther Ware, of Dedham, in 1673; was employed as a teacher at Dedham, Mass.; ordained at Wrentham April 13, 1692, and died there May 22, 1719, in the seventy-second year of his age and forty-ninth of his ministry. His children were eleven in number, seven sons and four daughters, and, while his descendants must be very numerous, not one is known to bear the name at present in the town.

Incorporation of Wrentham.—In October, 1673, the inhabitants addressed the following petition to the General Court:

"The petition of the Inhabitants of Wollomonopoage humbly sheweth that whereas it hath pleased God by his especial providence to set the place of the habitation of divers of us in a place within the bounds of Dedham where some of us have lived severall years conflicting with the difficulties of a wilderness state, and being a long time without any to dispense the word of God to us, although at last it hath pleased God to send the gospel among us, dispensed by that faithful servant of his, Mr. Samuel Man; but not having power to assess or gather what have been engaged by reason divers live not within the limits of the town, and the constables of Dedham are not willing to gather what has been engaged, neyther is that engaged by Town power, so the pay is not attained, but that work is like to fail and we perish for lack of knowledge unless it please God to move your hearts who are the fathers of the country to take care for us and not for us only but for the interest of God here, now being helpless and hopeless doe yet venture to spread our complaint before your honors desiring you would put forth your power to promote the ordinances of God here. That which we desire and humbly present to your pious consideration is that there may be a committee impowered by this Hon. Court to settle some way for the maintenance of the ministrie, which we doubt not but most of the proprietors in Dedham and elsewhere will readily grant, yet some there are that have rights here seem only to be willing that we should labor under the straights of a new plantation so as to bring their land to a great price, which no other can regulate (that we understand) but yourselves. Therefore we fly to your wisdom and justice for help which no other under God can do. The proprietors also having engaged but for so long as we remain under the town power of Dedham, and Dedham now advising us to endeavor to be of ourselves declaring that they cannot act for us as is necessary in divers cases they living so remote. And if it shall please God so far to move you to help us in this distressed state we humbly further crave to be excused from paying any County rates for 7 or 8 years, we being few and poor and far into the country, and not considerable to the County which will oblige us to serve your honors. We have herewith sent the copies of what the proprietors did engage (which have caused us your petitioners to venture upon these difficulties expecting more would have come to us) which we desire may be ratified till they send inhabitants suitable, or what other way God may direct your wisdom to determine, which shall ever oblige your poor supplyants to pray, &c."

The selectmen of Dedham assented, and upon the 17th day of October, 1673, O. S., the inhabitants were made a town by the name of Wrentham. The selectmen desire, "if the Court see meet to grant them town power, that it may be called Wrentham." Mr. Bean alludes to the tradition extant in 1773 that some of the first settlers here came from Old Wrentham, in England. It is supposed that the Rev. Mr. Philip or Phillips, who left his pulpit in Old Wrentham by reason of the persecutions of 1636-38, came to Dedham, and that he received an invitation to the ministry in Dedham in 1638, but did not accept it. After being in Dedham and perhaps other places about a year he returned to his native land and resumed his pastoral duties in his former parish. It is said that upon his voyage hither he was attended by "a goodly company," others also from Old Wrentham, England, having preceded him. The names of Thurston and Paine are particularly mentioned. These brought "an account of the state of affairs in Wrentham on which the Christian people of Dedham in that country invited him by letter to that plantation beforehand, so that when he arrived his friends there did expect and much endeavor to obtain his guidance in the first beginning of their ecclesiastical relationship."

In the petition of the inhabitants their leading thought seems to have been the maintenance of the minister. They asked for town power that rates might be made and collected for this purpose. "Spiritual affairs were ever first in the minds of the Puritans." "It being as unnatural for a right New England man to live without an able ministry as for a smith to work his iron without a fire." And the General Court "judgeth it meet to give the petitioners all due encouragement conduceable to their settlement with the present minister, according to their desires."

The minister was the principal person in town; the real head of the people. His advice was sought in matters temporal as well as spiritual. Usually he was the only learned man in these primitive settlements. As the freemen must be church-members, it may be conceded that his influence must have been almost without limit.

The early comers to Massachusetts established a church after their own choice, and the civil polity was in subordination to the ecclesiastical.

In the resolve of Oct. 17, 1673, the General Court granted "all the liberties and privileges of a township," with the boundaries heretofore agreed upon between the inhabitants and Dedham. Wrentham thus became independent of Dedham. But yet the inhabitants were not considered competent to manage their town affairs, and the Court placed them under the guardianship of a committee, "for the better carrying in end of their prudential affairs," etc., and appointed Capt. Hopesstill Foster, Mr. William Park, and Ensign Daniel Fisher to be the committee. They were to be joined with any two of the inhabitants that might be chosen, and the acts of said committee or the major part of them were "to be valid, and their power to continue till the Court take further order." And Wrentham was exempted from county rates for four years.

John and Thomas Thurston were chosen by the inhabitants "to joyne with the committee appointed by the Court."

Organization of the Town.—We now leave our Indian cognomen of Wollomonopog. Hereafter the name given by the General Court is to be our designation. On the 4th day of December, 1673, the committee (for ordering the affairs of the town called Wrentham, near unto Dedham) met and ordered as followeth :

"1. Thomas Thurston to have the town book and make record of such orders as have passed respecting said plantation, etc.

"2. Property holders there shall pay 1s. 6d. for every cow-common for support of the minister, according to a previous vote.

"3. £50 to be assessed upon the proprietors towards building him a house, according to an act past by them y^e 31 June, '72.

"4. All former committees to continue the work committed to them heretofore, as to laying out highways, etc.

"5. That the order in Dedham Town Book referring to the admitting inhabitants, made June 1, '66, be transcribed in this town book, to be an order for the town of Wrentham as to all intents and purposes therein contained.

"Subscribed. Per order of Gen. Court.

"HOPESTILL FOSTER,

"WILLIAM PARK,

"DANIEL FISHER,

"JOHN THURSTON."

The important order referred to by the committee was in substance as follows :

"Whereas, towns have suffered from the entertainment of persons privately, and as this town is liable to like inconvenience, therefore for the prevention thereof, it is ordered that no inhabitant of the town, or tenant of any house, lands, &c., shall after due publication hereof, grant, sell, alienate, lease, assign, sett, or to farme lett any house, lands or parcels of land whatsoever within said town &c., to any persons not formerly dwelling within our town, nor shall hire any out of town person for a servant by the yeare or any apprentice for more than two months without the leave of the Committee or the Selectmen, without such 'securitie' for the 'town's indemnitie' as said Committee or Selectmen shall accept. Notice shall be given of all such contracts made or intended to some one of the Committee or selectmen, and if not forbidden within a month then the party may proceed therein. But if being forbidden, he shall, notwithstanding proceed to contract or entertain contrary to this order, or shall fail to give notice as above provided, he shall for every month so continuing forfeit to the use of the Towne twenty shillings to be levied upon his goods by the constable by warrant from the Committee or Selectmen or be recoverable by action at law."

Such an order sounds very strangely in these days. But two hundred years ago such regulations conformed to the sentiment prevalent in the Colony of Massachusetts Bay.

And in 1692 a law of the province gave settlement to persons who sojourned in any town three months without having been warned by the constable to depart. And in 1736 it was enacted that the inhabitants who took in strangers should in twenty days notify the selectmen thereof. Prior to these enactments it seems that the towns adopted orders upon the whole subject of the admittance of inhabitants, servants, and apprentices. At this time notifications and warnings were not very frequent; Wrentham being "far into the country," few strangers probably found their way hither. Later in its history arrivals were more numerous and warnings more frequent. One is here copied:

"WRENTHAM, January the 20, 1758.

"We the subscribers would In Form the Selecttmen In Behalf our Honored Father Pelatiah man that He Hez brought into This Towne from Dedham gilyard Morse and Taffey Morse children of the late Widow Morse.

"DANIEL MAN,
"MILATIAH MAN."

Having progressed thus far the inhabitants had a general meeting in February, 1673-74, and passed votes as to the mode of assessing estates for the support of the minister, requesting of the church in Dedham the use of their lands here for Mr. Man, for preventing the waste of timber, for repair of highways, and for fencing the lots of settlers. John Thurston was chosen surveyor of highways; Samuel Sheeres and Joseph Kingsbury, fence-viewers. Measures were also taken for herding cattle, for keeping out-of-town cattle off the common lands, for the ringing of swine, and for building a pound.

In 1674 an Indian named Matchinamook asked that he might have some place to live in, and "full liberty" was granted him "to go to a place called Harry's Plantation, or at the head of Ten-Mile River, near to the Pattene Line, there to improve three or four acres of land during his lifetime."

All these votes were subject to the approval of the court's committee. In this year some further negotiations were had with Crossman regarding the corn-mill, as previously related; and in 1674 and 1675 the votes for the encouragement of a blacksmith were passed.

This latter year was undoubtedly one of anxiety to the little town of Wrentham. "Early in the spring of 1675," says Drake, "Sassamon's body was found in Assawomset Pond, in Middleborough." He was an Indian preacher, a professed convert to Christianity, who had learned something of the English tongue. Having learned from his countrymen that they intended to make war upon the English, he communicated that knowledge to the Governor of Plymouth, and by Indian laws this forfeited his life. Three Indians were executed for this murder on the 8th day of June, 1675, according to the same authority, the act having been committed Jan. 29, 1675, N. S. Until this execution the natives had not engaged in any acts of open hostilities. But soon afterwards Swanzy was attacked and nine of her inhabitants killed, and on the 24th of June the abandoned houses were burnt. Soon afterwards a part of Taunton, Middleborough, and Dartmouth were destroyed. Mendon was also attacked, and it is said four or five persons killed.

In 1675-76 the General Court, in consideration that many Indians were "skulking about our plantations, doing much mischief and damage," offered a bounty of three pounds per head, or the Indian so taken, to every person who should surprise, slay, or bring in prisoner any such Indian."

It was probably about this time, and not long before their withdrawal, that the valorous little colony covered itself with glory in the famous attack at Indian Rock. The story is as follows:

A man by the name of Rocket being in search of a strayed horse in the woods, about three miles north-east from Wrentham village, discovered a trail of Indians, forty-two in number, towards the close of the day directing their course westward. Rocket, undiscovered, followed the trail until about the setting of the sun when they halted, evidently with a design to lodge for the night. The spot chosen was well situated to secure them from a discovery. Rocket watched their movements until they laid themselves down to rest, when with speed he returned to the settlement and notified the inhabitants. They being collected, a consultation was held, whereupon (the women, the infirm, and the children being secured in the fortified houses) it was agreed to attack the Indians early the next morning. The little army consisted of thirteen; at its head was a Capt. Ware. Rocket was its guide. They arrived upon the ground before daylight, and were posted within a short musket-shot of the encamped Indians, with orders to reserve their fire until the Indians should arise. Between daybreak and sunrise the Indians rose, nearly all at the same time; when, upon the signal given, a full discharge was made, which, with the sudden and unexpected attack and slaughter, put the Indians into the greatest consternation, so that in their confusion, attempting to effect their escape in a direction opposite to that from which the attack was made, several were so maimed by leaping down a precipice from ten to twenty-feet among the rocks that they became an easy sacrifice. Some of the fugitives were overtaken and slain. And it is related that two of them being closely pursued, in order to elude their followers, buried their bodies all except their heads in the waters of Millbrook (about one mile from the first scene of action), where they were killed. It is probable that these were likewise injured by their precipitation from the rock. One Woodcock discharged his long musket called a buccaneer at a single fugitive Indian at the distance of eighty rods, and broke his thigh-bone and afterwards dispatched him. After the battle there were numbered of the Indians killed upon the field or by the fall from the rock, twenty; some say twenty-four. Not one of the inhabitants was killed.

Dr. James Mann, to whom we are indebted for this account of the fight at Indian Rock, says there is an intelligent man eighty-seven years of age (Deacon Thomas Mann), who in his youth was acquainted with Rocket, and perfectly well remembers that on account of the above adventurous deed he received during his life an annual pension from the General Court. A granddaughter of Capt. Ware, of the name of Clap, was also living, aged ninety-four years, who well recollected to have heard the story related when quite young, as a transaction in which her grandfather bore a conspicuous part. He adds there are men now living (at the date of his communication) who well remember to have seen bones in abundance of the unburied Indians left upon the spot where the action happened.

In March, 1676, the inhabitants left their homes, so lately established here and with so much difficulty, on account of the alarming attitude of the natives. Up to this date eighteen births had been recorded, and the small number of families who were without any means of defense against the savages prudently withdrew. The war against the English was now fairly initiated by Philip. Having stirred up the native Indians from Mount Hope to Hadley, he led them against the settlements of the whites, and prolonged the contest for nearly a year. The settlements were brought to the verge of destruction. Twelve or thirteen towns were entirely ruined, six hundred houses burned, and six hundred men fell in battle. The neighboring town of Medfield was attacked and some twenty whites killed, and more than half the houses were burned or otherwise destroyed. Wrentham lay in the track from Mount Hope to Medfield, and was in danger. The withdrawal of the inhabitants was in season; "no lives were cut off by the heathen." But the Indians came after the inhabitants were gone, and burned all their dwellings but two, which were saved because, according to tradition, the party attacking believed they had been infected with the smallpox.

We get some knowledge of the condition of our town, and of the manner of administering its affairs more than two hundred years ago, from the record of a town-meeting held before the inhabitants abandoned the place, viz., in 1674-75. At this meeting

"Samuel Fisher was appointed to take down in writing what shall be agreed on this day." It was ordered that a list of voters should be made, and absentees from town-meetings were to be fined; grants of land were to be recorded; fences three feet high, and sufficient to turn lawful cattle, should be built; cattle should be herded and a herdsman appointed, the minister's salary provided for, and additions made to it as inhabitants and improvements should increase, that the meadows should be laid out; that births, marriages, and deaths should be registered; appointed surveyors of highways and fence-viewers, and men to burn the woods. They also voted that Mr. Man should have his ten cow-commons heretofore promised, and that four days' work should be done upon the highway. These votes were approved by the committee, of which it will be remembered two of the inhabitants were members, whose importance in the little community was thus recognized and acknowledged. One of these was Samuel Fisher, who was appointed also to keep a register of births, marriages, and deaths. Even thus early a list of voters was to be made, and under the laws of the colony but little difficulty could arise in determining who were voters.

The General Court ordered, "to the end that the body of commons may be preserved of honest and good men, that noe man shall be admitted to the freedom of this body politicke but such as are members of some of the churches within the lymitts of the same." And in 1635, "that none but freemen shall have any vote in any towne in any action of authority or necessity," etc.; and "for the yearly choosing of assistants the freemen shall use Indian corn and beans, the corn to manifest election, the beans contrary." Quakers and others who refused to attend public worship were made "incapable of voting in all civil assemblise during their obstinate persisting in such wicked ways and courses and until certificate be given of their reformation."

It was voted upon Mr. Man's request, in 1675, that the common rights and lands heretofore granted to him for improvement should become his absolutely if he remained in Wrentham seven years. Cornelius and Samuel Fisher bargained for his ten cow-commons, agreeing to pay therefor five pounds and five shillings—£1 10s. in wheat, five shillings in money, and £3 10s. in merchantable Indian corn.

The last meeting of the inhabitants prior to abandonment of the place was holden on the 19th of January, 1675-76, and on March 30th they left on account of the Indian war.¹

¹ The book-keeper made this entry: "March ye 30, 1676, ye inhabitants ware drawn of by rason of ye Endian worre."

And on the 2d of February, 1675-76, the Prudential Committee met and appointed the first Tuesday in March following to be a meeting of the proprietors at Dedham in reference to their replanting there again. On the 6th of March, 1677, at the proprietors' meeting in Dedham, the question being put whether "they would go on with Wrentham plantation again if there were peaceable times," the answer was by all present that they would bear charges there as formerly, and divers of them expressed themselves "willing to return if Mr. Man would return with them, and a considerable number would ingage in that worke." Upon further debate it was decided that a committee be chosen to present the case of Wrentham to the honorable General Court for their advice and concurrence in order to the rebuilding the towne again."

They also made a division of their meadow lands. In this division only forty-five persons drew lots. In 1660 the number of proprietors was eighty. Sixteen years had made changes in the ownership of lands.

From this time until January, 1677, no important public transactions concerning Wrentham took place. At that time the "Proprietors and those that were formerly inhabitants of Wrentham" met, and the inhabitants were asked whether "they would go on to rebuild and inhabitt Wrentham." Their answer was as follows:

"We, whose names are hereunto subscribed, having formerly had our residence in Wrentham, but by those sad and sollame dispensations of God's providence were removed, yet desire a worke for the honour of God and the good and comfort of ourselves and ours might be again ingaged in and promoted att that place. Therefore our purpose is to returne thither, God willing. But knowing our own inability for so great and waytie a worke, both in respect of our insufficiency for the caring on of new plantation worke, and the dainger that may yet be renewed upon us by the heathins breaking out on us, thinke it not saffe for us to returne alone, except other of the proprietors joyne to go up along with us, or send inhabitants to ingage in that work with us." Subscribed by Elizcar Metcalf, Daniell Haws, Daniell Wight, Saml. Fisher, William Macknah, Elizcar Gay, Samuel Man, Cornelius Fisher, Joseph Kingsbury, Robert Ware, John Aldis, John Payne, Benjn. Rocket, Nath. Ware, John Ware, Michell Wilson, Samuel Sheeres.

This faithful record informs us who the first inhabitants were. And although driven from their homes by the "heathins" and obliged to take quarters with their Dedham friends, they nevertheless preserved their organization, choosing John Ware and Samuel Fisher to join with the court's committee, Eleazar Gay, constable, and the faithful Samuel Fisher to keep the town book.

The proprietors responded favorably to the appeal of the inhabitants, and a committee was appointed to treat with Mr. Man. He very wisely required that a goodly number of competent persons should go back as a principal condition of his own return; and also that a suitable dwelling-house should be prepared for him; that there should be no delay as heretofore in the payment of his salary. This of the proprietors. Another condition of great importance he annexed, to wit: that they should sell their interest to settlers in good faith. Other conditions were made to the proposed inhabitants, such as the improvement of his land, providing fifty loads of wood, care of his cattle, and a chosen manager of his out-door business. And if they failed to perform these he was to be at liberty.

As to the first proposition, it was stated that the former inhabitants have determined to return to Wrentham, and that others purpose to join them, and that this is all the "incouragement that can at present be expected." The other terms were substantially accepted by both the proprietors and inhabitants.

A rate was made probably in 1679 for the building of Mr. Man's house at two shillings per common. Forty-five were taxed for this purpose, including the church at Dedham. The amount assessed was fifty-two pounds fifteen shillings and sevenpence, of which fourpence per common was to be paid in money, the rest to be one-third part in wheat and rye, the other two-thirds in Indian corn. Mr. Man himself was taxed one pound. John Thurston, a non-resident, it seems was the largest taxpayer, the amount assessed him being three pounds sixteen shillings.

In 1680 a house-lot and ten cow-commons, with the privileges thereto belonging, were granted to Mr. Man, to be "absolutely his." Constables were made to account for the rates collected by them, and it was determined that highways should be made through the six hundred acres. Rules also for supplying Mr. Man's wood were adopted. Votes for the preservation of grass upon the common lands, for the encouragement of a saw-mill, for a clerk of the rietts (writs), and a brand-mark for their cattle. The book-keeper was ordered to procure a "copy of the purchase of Wrentham, Indian title, when and of whom it was purched" (purchased). Mr. Man was to have the benefit of the church-lot. Constables, fence-viewers, book-keeper, etc., were appointed. A herd of milch cows was to be kept "in the towne." On account of the scarcity of timber no one could cut off the common land upon penalty of five shillings per tree. Lands were to be fenced in general fields, each man bearing his proportion of the expense, according to the number of his acres. Bounds between town and individuals were to be renewed once in three years.

A part of the former inhabitants had returned in March, 1680, as appears from the following entry of the book-keeper: "The inhabitants, such as were then come to Wrentham being meat [met] to agree of raising an addition for the finishing Mr. Man's house and chimnis according as they had formerly ingaged, they agreed that a rate should be made for that end, and that it should be leavied upon the commons, for that several of them that had ingaged whose names are upon record were not yett come to dwell here and thereby theire rateabell estate is not in towne."

The First Meeting-House.—In March, 1681, the committee having met at Dedham, and being informed that the inhabitants of Wrentham were suffering "great inconvenience for want of a suitable place to attend the worship of God, it is ordered that a convenient house be forthwith erected." The cost was to be borne in part by the proprietors and in part by the inhabitants. In March, 1682, they concluded that,—

"The bigness of the house shall be as followeth, viz., 36 foote in length and 26 foot wide, with 16 foot stude suffichantly brasted (braced) and all other suffichant timber suitabel for such an house; to stand the north side of Mr. Man's house. And they granted to John Woodcock a parcel of land as nere the place where the meeting-house shall stand as may be conveniently had, that he might sett a small house up for theire refreshment on the Sabbath day when they come to attend upon the worship of God."

This was the first vote regarding the building of the meeting-house, which they thought might be inclosed by the 15th of September next following and finished by March 1, 1684, but a dozen years had passed before its completion.

In 1684, to "prevent unnecessary discourse," a committee was appointed to ascertain what debts were due to and from the town before the war, and to do as God shall direct them." They also ordered three dividends of land, viz., timber and woodland, plowland, and meadow or swamp land; and having chosen their book-keeper, prudential committee, constable, and agent for the minister's business, they chose also a committee to assess a tax for the payment of his salary, the only object for which a tax was at this time assessed, there being no school at this early period, and the highways being made and repaired by the personal labor of the inhabitants. A committee was appointed to "looke to the boys upon the Sabbath in time of exercise to keep y^m from playing and also to sweep the meeting-house."

Liberty was given to certain persons to build a gallery in the meeting-house. It thus appears that this first meeting-house was erected and occupied in 1684, although far from being finished.

In 1685 there was a general meeting of the proprietors and inhabitants "att Wrentham meeting hous," when it was determined that the common land between the two great ponds "shall lie common for the proprietors." Secondly, that they would "sett out four or six acres of their now common land near the metting hous, with twenty or twenty-five acres of other upland and swamp or swampy land for the encouragement of a school, which was not to be diverted to any other use or purpose whatsoever." These lands and the proceeds of their sale, let it be said to the honor of the good people of this town, never have been diverted by them from the use to which they were thus applied, but now make a part of the fund whose income is appropriated to the support of schools.

It was ordered that the meeting-house should be used for a watch-house. They provided also for a stock of ammunition, voted to establish the stocks for the punishment of offenders, to pay for "billiting" soldiers at the time of the Indian war, and to pay bounties for "wolves that have been killed." Eleven wolves were killed. John Ware was allowed one pound four shillings and ninepence for his disbursements or services in building Mr. Man's first house, from which it would seem that Mr. Man had been a householder here before Philip's war, his first house having been burned by the Indians.

In the same year the inhabitants presented a petition to the General Court praying that they might be authorized to chose selectmen, as in other places, representing that the committee appointed to have the care over them, although very useful in "yt capacity, yet they are crazy and infirme in body, and cannot be got together so often as we stand in need of, etc."

The General Court in answer granted "that they may have liberty to chous men as in other places."

In 1686, selectmen were chosen for the first time. They were Samuel Fisher, John Blake, John Fairbanks, John Guild, and John Ware. And now the town began its real independent existence, being deemed at last capable of acting without guardians. They appointed a committee "to goe the bounds between Dorchester and Wrentham, and renewe the markes as the law directes." They voted bounties for killing blackbirds, adopted orders concerning cedar timber, and fined certain persons for neglecting work upon the highways and for cutting grass upon common land and for other trespasses. The town had at this time forty-two pounds of powder and one hundred of lead. A committee was appointed to go to Rehoboth (since Attleborough), and examine the title to lands in the west part of the town. There was but little money in the plantation, and the salary of the good minister was so much in arrear that the town "doe nominate their friend and neighbor, Sargt. Samuel Fisher and do desire and impour him to demand and upon refusal to address himself to ye Governor and Council for advice and make his report to the Town."

On the 1st day of March, 1687, there was a meeting of the inhabitants "to consider the matter of clearing the Enden [Indian] title to their lands." Samuel Fisher and John Ware were chosen a committee "to take care in the town's behalf and manage the clearing and confirmation of the Town's title to ye lands in ye town bounds according to ye agreement with Dedham at the first settling of Wrentham."

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE.—"Forasmuch as Thomas Awasamogue a Natick Indian in the last year being 1687, made claim to some of our lands which was bought of Philip Sagamor and payd for according as the law then provided for ye Endians the town being called together to consult y^e own interest, ther was a committee chosen to inquire into the matter, which Committee (after some inquiring and also treating with said Thos. Awasamogue) presented to the town divers Evidances [evidences] and wrightings both of English and Endians for ye making the thing mor clear which Evidances are insarted as followeth.

Then follow sundry depositions,—

1. "Nathaniel Colburn, aged 70 years and upward (Dedham, March, 1687), testifie that I, being at Wollomonopogue when King Philip did make sale of thos lands, which ware in ye bounds of Dedham, to those men which Dedham Selectmen had sent up to trade with King Philip respecting ye same, and

I did see King Philip seal the deed in ye presents of divers Endens (Indians), who, he said, ware of his council."

2. "An Indian, called Joseph, aged 46 years or more (Wrentham, March, 1687), who testifie that when I was a young man I did live at Wollomonopogue, and was one of Philip's men. And I know that Philip, our Sachem, his hunting land was from Mashapogue pond, & so along to a hill, called by ye English Noon hill, & so to ye grat River, called by ye English Charles River, & so up y^e River to a River att Sichsopogue, and up to Sanetcheconet and ye land belonging to Wollomonopog, all y^s lands I know was Philip's, and that he sold it to Dedham men. I was at Wollomonopog when Dedham men bargained for it, and farther, when I was a boy, my grandfather lived at Pabeluttock, and payed tribute to Philip."

3. "Sampson, an Indian, aged 55 years, and Deask, aged 40 years (Bristol, March, 1687), testifie and saith that we, having had some knowledge of the bounds of the lands which sometime did belong to Philip Sagamore, and it was always accounted that in the north or norwest part, his bounds went from Mashapogue pond, and so to Wawwatabseutt, and yn (then) Pabanutuck, and to Bappatocket, & yn to Nihoquicag, and from thens straight away to Pontucket River, and that these places was Philip's propariate, being his outmost bounds that way, and further saith, that ye Indians y^e dwelt ther did pay tribute to Philip. When they killed a bare they brought it to Philip.

"Roben, a Tanton Endian, & his squay testifie the same. John Doggett testifie that Nihaquag was in Philip's bounds."

4. "The testimony of an Indian called Labcock, aged 86 years (Decem. 24, 1686), who saith he knew all the lands here described to be aforetime Wassomeakin's (Massasoit), and after Philip, his son's. The bounds Eastward was at Mashapogue pond, and so from ye middle of that pond Northward over a high hill, and straight along to another great hill into Medfield ward, a hill called by the English Noon hill, and from that hill straight along to ye great River, called by ye English Charles River, and up y^e River, to a pond and a little hill, which was by the Indians called Pabaluttock, wher was of old a hill field; and further, his land was to Seanchapogue River, & so bake again southward to Senecheconet, and all y^e land called Wollomonopogue. I say I know all this land was, after Wassamakin's death, Philip's land, and that all Indians that lived ther when Philip was alive called him Sachem and payd tribut to him; and further, I hard Philip say that he had sold thos lands to Massachusetts men, and had no more to doe ther, and I did see Philip's men when they brought the pay to Philip.

5. "John Daggett, of Rehoboth, aged 64 years (Wrentham, March, 1687), testifie, that in former times, as I had frequent convers with the Indians upon Ocasion I was att a great meeting of ye Indians, or an Indian dance, where yr (there) was present Ansemakin, Sagamore of Mount hope, and Philip, his son, who was afterwards Sagamore, and a great number of Indians, and I did then understand that there was a bussell or controversie amongst ym, and many large words about ye Right of land, and after long debate the conclusion was, that from Pontuequet River and so northward by a small river near Seanchapogue, at least eight or ten miles, and y^e (then) about Eastward, and so to Mashapogue pond, was and should be Ansemakin's land. Ys (this) meeting was, as nere as I can remember, upwards of 30 or nere 40 years since, and was on the land in controversie."

Land Titles.—In 1688 all grants of land were to be in fee simple. This year the salary of Mr. Man was to be forty pounds, one-fourth in money, one-fourth in English grain, and the other half in country payment. Ten persons agreed to pay certain sums towards the salary, twenty-six requested to be taxed their proportional parts. It would seem, therefore, that there were thirty-six taxpayers living here at this time. Of these, Ensign Blake was the wealthiest.

Public officers made moderate charges for their services in 1688. Lieut. Fisher, for going to Mendon two days and to Dedham and Boston five days, charged twelve shillings. John Ware, for going to Swanze, Brestol, and Tanton five days, to Dedham and Boston four days, eighteen shillings.

In the assessment in December, 1688, for paying the expenses of clearing the Indian title, which was to be borne by proprietors as well as inhabitants, but few names except those of inhabitants appear. Mr. Man's policy that non-resident proprietors should sell out their interest in the lands here had prevailed. The tax also was for a black staff, for wine and ale measures, scales and beam, and for some finishing of the meeting-house, and other things for which the town is indebted. The black staff was for the constable, whose duty it was "to carry his black staff in the execution of his office that none may plead ignorance."

Burial-Ground.—When the proprietors in 1689 laid out to Samuel Dearing the blacksmith the ten acres promised him, "sufficient land for to bury in, one acre and a half at least, and a leading way to it," was reserved. This was pursuant to the reservation made at the original planting of Wollomonopog. No more specific statement of the quantity of land reserved for this use has been found. The southeast corner of Dearing's house-lot "touched on the burying-ground." It was no doubt near the site occupied by Mr. Harlow. Although the proprietors appointed a committee to lay out the burying-ground, yet in 1795 no report of such committee could be found, but the yard was found to be included in the lands of Cyrus Guild, and an agreement was then made with Guild as to boundaries, leaving three acres and four rods for burial purposes. The old cemetery has recently been enlarged by the annexation of more of the land originally owned by Cyrus Guild. The ancient yard is filled with the dust of generations that have lived and died since Samuel Sheeres first came to Wollomonopog. But not altogether in quiet; modern improvement is reported to have driven its plowshare over their ashes.

"The rude forefathers of the hamlet sleep"

In the westerly part of the town (now Franklin) one acre was laid out for a burying-place, "bounded on the way leading from Capt. Robert Pond's along by Eleazer Metcalf's, north on the land of Baruch Pond, eastward by common land on all other parts." Laid out March 28, 1735.

In 1689 the town made provision for the first person requiring help as a pauper. The constable was ordered to "convey out of town a woman of late come from Boston to Mr. Blake's, unless she forthwith give bond with sufficient sureties for the securitie of the town."

Richard Puffer agreed to take the above-mentioned pauper for one year, and was to have "three pounds & ten shillings in Country pay, and in case she should larn to spin and card yn (then) yr (there) shall be consideration on yt account of ten or twenty shillings as may be meet."

The meeting-house was still unfinished in 1690. It was then voted that "it should be shingled on or before the 20th of June, 1690, the walls lathed, plastered, and white-limed, two galleries finished, and the windows gleased (glazed)." Watchmen were to walk two together "of a night" from the meeting-house eastward and westward "not exceeding half a mile." The law of 1636 required them to examine all night-walkers after ten o'clock at night, unless they be known peaceable inhabitants; to inquire whither they are going and what their business is, and, if their answers are unsatisfactory, they were to be held securely until the next morning and carried before a magistrate to answer, etc.; and to secure any one after ten o'clock at night behaving "debauched by" or being "in drink." In short, like Dogberry's posse, these worthy officers were

"To comprehend all vagrom men."

And, further, they were "to see all noises stilled and lights put out (except upon necessary occasions) for the prevention of fire as much as may be."

A circumstance illustrative of the spirit of the time happened in the case of Benjamin Force in 1691: Cornelius Fisher, having informed the selectmen that he intended to let Force into his house as a tenant, was ordered to make no contract with him until the selectmen should be satisfied, or that his stay in town should be limited, at least. This order was, however, in strict conformity to the rule adopted by the town, as set forth upon a previous page.

A tax was assessed of thirty-six pounds for Mr. Man's salary, he being entitled to forty pounds, "having reseved order from y^e Revt. Mr. Man to make it no more respecting the waight of publike charges."

The next year we find the inhabitants engaged in their ordinary affairs, including the perambulation of the town lines between Wrentham and Dorchester, and Medfield and Wrentham, Dedham and Wrentham. The young settlement had now become able to contribute to public charges, and was assessed £135 16s. 4d. as its part of a county tax. This tax-list contained forty-two names, John Blake's having the largest sum set against it, viz., £9 11s. Lieut. Fisher's tax was £6 2s. 9d.

In some discussion concerning a way to Mischow meadow, it was said it would be of great use to other meadows that way, one of which was the meadow at the mine. We get from this statement an idea as to the location of the mine, and infer that it was in the westerly part of the town; but as to its character, whether it was a gold-, silver-, copper-, lead-, or coal-mine, we are not informed.¹

One Dr. James Stuerd (Stewart), with his family, having taken up his residence at the house of Eleazer Gay, an admonition went swiftly from the selectmen to Eleazer that he must be responsible for this bold physician and his family according to the town's orders. It is probable that the forty-two householders,—an obstinately healthy people—gave poor encouragement to a medical man, so that the worthy selectmen of that day most prudently prevented Dr. Stuerd from becoming an inhabitant unless the required security should be given.

In 1692 some new regulations were made concerning the admission of inhabitants. New-comers were required to present themselves to the selectmen and bring with them certificates of their good behavior and honest vocation, and especially of their ability to get a "livelihood." And if strangers failed thus to satisfy the selectmen, or to give sureties, they were to be warned out of town, and in case of their neglect or delay, they were to be "sent out of said town bounds by y^e constable."

Thomas Young, having desired to be admitted an inhabitant, the selectmen answer him that as they do not desire to be rash in any proceeding, they will postpone the consideration of his case three weeks, and, if he shall then satisfy them by certificate or otherwise, then to be admitted.

At the annual town-meetings the list of voters was to be read by ten o'clock A.M., and the absentees to be fined.

A town-meeting was called on the 28th of April, 1692, "by sun half an hour high in the morning to consider the subject of seating the people in the meeting-hous."

The town compensated Deacon Samuel Fisher and Cornelius Fisher, for their services as representatives to the General Court, by the payment of seven pounds and fifteen shillings; and allowed Samuel Fisher, for his disbursements for "Diat," etc., fifteen shillings for something more than two weeks, his horsekeeping included; and Cornelius Fisher, for "Diat," drink, and other necessities, one pound, fifteen shillings, and four pence for about four weeks, including his horsekeeping.

In 1693 the towns of Rehoboth (Attleborough) and Wrentham renewed their bound marks, being occupied three days in the matter, and beginning at Pawtucket River. Afterwards the selectmen were directed "to let out the common meadow on the south side of Dimon Hill nere Rehoboth line till the town otherwais dispose of it." Showing that a part of what is now Cumberland, R. I., was within the limits of Wrentham.

It was now, 1693, voted that the annual town-meetings should hereafter be holden on the first Monday of March, and this continued to be the day of those meetings for about one hundred and eighty-five years.

A new corn-mill was established at Jack's Pasture, now the site of the City Mills.

A similar grant of stream, land, and privileges was made to any one who would erect "a good and sufficient corn-mill at Stony Brook."

It was not until the year 1695 that any steps were taken towards the building of a school-house. At this time the voters determined to build a watch-house, which should serve the purpose of a school-house also. It was "to be so bigg as y^e y^e (that there) may be a room of sixteen foot squar besides convenient room for a chimney." Galleries were to be finished in the meeting-house and the people to be placed therein, and Eleazer Fisher was to sweep it, take care of the cushion, and provide a lock for the door.

People were occasionally warned to leave town, six having been so warned from 1696 to 1699.

Two dividends of land made in 1698 are instructive. The first was of timber land, consisting of only one and one-half acre to each cow-common. Seeming to prove a scarcity of timber land. And we also may add that the proprietors at different times made regulations concerning the use of timber, and for preventing trespasses and waste thereof. The second dividend was called the great dividend, being seven acres to each cow-common right. A corrected list of the commons was prepared in order to this dividend in October, 1697, and it was found that the whole number of cow-commons was five hundred and two (502), and of sheep-commons thirty-one and one-half (31½), and that the number of proprietors was sixty-three (63). In this "divident" fifty-eight lots were drawn—one being the church lot. All but fifteen of the remainder were drawn by inhabitants and by John Thurston, who drew twenty. The non-resident proprietors had at this date become reduced to a small number, and the little community was really becoming independent.

Upon consultation with Mr. Man, the selectmen decided that there should be "a contribution on the Lord's day, after the evening exercise, toward defraying his salary." The people had been very negligent about paying him. The constables were often behind in their collections, and many "reckonings" were had with them on this account. The towns in New England were often delinquent in this respect. An anecdote of the Rev. Jonathan French is told by President Quincy substantially as follows: "The parish were bound to find him in wood; the winter was coming on, and they had neglected to furnish it. Experience had taught him that a direct complaint would be useless. He waited therefore until the proclamation for Thanksgiving came, and after reading it to the congregation he said, with great apparent simplicity, 'My brethren, you perceive that his Excellency has appointed next Thursday as a day of Thanksgiving, and according to custom it is my purpose to prepare two discourses for the occasion, provided I can write them without a fire.' The hint took effect, and before twelve o'clock on the succeeding Monday his whole winter's stock of wood was in his door-yard.

A committee was appointed "to take care of the common meadow about Diamon Hill for the town's use." Jurisdiction was taken by Wrentham over this part of Rehoboth (now Cumberland, R. I.). The names of people born on territory now included within the limits of Cumberland were entered upon the books of the record of births, etc., in Wrentham; especially was this the case with the name of Ballou.

In the same year (1698) the selectmen, acting for the first time in the name of the overseers of the poor, contracted with Ben Rocket to keep Hannah Kingsbury, a distracted or idiotic person, for one year for £3 10s. in money. In 1701 the number of taxpayers was fifty-four.

A town-meeting was called Dec. 19, 1701, to act upon the subject of establishing a school "as the law direct." The requisite number of householders—fifty—now being settled here, the town was compelled to have a school kept within its limits. For about forty years the place had been known, and more or less inhabited, but nothing had been done in the way of a public school in all that time. But now the obligation could no longer be shunned, and the town voted to procure a schoolmaster. But it seems that the good fathers were not successful, for we find the record made that they had approached Mr. Cobbitt with an invitation, but found him engaged for the winter; and although they had heard of other masters, yet "considering the scarceness of money, etc., it is proposed for this winter time that ye Selectmen, and such others as will join in yt worke with them, doe by themselves or som others in their behalf, take their turns by ye week to keep a school to teach children and youth to read English and wright and cypher (Grates), and in hope that som of ʒ (our) neighbors will joyn with us in yt worke we Intend (God willing) to begin the next Monday."

In 1702 so much progress was made that it was resolved to build a school-house "twenty foot long and sixteen foot broad, to be built and finished by next Michelmas or thereabouts."

In the rate made for paying the cost of this school-house, the selectmen included the names of fifty-eight persons who were assessed. Of these, Daniel Hawes was taxed thirteen shillings and Robert Ware twelve shillings and ten pence, Lieut. Ware eleven shillings twopence, Michael Wilson ten shillings and eight pence, and Eben Gay ten shillings, who are named as showing who paid the largest taxes, and what amounts they were assessed. The assessment for the school-house probably amounted to about fourteen pounds. This first school-house was located near the present site of the bank building; at least, one stood there in 1738. On the 24th day of December, 1703, the selectmen "did bargain and agree with Theodor Man in behalf of the town to keep schoole, beginning January the 3d next insuing, until the next March for the sum of three pounds eight shillings in silver." He was a son of Rev. Samuel Man. In 1704, John Swineborn was employed for thirty shillings and his diet. In 1705, Theodore Man was offered forty shillings per month, and in 1707 the treasurer was directed to pay him four pounds for keeping school two months. John Fale, Jonathan Ware, and William Man were also employed to teach, and they, with others, kept the one school in town for some years. The town voted from time to time small sums for repairing this solitary school-house.

In 1717 a three months' school was established, to be kept alternately at the east end of the town one month, the next month at the school-house, the third month at Ebenezer Ware's; and in 1719 four schools were voted at four different quarters of the town. Jabez Wight, of Dedham, was employed to teach a grammar school for one-quarter of a year for ten pounds.

In 1723 a school was provided at Poppoluttuck, and the next year it was voted that the school be kept one-half the time in some convenient place near the meeting-house, and in that part of the town formerly belonging to Dorchester, and the other half in those places that that will accommodate those inhabitants who live at a distance from town. In 1734, Mr. Joseph Bacon was employed to preach four months in the west part of the town (now Franklin), and also to keep school three months, for the sum of forty-two pounds. The schools were not permanently located in those days, it seems, as the matter of placing or stating them was frequently considered in town-meetings. To show what wages were then paid we append a few examples. In 1730, Nathaniel Newell was allowed twenty-seven pounds for keeping school three-quarters of a year, and he procured his board for five shillings per week. "The Selectmen agreed with Mr. David Cowell, to keep a grammar school in this town for one month for the sum of five pounds, and with Hezekiah Man for two months after the expiration of that time, and they were to provide for themselves." In 1739 the grammar-school teacher was paid "fourteen pounds and his diet and lodging." Notwithstanding the division of the town into precincts in 1737, precinct schools were not established, although the law of the province allowed it. The selectmen continued as formerly to contract with teachers, the town continuing to discuss and settle the questions of number and location of schools and amount of money to be expended.

In 1762, Eliphalet Whiting was directed "to make answer to a complaint laid before the grand jury, for not keeping a grammar school." All towns of one hundred families were under obligations by statute to maintain a grammar school. Whatever might be the notions of the selectmen of those days about a grammar school (and it seems that to instruct their children to read, write, and cipher was all they required of their teachers), the law-givers of 1647 defined it by requiring that the master thereof should be able to fit youth for the university. And it is probable that our predecessors made attempts to provide such teachers, agents being sent to Cambridge, Dedham, Roxbury, etc., to procure them; and Jacob Bacon, Hezekiah Man, David Cowell, Amariah Frost, James Messenger, and Benjamin Guild, who were employed as teachers, were university graduates. In 1764 the grammar school was continued, and the school money remaining after paying for that was divided according to the number of children between four and sixteen years of age. This was the practice for many years. In 1767 the town voted to expend eighty pounds for the support of schools, and that the school should be kept in the circular form,—that is, moving about into different parts of the town according to their respective turns, until the eighty pounds be expended. The divisions of the town for school purposes were designated variously, as the Long Walk division, Capt. Day's division, the South End division, the school near Esquire Whitney's, Deacon Man's division, etc. In 1780 three thousand pounds were voted for the use of the school in this town, so depreciated had the currency become; and in 1786 it was voted to keep a grammar school at the cheapest rate in order to clear the town of a fine; also, that young men intending to go to college should be exempt from poll-tax so long as the town is exempted from keeping a grammar-school master. The Legislature, in 1789, authorized a division of towns into districts, with bounds defined for school purposes. And in 1790, Deacon Man's division, so called, was changed into a school district, and the bounds thereof established. In 1802, districts one, two, and three were in like manner defined, and eventually, viz., in 1846, there were nineteen. A hundred years ago the school money was expended as follows, viz.: for the Benjamin Shepard division, three pounds, thirteen shillings, for the year 1777; the River End division, three pounds, eighteen shillings; the Samuel Lethbridge division, three pounds, eightpence; Long Walk division, four pounds, one shilling, two pence; Capt. Fairbanks' division, five pounds, eight shillings, four pence; North End division, three pounds, nine shillings, fourpence; the Reuben Pond division, three pounds, nine shillings, fourpence; Joshua Grant division, four pounds, eighteen shillings, eightpence; the South End division, six pounds, ten shillings; Capt. Day's division, five pounds, twelve shillings, eightpence; the Samuel Hawes division, four pounds, eight shillings, tenpence; Col. Metcalf's division, four pounds, eleven shillings; Ellis' division, two pounds, three shillings, fourpence; Plain division, three pounds, eightpence; East division, six pounds, seven shillings, tenpence. In the year 1800 five hundred dollars was granted for the support of schools; from 1802 to 1806, six hundred dollars; from 1806 to 1810, eight hundred dollars; from 1810 to 1827, one thousand dollars; from 1827 to 1842, fifteen hundred dollars; in 1846 it was two thousand dollars. From that time it has not been below two thousand dollars, and has been five thousand. After the loss of that part of our town which went into the new town of Norfolk the sum was reduced to four thousand dollars.

School Fund.—It will be remembered that in 1662-63, as previously related, the proprietors of the lands here held a meeting at Dedham, and among other things voted to reserve land "for highways, officers' lots, burial-place, trayning-ground, and all other lands necessary to be reserved for all public uses." As early as 1685 they voted to "set out four or six acres of their now common land in the most convenient place near the meeting-house for ye accomodating and incouragement of a school, with twenty or twenty-five acres of other land, upland and swamp or swampy land." This was "to be for the use and benefit of the school, and not to be alienated to any other use or purpose whatsoever." The boundaries of the six acres first above-named were not established until 1741. In 1734 the proprietors passed a vote "that there be and hereby is given, granted, and confirmed to the inhabitants of this town forever, for the use and benefit of a school in this town, the income or use thereof to be employed for the maintaining and keeping a school in this town, and to no other end or use whatsoever, a piece or parcel of land commonly called the school land, being upland and meadow land, containing by estimation twenty-five acres, more or less, butted and bounded, etc." These two tracts of land went by the name of the school land, and the meadow, at least, was leased to individuals for many years, until the people thought that their value in money would produce more income for the school, and therefore, in 1753, procured leave of the General Court to sell them, it being ordered that the principal sum should always be kept good and the interest only applied towards the support of the school in said town, and that neither the principal or interest be applied to any other use."

Under this authority the lands were sold, and the income of the money arising from the sale applied to the use of the schools. Other lands granted to the town at other times were sold, and the proceeds (in 1759) also applied to the use of the school, and made a part of the school fund.

In 1827, Benjamin R. Cheever, of Philadelphia, by his will gave the sum of one thousand dollars to Wrentham, his native town, in aid of its school fund.

The income of this fund has never been diverted from the purpose to which it was devoted by its founders. In all the years since its creation, through all the exigencies of the inhabitants, even in the straits of the Revolutionary war, to their honor be it said this fund remained intact.

Besides the common schools, the people here had for many years a successful private school, known as Day's Academy. For the establishment of this institution they were in a great measure indebted to the Rev. Elisha Fisk, who was the minister of the church and society. His efforts and the efforts of some others to raise funds for this purpose having been successful, a charter for an academy was obtained from the Legislature in 1806. It was named Day's Academy in honor of Benjamin Day, who contributed more largely to the funds than any other subscriber. The State granted a half township of land in Maine for the encouragement of the school. The amount subscribed in money was twenty-three hundred dollars. The General Court enacted that there be and hereby is established in Wrentham an academy by the name of Day's Academy, for the promotion of learning and religion, and that the present pastor and the present deacons of the First Congregational Church in said Wrentham, and their successors in office, together with Beriah Brastow, George Hawes, Jairus Ware, John Whiting, Lewis Whiting, Abijah Pond, Timothy Whiting, Daniel Ware, Amos Archer, David Fisher, Jr., Joseph Whiting, Jr., Eliphalet White, Luther White, Elijah Craig, Eliphalet Whiting, John Hall, Jr., William Brown, William Messenger, and such others as may hereafter associate with them, be and hereby are incorporated into a body politic by the name of the Trustees of Day's Academy, etc. This act is quoted for the purpose of showing who were the men that interested themselves in the establishment of an institution whose influence was so important upon the community.

The academy building, erected in 1808, was opened for the reception of students by a prayer by Rev. Nathaniel Emmons and an address by Bradford Sumner, Esq., the first teacher. It became a flourishing institution, and so remained until other academies were established in its neighborhood. Mr. Fisk said of it, "Many resorted to it for acquiring learning.—In it a large number of students have been fitted for higher usefulness in the common business of life and for entrance into the colleges."

A Baptist Church was organized in the westerly part of the town in 1769. Its first settled minister was the Rev. William Williams, who graduated at Brown University the same year. In March, 1775, the church invited him to become their pastor. He accepted the invitation, but his ordination did not take place until July, 1776. About the time of his settlement he opened an academy which attained to high distinction among the literary institutions of the day. He is supposed to have had under his care nearly two hundred youths, about eighty of whom he fitted for college, not a few of whom became distinguished in literary and professional life. He also conducted the theological studies of several young men with a view to their entering upon the ministry. He continued to teach and preach until about the close of his life. He was a fellow of Brown University from 1789 to 1818. In 1777, when the college building was occupied as a barrack for soldiers, and afterwards as a hospital for French troops, the library was removed to the country and placed in the keeping of Mr. Williams. Rev. Dr. Fisher, of West Boylston, in 1859, says of Mr. Williams, "He is especially worthy of notice as having been one of the first graduates of Brown University, and as having contributed not a little to the intellectual improvement of the Baptist denomination in New England. His manners were easy and agreeable, and his powers of conversation such as to render him quite attractive. His talents and acquirements were highly respectable. His services as a teacher commanded great respect not only in, but out of his denomination. Among his pupils were the late Hon. David R. Williams, Governor of South Carolina; Hon. Tristram Burgess, of Rhode Island; Hon. Horace Mann. Not a man to attract and impress the multitude, yet by a steady course of enlightened and Christian activity he accomplished an amount of good for his denomination which fairly entitles him to a place among its more distinguished benefactors. He diffused a spirit of improvement and a love of intellectual culture throughout the circle in which he moved."—(Sprague's "American Pulpit.")¹

Samuel Sheeres, the first white inhabitant, was by vote of his fellow-townsmen exempted from the payment of all taxes in the future. Robert Ware and Deacon Metcalf both refused to serve as representatives to the General Court; and Samuel Fisher, Jr., who had been chosen in 1702, was allowed "to make use of nine or ten shillings of the town's money in his hand if he stand in need." The selectmen were directed "to take care that the seats in the meeting-house be finished." Theodore Man was engaged to teach school from January 3d to March 1st, for three pounds and eight shillings in silver.

In January, 1704, the people seemed to feel some compunctions at the condition of their meeting-house, and resolved, "forasmuch as the place of the worship of God want finishing to make it suitable, &c., it is thought galleries may be made over the galleries that be, and the walls filled and white-limed, and then persons placed as ought to be that there may be decency and order in the house of God." The number of taxpayers was sixty-eight. In 1708-9 the town was threatened with presentment at the next Quarter Sessions unless Mr. Man's salary in arrear should be paid.

It seems from some votes passed in this latter year that men were impressed in Wrentham to serve against the French and Indians in the Canadas. We also learn that Ensign Blake was in the Queen's service. An attack of the combined northern colonies against Montreal and Quebec was meditated at this time, under the expectation that a British fleet and army would be sent to co-operate with them. But the British ministry did not keep their promise, and after waiting a long time for the appearance of the fleet the forces were disbanded without attempting anything. It does not appear whether any Wrentham men were in the expedition against Canada undertaken by the Tory ministry of Queen Anne in 1711, which terminated so disgracefully for the assailants. And after the peace which Walpole had maintained so long was at last broken, and the French and English in America were again in hostility, and Louisburg had been taken from the French by an army chiefly from Massachusetts, and again a project was formed to capture Quebec, and again the English fleet and army failed to appear, and the war was ended and Louisburg ceded back to the French, it is not certain that our town furnished soldiers for this, or for subsequent campaigns until 1756.

In that year the names of Benjamin Hubbard and Thomas Cook, both of Wrentham, are found upon the muster-roll of the company in his Majesty's service, under command of Capt. John Jones, of Bellingham. And in the company of Capt. Eliphalet Fales, of Dedham, in 1756, were enrolled Michael Mulsey, Zachariah Worthee, Jona Forster, and Simeon Forster, all of Wrentham. Also, Stephen Cook, of Marlboro', born in Wrentham, and Isaac Fisher and Ebenezer Streeter, of Wrentham, were in Capt. Nathan Tyler's company. Capt. Nathaniel Blake, of Milton, also enrolled in his company Abner Turner, Ephraim Randall, Jeremiah Blake, Michael Ware, Joseph Turner, Thomas Boyden who were all of

Wrentham. And in Maj. Stephen Miller's company, in Col. Bagley's regiment, Fort William Henry, Aug. 9, 1756, the following-named Wrentham men were enrolled, viz. :

Ebenezer Cox, from Capt. Day's company.
 John Cox, from Capt. Day's company.
 Abijah Hall, from Capt. Man's company.
 Thomas Boyden, from Capt. Man's company.
 Edward ———, from Capt. Day's company.
 John Conole, from Capt. Man's company.
 Benjamin Cox, from Capt. Day's company.
 Morris Fling, from Capt. Day's company.
 Joshua Fisher, from Capt. Day's company.
 Benjamin Ware, from Capt. Day's company.
 Michael Ware, from Capt. Day's company.
 Michael Wilson, from Capt. Goldsburys company.
 Pitt Pumpham, of Stoughton, hired at Wrentham, from Man's company.
 Richard Newton, of Wrentham, 1757.

An alarm company was enrolled in Col. Miller's regiment at Wrentham, April 22, 1757, of which Samuel Day was captain, Benjamin Shepard, lieutenant, Ebenezer Cowell, ensign, Lemuel Kollock, clerk, John Hancock, Daniel Man, Pelatiah Metcalf, Gamaliel Gerould were sergeants, and Samuel Fisher and Elisha Harrington were drummers, and there were sixty-four privates. Besides this there was an alarm-list of men between the ages of sixteen and sixty years, fifty-two in number, headed by the Rev. Joseph Bean, in which were also the names of Capt. Timothy Metcalf, Capt. Nathaniel Ware, Capt. Jona Whitney, Lieut. Joseph Fairbanks, Lieut. Ebenezer Cox, Dr. John Druce, Dr. Obadiah Blake, and others, some of whom had probably seen service in former conflicts with the enemies of the English.

In 1759, Capt. Jonathan Adams' company, in Col. Ridley's regiment, under Jeffrey Amherst, general and commander-in-chief of his Majesty's forces in North America for the invasion of Canada, included three men from Wrentham,—Benjamin Moore, Josiah Blake, and Ebenezer Blake.

In the same year Wrentham men were "inlisted or impressed for his Majesty's service" in Col. Miller's regiment, "to be put under the command of his Excellency Jeffrey Amherst, Esq., general and commander-in-chief of his Majesty's forces in North America for the invasion of Canada, 1759." These men had been in an expedition against Lake George in 1758, and one of their number in 1757. Their names were as follows :

Thomas Bristo.	Isaiah Bacon.
Andrew Everet.	Thomas Fuller.
Levi Morse.	Joseph White.
John Conole.	Melatih Ware.
Hezekiah Ware.	David Force.

John Lawrence.	David Shepard.
William Holden.	Samuel Metcalf.
Thomas Pitty.	Solomon Blake.
Daniel Pond.	Naphtali Bishop.
Daniel Guild.	Samuel Ellis.
Oliver Pond.	Moses Wheelock, 1757.
Reuben Thorp.

Capt. Abijah Hall, of Wrentham, commanded a company in the service, and the Wrentham men mustered into it were Daniel Hawes, Thomas Boyden, Nathan Hall, Jacob Bacon, Henry Crossman, Elisha Farrington, Jonathan Newton, Amos Man.

In Capt. Samuel Slocomb's company were Robert Cooke, John Boyd, Eleazer Blake, John Blake, Stephen Cook, Thomas Cook; they were enlisted April 2, 1759, and mustered out December, 1759.

In September of this year, Quebec having surrendered to the English, the war in North America was virtually at an end. But the English colonies had for many years been exposed to the hostile incursions of warlike French and Indians, and had suffered the loss of many lives and of much treasure. The New England towns contributed soldiers, and the preceding record shows that Wrentham was not behind in furnishing men for the various campaigns.

Resuming our narrative, and returning to the year 1709, we find the people peacefully pursuing their usual avocations, and administering their prudential affairs with great economy,—“fastening the loose glass in the Meeting-house,” for example, and “stopping the windows with board where glass was wanting.” A few years later, John Ware and Ebenezer Fisher reported that they were appointed a committee to run the ancient patent-line between the counties of Suffolk, Bristol, and Plymouth, and had met Capt. Jacob Thompson, a surveyor, “but being shamed in the thing had done nothing.” This line was the boundary of the colonies of Plymouth and Massachusetts, and a prominent bound, called Angletree, in Wrentham line, was established by commissioners of the respective colonies in 1664. But it seems that for a number of years, although surveys had been ordered, the line was in doubt. At length the Provincial Legislature enacted “that for the future a line beginning at a certain heap of stones on the west side of Accord pond, in Hingham and Abington, and running from said monument west twenty and one-half degrees south, leaving the towns of Weymouth, Braintree, Stoughton, and Wrentham adjoining on the north, and Abington, Bridgewater, Mansfield, and Attleborough on the south, to a certain old white-oak tree, anciently marked, now standing, and being a boundary between the towns of Wrentham and Attleborough, by some called Station tree, by others Angle tree, shall forever hereafter be the bounds between the county of Suffolk and the counties of Plymouth and Bristol, so far as said line extends, etc." Wrentham was at this time within the county of Suffolk.

About this time (1713) the town was indicted for not maintaining a school.

In 1716 a committee was appointed to seat people in the meeting-house according to their age, usefulness, and estate, including the inhabitants of Dorchester, who attended church here. A suit was brought against Attleborough for refusing to renew the bound marks. It seems that the indictment of the town for not maintaining a school had its effect, for it was now voted to establish a school in four parts of the town. In 1719 a committee was chosen to procure a minister for one-quarter of a year, and was continued in authority after the death of Mr. Man, which took place on the 22d day of May, A.D. 1719.

Fifty years had passed away since he was first called to preach to the handful of people who were attempting a settlement in this wilderness. The people, in addition to the hardships incident to their pioneer life, had been liable to conflicts with savages and Frenchmen. He came to them while in their weakness and poverty, returning with them after Philip's war, although he had opportunity to settle elsewhere, and notwithstanding he had had bitter experience of their inability to provide for him suitably.

Some five hundred and thirty-three persons had been born in that time within the bounds of the township, seventy-one couples married, and seventy-three persons had died. It has previously been related that the former inhabitants made it a special condition of their return at the termination of Philip's war that Mr. Man should return with them. He was indispensable to them. In fact, the minister in those days was really the head of the people. He was their guide not only in spiritual affairs, but in worldly affairs also. He was undoubtedly the only man in the community who had had the opportunity of acquiring learning beyond the elements, and his influence was accordingly felt in all public affairs, as well as in his pulpit on the Sabbath. Moreover, the circumstances which forced the early inhabitants of Plymouth and Massachusetts colonies from their transatlantic homes to these shores compelled them to consider themselves a peculiar people. The chief men in the colony, who had been leaders of the emigration, governed according to their notions of what religion and the word of God required, and were strongly seconded by the ministers of the churches. Hence, in answer to the petition of the inhabitants of Wrentham for town power, the colonial record is, "The Court judgeth it meet to give the petitioners all due encouragement with their present minister according to their desires."

To that excellent man is due, in a great measure, undoubtedly, the continuance of the settlement whose early planting here has been described in previous pages.

Mr. Bean, in his sermon preached at the conclusion of the first century of the town's existence, viz., in 1773, in speaking of the first settlers here, says, "They were careful to have the word of God regularly preached to them and procured Mr. Sam'l Man, a young candidate, for that purpose." And after Philip's war, "when the settlers had concluded to return, so great was their veneration for Mr. Man, and so acceptable had been his labors among them, that it was their earnest desire he should return with them." It seems that, while away from Wrentham, he had been preaching at Milton, and was about to receive a call there, but, says Mr. Bean, "so great was his affection for the people of Wrentham, and so desirous was he of the plantation's going on that he complied with their request." In 1692 a church was gathered here, consisting of ten members, including Mr. Man. The others were Benjamin Rockett, John Ware, Eliezer Metcalf, John Fairbanks, Thomas Thurston, John Guild, Ephraim Pond, John Vails, Samuel Fisher.

"Mr. Man was ordained over the church and congregation, the same day preaching his own ordination sermon." He had preached about eighteen years previously. "He died in the seventy-second year of his age and the forty-ninth of his faithful ministry." "By what I have heard of him," continues Mr. Bean, "he was a man of good erudition and an accomplished preacher, pious and faithful. He lived greatly beloved by his people, and died greatly lamented by them. He was born at Cambridge, and was graduated at Harvard University in 1665." He adds, that one of the first men of this province said of Mr. Man that he was not only a very good, but a very great and learned man.

At a general meeting of the inhabitants, in September, 1719, the church, in presence of the inhabitants, did agree that the inhabitants should join them in choosing a minister out of three that were nominated, viz.: Rev. Samuel Andrew, Rev. Jonathan Parepont, and Rev. Henry Messinger.

The record says, "The Rev. Henry Messinger, by a very unanimous and major vote, was chosen and elected, by both church and town jointly concurring, to be the minister of this town to carry on the work of the ministry." He accepted their call by a letter dated at Cambridge, Oct. 2, 1719. He married Esther Cheever, of Cambridge, January, 1720, and was described in the records of that town as the Rev. Henry Messinger, of Wrentham. It would therefore appear that he had already commenced his ministerial duties at that date, as the name of Messinger is not found upon the town record previously. His children were twelve in number. One of his sons (John) died in 1814, in his eighty-third year. He served in the office of town clerk twenty-one years in succession, when he declined further service, remarking that he ought to be free at the age of twenty-one. In 1787 he was again elected, and served seven years successively, making, in the whole, twenty-eight years.

A printed sermon of the Rev. Mr. Man is in existence, and also two or more of Rev. Mr. Bean, but it is not known to the writer that there is any manuscript or published discourse of Mr. Messinger. It has therefore seemed proper to copy here his letter of acceptance, that the readers of these annals may be enabled to form an idea of the man.¹

"TO THE CHURCH AND TOWN OF WRENTHAM, Grace, Mercy, and Peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ.

"Sirs,—I cannot but with great fear take notice of the overruling Providence of God in inclining your hearts so unanimously to make choice of myself, the most unworthy and unfit, to settle with you and to carry on the work of the ministry among you. And since your invitation to me, I hope I have seriously and solemnly considered how awful great and difficult the work is to which I am called. And when this great work has been set so solemnly before me by others, and I have well thought of my own youthfulness and the little progress I have made in my studies to fit and qualifie me for so great a work, I have been ready to plead and say, how shall I speak that am but a child, and how shall I watch over souls so as to save my own and the souls of others? and have been almost discouraged. In the multitude of the thoughts within me I have asked counsel of Heaven, and left my case there, begging of God that he would direct me in the weighty business before me, so as should be most for his honor and glory, your spiritual good and advantage, and my own future joy and comfort, and I hope I have not sought in vain. I have likewise consulted many learned, wise, and godly men, who with one consent agree that my call is clear, and that therefore it is my indispensable duty to comply with the same, as I would not deny the call of Christ. Wherefore, in the fear of God and with a humble reliance on his gracious promises to his faithful ministers, I accept your call to carry on the work of the ministry so long as Providence shall provide for my comfortable sustentance among you, trusting that God that has called me to engage in so awful a work, who sees my unfitness for it and inability to perform the same, will exercise a fatherly pity towards me with respect thereto, will daily more and more qualifie me therefor and encourage me therein, and accept my sincere desires and endeavors to advance his glory and the eternal happiness of others. And that it may be so, I humbly ask your earnest prayers for me at the throne of Grace, that God would forgive my many and great sins, whereby I am rendered so unfit to engage in so sacred a work, and for which I desire deeply to be abashed and humbled before God. Cry to God mightily on my behalf, that he in whom is all fulness would in a plentiful manner bestow upon me the outpouring of his spirit and adorn me with every Christian grace and virtue, that I may come to you in the fulness of the blessing of the Gospel of Peace, and if God in his due time shall settle me among you, doe what you can to make my work, which I engage in with fear and trembling, easy to me, and let nothing be done to discourage me. To this end let brotherly love be and abound among you, let every one forgive his brother his trespasses as he hopes for forgiveness of God, live in peace, study the things which tend thereto, and the God of Peace will be with you and bless you. And God, of his infinite grace, grant that we may with united hearts strive to advance his kingdom and glory, may be mutual blessings to, may enjoy much comfort in each other, and perform the respective duties incumbent on us, as that, when our glorious Jesus shall make his second and illustrious appearance to judge both quick and dead, we may meet each other with joy and comfort, and give up our accounts with joy and not with grief.

"I am your sincere tho unworthy servant for Jesus' sake,

"HENRY MESSINGER.

"CAMBRIDGE, Oct. 2, 1719."

Mr. Messinger was ordained Dec. 5, 1719. In 1721 a second house for public worship was built, and was used as such by all the people in the town until Aug. 29, 1737, when the West Parish (afterwards Franklin) was organized. A new church was formed there, composed of members dismissed from the old church here, under the ministry of Rev. Elias Haven, who was ordained over them on the 8th day of November of the same year.

The immediate successor of Mr. Messinger says, "He continued in this First Parish greatly laboring in word and doctrine till it pleased the Sovereign Lord of life and death to put a period to his life and work nearly together. His death occurred on the 30th day of March, 1750, in the fifty-fifth year of his age, and the thirty-second of his faithful ministry. He was a gentleman of unblemished reputation, and highly esteemed for his piety and virtue. He had the character of a plain, faithful, affectionate, and profitable preacher. And though he was of but a slender, feeble constitution, yet he was abundant in labors among the people of his charge, and spared no pains for promoting the interest of the Redeemer and the good of souls. It is no wonder, then, that when all the congregation saw he was dead they mourned for him as Israel did for Aaron."

It is a somewhat remarkable fact that there is no one now residing within the limits of the town who is a descendant, and bears the name at the same time, of either of the first five ministers settled, although Mr. Man left six sons and Mr. Messinger five, and Mr. Bean and his successors also left sons. The descendants of the first two must, nevertheless, be very numerous among us, notwithstanding the fact that large numbers of them have from time to time gone to dwell elsewhere.

The Rev. Mr. Messinger's daughters were sought in marriage by neighboring clergymen. Mary married the Rev. Elias Haven, of West Wrentham (now Franklin); Esther, the Rev. Amariah Frost, of Mendon, Mass.; Sarah, first, Dr. Cornelius Kollock, of Wrentham, and second, Rev. Benjamin Caryl, of Dover, Mass.; Elizabeth, the Rev. Joseph Bean, her father's successor in the ministry at Wrentham. His son, James, was the first minister of Ashford, Conn.

Those inhabitants of Dorchester living as they say convenient to come to the public worship of God in Wrentham, agreed to be taxed ratably for the payment of Mr. Messinger's salary so long as the town of Dorchester would exempt them from paying there. Their names were Samuel Man, Hannah George, Samuel Lane, Jeremiah Ruggles, Mary Shepard, John Martin, James Humphrey, Samuel Richardson, Mark Force, and Solomon Howes. In October of this year, having voted that the new meeting-house should stand on or near the spot occupied by the old one, the inhabitants determined that it should be "forty feet in length and thirty-eight in breadth, and of such height as may be most convenient and proper for two tiers of galleries one above the other."

Another institution indicating the progress of the settlement in another direction was established as appears by the following recited vote: "Agreed with Ensign Eliezer Ware to make a pair of stocks at the town's cost and charge." This useful reformer probably adorned the common in front of the new meeting-house, where its beneficent workings were visible to all the good people of the village, as often as the night-watch, whose duty it was to patrol the streets east and west, one-half mile from the meeting-house, made their seizures, and bore the trophies of their vigilance to this place of confinement, where the morning sun found them bound hand and foot.

We find that Benjamin Ware was living in Wrentham in 1721 as a practicing physician. He was the first physician who settled here, Dr. Stewart, as previously related, not finding sufficient encouragement in the earlier days of the plantation to remain.

At this time the inhabitants living in the westerly part of the town (now Franklin) desired some relief from ministerial charges because, as they say, they "live remote from the public worship and cannot attend on the same without difficulties and hardships." It was accordingly determined that whatever they might now pay toward building the new meeting-house should, whenever they should be set off into a precinct, district, or parish by themselves, be returned to them for their use in the defraying the charge of building a meeting-house among them.

The provincial government having emitted bills of credit to the amount of fifty thousand pounds, this town took two hundred and seventy-two pounds and ten shillings, for which trustees were appointed to loan to the inhabitants at five per cent. interest. The entire tax for this year (1722) was two hundred and ninety-two pounds, seventeen shillings, and eightpence.

A committee appointed to seat people in the meeting-house were directed to reserve a pew for the minister and his family, and also one for the widow of the Rev. Mr. Man, and then to place the men on one side of the house and the women on the other. Schools were established in other parts of the town between the years 1723 and 1728, and in 1725, having opposed the setting off the westerly part of the town into a new precinct, the inhabitants (in 1727) prosecuted Bellingham for refusing to renew the boundmarks, and in 1728 took three hundred and fifty-one pounds and five shillings in bills of credit of the province.

In 1729 the number of inhabitants over sixteen years of age liable to road work was one hundred and ninety-three.

Bounties were occasionally paid for killing wild animals. Jonathan Nutting had one pound for killing a wild-cat.

The patriotism of the inhabitants was so much excited at this time that they, with preamble and good set phrase, ordered the selectmen to draw out of the treasury the sum of twenty-five pounds and forward the same to the Hon. John Quincy, Speaker of the House. The controversy between the officers of the crown and the people had been waged for many years with regard to fixed salaries. The king's government, fearing the effect of the payment of their salaries to the royal governors by the people, instructed each viceroy to demand of the provincial assemblies a fixed salary, believing that he would thus be less likely to incline to the popular interests against the crown. The demand made by Dudley in 1702, and resisted by the Assembly, was renewed by Shute in 1706, with like result, and being insisted on caused violent disputes, the people in the course of the quarrel repeatedly asserting the principle on which they finally appealed to arms against the mother-country. Glancing at the fact of Shute's going to England in 1722 and preferring complaints against Massachusetts, of the House of Representatives choosing their Speaker in 1723 and placing him in the chair without presenting him to the Governor for confirmation, and in a variety of ways asserting its rights, especially in voting the allegations of Shute without foundation and ordering one hundred pounds sterling to be remitted to their agent in Europe to employ counsel, in which, however, the board of assistants refused to join, the preparing an address to the king, in which the Council refused to join, the ordering the Speaker to sign and send the paper to England, the preparing a separate address by the Council, which was forwarded to Shute, and the employment of Dummer and Cooke to appear for the province, we find that it was not until 1726 that a decision was made before the Lords in trade and the king in council upon the complaints preferred by Shute. The decision, as is well known, was adverse to Massachusetts, and resulted in adding two clauses to her charter, viz., one affirming the right of the Governor to negative the choice of Speaker, the other denying the House of Representatives the right of adjourning itself for any period longer than two days. And Governor Burnett, the successor of Shute, renewing in 1728 the demand that a fixed salary be paid him, saying this was the command of the king, the House refused, but granted him seventeen hundred pounds towards his support and the expenses of his journey. He refused it, but took three hundred pounds granted for his journey. Hence arose a violent quarrel, the Governor remonstrating and threatening, and the deputies persisting in their refusal. A statement of the controversy and its causes being made to the towns, great excitement ensued, Boston in a particular manner declaring its opposition to the commands of the king, in consequence of which the Governor adjourned the General Court to Salem, the House denouncing the step and requesting the Governor to summon them to Boston, which, being refused, the Court remained at Salem, supported by the towns. Here the House resolved to apply to the king, and Belcher and Wilkes were employed as its agents. Grants were made by the House to defray their expenses, but the Council rejected them, whereupon a sufficient sum was subscribed by the people of Boston and placed at the disposal of the House. The grant of twenty-five pounds made by Wrentham in 1729 was intended for this fund.

The bills of public credit continuing to depreciate, the town "proposed to take into consideration the present difficult circumstances of the Rev. Mr. Messenger, and make some further provision for the support of him and his family." "Wherefore it was voted that a contribution be taken up once a quarter upon the Lord's day for this purpose for one year next ensuing, and that the deacons take care to deliver the money so gathered to the Rev. Mr. Messenger." His salary was nominally one hundred pounds, but, as he was paid in the depreciated bills of credit of the province, the real sum received by him must have been much less.

The cost of the late war to the colonies, estimated at sixteen millions of dollars, of which only five millions was repaid by the British ministry, bore hardly upon the province. Besides, Massachusetts had contributed her share of the thirty thousand lives computed to have been sacrificed in the protracted contest. To defray her expenses she made such large emissions of paper money that gold and silver were not at all in circulation. It seems that a small party favored the calling in the paper money, "relying on the industry of the people to replace it with a circulating medium of greater stability."

"Another party favored a private bank, the bills not to be redeemed in specie, but landed security to be given." Another party were for a public bank, the faith of the government to be pledged to the value of the notes, and the profits accruing from the bank to be applied for its support. This party was successful, and fifty thousand pounds in bills of credit were issued, and afterwards one hundred thousand pounds. This currency was so much depreciated that at one time fifty thousand pounds were voted to defray town charges and six thousand seven hundred pounds for the minister's salary.

The town, in 1734, having refused to build a meeting-house for the westerly inhabitants, voted to supply them with preaching, and chose a committee to "clear the town of certain scandalous charges made by Bellingham in a petition to the General Court. It was also voted in 1735 that some people with their estates be annexed to Medway; and that a number of families formerly of the westerly end of Dorchester, but now intermixed with the westerly end of Stoughton, who were joined to this town in 1724, may be returned to the town of Stoughton." One reason assigned for this movement was "that the town of Wrentham is now under very mean, low, and poor circumstances, their town charges being very great; adding, the charge of the town to maintain the poor would amount, as we suppose, to more than all the polls and estates of families upon the said land would pay, and also many highways must be made through said tract."

The town continued to oppose the application of the inhabitants of West Wrentham to be set off into a separate township, but, at the suggestion of the committee of the General Court, voted in 1737 that they might be set off as a distinct parish. Those who were dismissed from the church here formed a new church there in 1738, and Rev. Elias Haven was ordained their minister in November of the same year.

The warrants for town-meetings began in 1740 to summon the voters to meet at the public meeting-house in the East Precinct, and in 1742 the town discontinued the practice of warning town-meetings from house to house. In 1746 two parcels of land were laid out for training-grounds, one of which included all the common land about the meeting-house; and a grant was made to Eliphalet Whiting, of the use of the creek between the two ponds, with the privilege of erecting a dam, with the right of the town to resume it on certain conditions.

The church records say, "The Rev. Mr. Messinger gave up the ghost on the 30th day of March, 1750, and was buried on the Tuesday following; that the church and First Precinct unanimously invited the Rev. Mr. Joseph Bean to carry on the work of the ministry among them." Mr. Bean accepted, and was ordained Dec. 5, 1750.

Joseph Grant, Robert Ware, Obadiah Allen, Ebenezer Guild, Ephraim Knowlton, Samuel Ray, and John Hills, Jr., declaring themselves Anabaptists in 1752, were exempted from ministerial taxes.

A part of Stoughton was annexed to Wrentham, in 1753, and the next year the inhabitants of the West Precinct praying the General Court to organize them into a separate district, a committee was chosen to oppose the petition; and at the same time the town voted that "it was not in favor of the excise bill printed by the General Court."

Nothing extraordinary seems to have occurred in the affairs of the town from this date until the year 1765, when the voters placed themselves on record in regard to the Stamp Act, so called, in the following decided language:

"At a meeting of the freeholders and other inhabitants of the town, held by adjournment Nov. 1, 1765, it was unanimously voted that the following sentiments be recorded on the town book, that the children hereafter to be born may see the desire their ancestors had to hand down to them their rights and privileges as they received them from their ancestors, and that a copy thereof be sent to the Honorable, the House of Representatives in General Court assembled. Gentlemen, as a free and full enjoyment of the inherent rights and privileges of natural, free-born subjects of Great Britain, long since precisely known and ascertained by uninterrupted practice and usage from the first settling of this country down to this day is of the utmost value, and ought to be contended for as the best frame of government in the world, though with decency yet with the utmost firmness, having the strongest affection and loyalty to the King and the highest veneration for that august assembly the Parliament, and sincere regard for all our fellow-subjects in Great Britain, any attempt to deprive us of our rights and privileges as colonists must be very alarming, and as such we cannot forbear mentioning some of the proceedings of the late Ministry, and especially of the late Parliament, commonly called the Stamp Act, which we apprehend is unconstitutional and oppressive, as it wholly cancels the very conditions on which our ancestors settled this country and enlarged his Majesty's dominion in America, at their sole expense with vast treasure and blood,—that it totally deprives us of the happiest frame of civil government, expressed in our charter,—for by the charter of this Province the General Assembly has the power of making laws for its internal government and taxation,—and that no freeman shall be taxed, but by his own consent either in person or by proxy. And by this act a single judge of the Admiralty has power to try and determine our properties in controversies arising from internal concerns without a jury; which in our opinion is contrary to the very expressions of Magna Charta—that no free man shall be amerced but by the oath of good and lawful men of the vicinage, and by this act it is certain that it puts it in the power of Mr. Informer or Prosecutor to carry the subject more than a thousand miles distance for trial. Who, then, would not pay a fine rather than to be thus harassed, guilty or not? What can be worse? If his Majesty's subjects in America are not to be governed according to the known stated rules of the Constitution as those in Great Britain are, what then will be wanting to render us miserable and forlorn slaves? But supposing that these difficulties were imaginary only, yet we have reason to except against that act, as we apprehend considering the almost insupportable load of debt the Province is now under, and the scarcity of money. We have reason to think that the execution of that act for a short space would drain the country of its cash and strip multitudes of their property and reduce them to desolate beggary. What then would be the consequence resulting from so sudden and convulsive a change in the whole course of our business we tremble to consider. Gentlemen, as these are our sentiments of that act, we, the freeholders and other inhabitants of this town legally assembled for that purpose, claim a share to join with all the friends of liberty on so important a point; but when we consider the answer (this day read before the town) of the Honorable House to his Excellency's speech at the opening of the present session so minutely pointing out the inherent rights of the colonies and the spirit that runs through the whole form, it gives us the utmost satisfaction and strongest confidence under God to rely on the wisdom and integrity of the respectable body of the House, under whose paternal care and protection we have ever been a happy people. And we remain with the utmost assurance that no measures will be wanting by this Honorable House, in joining with all the other colonies in such remonstrances and petitions as are consistent with our loyalty to the King and relation to Great Britain, for the repeal of said act, which we hope by the blessing of God will have its desired effect."

This report was signed by Capt. John Goldsbury, Deacon Jabez Fisher, and Ensign Lemuel Kollock.

This act so odious to our patriotic sires, signed March 8, 1765, by a commission on account of the king's insanity, rendered invalid every written instrument which was not drawn upon stamped paper, to be purchased of the agents of the British government at exorbitant prices, and punished every violation with severe penalties, suits for which were to be brought in any Admiralty or King's Marine Court throughout the colonies. The excitement extended throughout the province. The foregoing report was read to the town on the very day the act was to go into operation.

Boston had assumed an attitude of defiance; its people had determined that stamped paper should not be used; had hung Oliver, the distributor, in effigy upon the old liberty-tree, and made him swear that he had not and would not distribute the odious stamps; shouted liberty, property, and no stamps; demolished the stamp-office, and making a bonfire of its materials on Fort Hill, had consigned the images of Oliver, Bute, and Grenville to the flames, calling themselves Sons of Liberty, and rending the air with huzzas for Pitt and liberty, even going so far as to ransack the house of Hutchinson, the chief justice, spoiling his furniture and throwing his books and manuscripts into the street. At a meeting in Faneuil Hall these riotous proceedings were denounced, but Boston's resistance to the stamp act was sustained by numerous towns in the province, among which Wrentham's voice was heard in the emphatic yet temperate words of the manifesto above written.

Jabez Fisher, the representative to the General Court, was instructed the following year to vote against charging the province for any of the damages caused by the riotous proceedings above mentioned, and also against extravagant grants for superfluities; but to join in measures designed for the detection and punishment of the rioters. At the same time he was instructed to vote for a statue in honor of the most patriotic Pitt without any limitation annexed as to its cost.

But in November following a committee reported to the town that, "considering his Majesty's most gracious recommendation and the application of the sufferers, the vote passed in August last be reconsidered and the following instructions be given to our representative. 'To Mr. Jabez Fisher: Sir, we, your constituents, his Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects in town-meeting assembled, considering the gracious desire of his Majesty that a veil be cast over the late times of tumult and disorder, and considering it as a point of prudence and true policy, instruct you that you give your vote to the purport of the bill which is prepared by the honorable House of Representatives at their last session entitled "An Act for granting compensation to the sufferers and of free and general pardon, indemnity and oblivion to the offenders in the late times," and that you use your influence accordingly.' " This report being read twice before the town, after consideration and some debate, it was unanimously voted and accepted.

The town chose a delegate to a convention to be holden in Faneuil Hall on the 22d day of September, 1768, to consult and advise such measures as his Majesty's service and the peace and safety of his subjects in the province may require. In 1771, Jabez Fisher was chosen representative to attend a General Court to be held at Harvard College. The House was convened at Salem and Cambridge, to avoid the influence of the people of Boston upon that assembly. The quarrels with the Governor at every session of the court tended to make clearer and clearer the fact that the British government intended to coerce the colonies. The House protested against being adjourned from Boston, and learning that the government officers were receiving salaries from the crown, it passed a tax-bill, including those officers in the list of persons to be taxed, which the Governor rejected on the ground that he was expressly forbidden from giving his consent to such an act upon any pretense whatsoever, which so roused the ire of the members of the House that they declared they knew of no commissioners of his Majesty's customs, nor of any revenue his Majesty had a right to establish in North America. The Governor also rejected the grants made to the agents of the province in Europe. Vessels of war, twelve in number, arrived and anchored in the harbor, and Sam Adams declared "that America must under God work out finally her own salvation." The clergymen of Boston refused (with one exception) to read the Governor's proclamation for Thanksgiving, but "implored Almighty God for the restoration of lost liberties." In April, 1722, the Governor convened the Assembly at Boston, and here the quarrel was renewed. A resolve having been passed denouncing the payment of the salary to the Governor by Great Britain, he was informed by the secretary for the colonies that the king had made provision for the support of his servants in the Massachusetts Bay. A town-meeting was called (the court not being in session); John Hancock was moderator. The Governor was asked by this meeting "if stipends had been fixed to the offices of judges." He refused to answer. A message condemning the measure as contrary to the charter and the common law was sent to him, and requesting that the subject might be referred to the General Court. This request was also refused, and the General Court was not permitted to meet in December, the time to which it had been prorogued. The Governor in his reply denied the right of the town to debate such matters, upon which it was voted that the inhabitants of Boston have ever had, and ought to have, the right to petition the king for the redress of such grievances as they feel, or for preventing of such as they have reason to apprehend, and to communicate their sentiments to other towns. And Samuel Adams then proposed that step which, it has been said, "included the whole Revolution, viz., a committee of correspondence to consist of twenty-one persons, to state the rights of the colonies, and of this province in particular, as men and Christians, and as subjects, and to communicate and publish the same to the several towns, and to the world, as the sense of this town, with the infringements or violations thereof that have been, or from time to time may be, made." This was the origin of the famous committee of correspondence, and it is in answer to their letter that the inhabitants of Wrentham, on the 11th day of January, 1773, returned the following spirited and patriotic reply:

"First. Resolved, That the British constitution is grounded on the eternal law of nature, a constitution whose foundation and centre is liberty, which sends liberty to every subject that is, or may happen to be, within any part of its ample circumference; that every part of the British dominions hath a right freely to enjoy all the benefits and privileges of this happy constitution, and that no power of legislation or government upon earth can justly abridge nor deprive any part of the British dominions of those liberties without doing violence to this happy constitution and its true principles; that every part of the British dominions in which acts of the British Parliament are exercised contrary to the true principles of the constitution have, and always ought to have, a right to petition and remonstrate, or to join in petitioning and remonstrating to the king, lords, and commons of Great Britain that all such acts of Parliament may speedily be removed, abrogated, and repealed. That the province of Massachusetts Bay have the right not only by nature and the laws of England, but by social compact, to enjoy all the rights, liberties, and immunities of natural and free-born subjects of Great Britain to all intents and purposes whatsoever; and that acts of the British Parliament imposing rates and duties on the inhabitants of this province while they are unrepresented in Parliament are violations of those rights, and ought to be contended for with firmness.

"Resolved, That it is the opinion of this town that the act of the British Parliament in assuming the power for the legislation of the colonies in all cases whatsoever, and in consequence of that act have carried into execution that assumed power, in laying duties on divers articles in the colonies for the express purpose of raising a revenue without their consent, either by themselves or their representative, whereby the right which every man has to his own property is wholly taken away and destroyed; and what is still more alarming is to see the amazing inroads which have been made, and still are making, on our charter rights and privileges by placing a Board of Commissioners among us under so large a commission, with a train of dependents to sap the foundation of our industry; our coasts surrounded with fleets; standing armies placed in free cities in time of peace without the consent of the inhabitants, whereby the streets of the metropolis of this province have been stained by the blood of its innocent inhabitants; the Governor of the province made independent of the grants of the General Assembly; large salaries affixed to the Lieutenant-Governor, the judges of the admiralty, etc.; the amazing stretch of the power of the Courts of Vice-Admiralty, in a great measure depriving the people in the colonies of the right of trial by jury, and such like innovations, which are intolerable grievances, tending wholly to deprive us of our charter rights and privileges, pull down the constitution, and reduce us to a state of abject slavery."

Another resolve against fixed salaries for the judges of the courts of common law follows, and another showing the tendency of these measures thus denounced to produce absolute government. The last one acknowledges the care and vigilance of Boston, and assures them

"That, as this town hopes never to be wanting in their duty and loyalty to their King, so they are ever ready to do everything in their power in a constitutional way to assist in carrying into execution such measures as may be adopted to remove those difficulties we feel and to prevent those we have reason to fear.

"In the name of the Committee.

"DAVID MAN."

These resolves were unanimously adopted by the town. The following year a committee of correspondence was chosen, viz., Samuel Lethbridge, Jabez Fisher, Dr. Ebenezer Daggett, Mr. Lemuel Kollock, Capt. John Smith, Joseph Woodward, and David Man. A committee was also chosen to attend a convention of the county at the house of Mr. Woodward, innholder, in Dedham, "to deliberate and determine on such matters as the distressed circumstances of the province require," and on Sept. 30, 1774, the town voted that a provincial congress was necessary. It also voted to purchase two pieces of cannon.

Jabez Fisher was chosen delegate to a convention at Concord Oct. 2, 1774. Previous to this, viz., Sept. 15, 1774, Mr. Fisher had been chosen to represent the town in a General Court at Salem. But in the mean time Governor Gage, becoming alarmed at the tone of the resolves and votes passed in town-meetings and county conventions, issued his proclamation on the 28th day of September dispensing with the attendance of members and putting off the session until some more distant day.

The instructions given to Mr. Fisher, the delegate to the Provincial Congress at Concord, were drafted by Ebenezer Daggett and Lemuel Kollock. They allude to the fact that he is chosen at a time when the province is in consternation and confusion, briefly advert to the causes thereof, and instruct him to make the charter of the province the rule of his conduct, refusing to acknowledge any mutilations or alterations of the charter as valid; and that he should acknowledge those counselors who were elected by the General Court as the only constitutional council of this province, and if the congress should consequently be dissolved, then to join with members from this and other towns in a General Provincial Congress.

Capt. Peres Cushing and Mr. Joseph Spear were appointed chief gunners of the two field-pieces, and directed to see that each piece is fixed and kept with a carriage and utensils fit for action as soon as may be. It was voted also to increase the town's stock of ammunition. The constables were ordered to pay all province taxes in their hands or to be collected by them to Henry Gardner, of Stow, instead of Harrison Gray, the royal treasurer, and it was voted that the town would indemnify them against any consequences of such payment. This was decidedly a revolutionary step. The attitude of the town was unmistakable. No wonder they got their guns ready for immediate use and laid in more powder and ball. If King George had prevailed in the war against the colonies, our patriotic predecessors might have been hung for treason. In September, 1776, these guns were at Boston.

In January, 1775, the town proceeded to create a military establishment, providing for the enlistment of minute-men, and proposed to send beef, pork, grain, and other provisions for the poor of Boston.

The committee of correspondence chosen March 4, 1776, were Samuel Fisher, Dr. Ebenezer Daggett, Deacon Theodore Man, Mr. Joseph Fairbanks, Mr. John Craig, Mr. Daniel Holbrook, Mr. Hezekiah Fisher, Mr. Joseph Hawes, Capt. Asa Fairbanks, Capt. Peres Cushing, and Mr. Joseph Whiting, Jr.

At the first alarm Wrentham was ready to send men to the battle-field. Her patriotism was not confined to words. Witness the muster-rolls which proclaim this fact:

Capt. Lemuel Kollock, who also commanded a company of minute-men in April, 1775, was a conspicuous and influential citizen, and his name often appears in connection with the patriotic measures discussed in the town-meetings. His death was occasioned by a fall from his horse on the 14th day of July, 1795, in the sixty-seventh year of his age.

Capt. Samuel Cowell, the son of Joseph, was born in 1737. He commanded a company of minute-men at the time of the alarm in April, 1775, and probably at other times was commanding officer of men who were destined for the continental army, as was Capt. Samuel Fisher.

Capt. David Holbrook, of the northerly part of the town, had command of a company at the time of the alarm in April, 1775.

There were also companies commanded by Capts. John Boyd, Asa Fairbanks, and Elijah Pond respectively, that marched from Wrentham on the 19th day of April, 1775, in the colony service. Capt. Thomas Bacon commanded a company that marched from Wrentham April 30, 1775. Capt. Samuel Cowell also had command of a company about the same time. It also appears from the military rolls at the State House, that a number of men of the company called the North Company, in the West Precinct, enlisted into the Continental army in 1778. Also a company under the command of Capt. Samuel Fisher, composed largely of Wrentham men, enlisted for three years or during the war.

Capt. Oliver Pond, of Wrentham, enlisted in the eight-months' service in the Continental army, in Col. Joseph Read's regiment, April 27, 1775. He was first captain in this, the Sixth, Massachusetts. Afterwards the regiment was called the Thirteenth Massachusetts Regiment. Upon the expiration of the time—eight months—he again enlisted for one year. He went with the army from the neighborhood of Boston to New York, and then to the "Jerseys," and participated in the battles of Trenton and Princeton and other contests of the campaign.

In 1777, in consequence, it is understood, of some acts or of some proposed acts of the Continental Congress in regard to the army and its officers which were displeasing to him, he resigned his office of captain and left the army.

But when Shay's rebellion broke out he took command of the military company which marched from Wrentham and vicinity to Springfield, where the rebels, refusing to lay down their arms, and having been fired upon, fell into confusion and soon dispersed. The roll of that company was almost the only paper of Capt. Pond's that escaped the fire, when the house in which he was residing was burned.

He was often honored by his fellow-townsmen by appointment to places of trust and responsibility. A soldier of the Revolution, who had known him well, summed up his opinion of the hero in these two lines of his epitaph,—

"None more wise, more fit for duty, None more faithful to his trust."¹

Upon the 5th day of June, 1776, among other instructions given to their representatives in General Court, the inhabitants in open town-meeting adopted the following: "We, your constituents therefore think that to be subject or dependent on the crown of Great Britain would not only be impracticable but unsafe to the State. The inhabitants of this town therefore, in full town-meeting, unanimously instruct and direct you to give your vote that if the Honorable American Congress, in whom we place the highest confidence under God, should think it necessary for the safety of the united colonies to declare them independent on Great Britain, that we, your constituents, with our lives and fortunes, will most cheerfully support them in the measure."

We should look in vain in any history of the war of the Revolution for a more decided manifestation of spirit. It was, indeed, the spirit of the times. Every man who voted for these instructions was a traitor to his king; a rebel against the government to which he owed allegiance. But alarming as was the prospect, fearful as might be the consequences, our patriotic fathers did not hesitate to assume this attitude. We know not the history of the struggle until we examine the recorded acts and opinions of the little revolutionary towns whose spirit sustained the courage of Assemblies and Congresses. This vote, it will be observed, was passed one month before Congress declared independence of Great Britain. His majesty's name was omitted for the first time in the warrants in 1775, and the freeholders were summoned in the name of the government and people of the Massachusetts Bay for the first time May 6, 1776.

The town voted that the soldiers who enlisted for three years should receive forty shillings per month from the town; and in obedience to an act of the General Court the selectmen fixed a tariff for articles commonly sold.

In May, 1777, the instructions to Benjamin Guild, the representative, contain the following: "New scenes of horror and devastation present themselves, while the fleets and armies of the tyrant of Great Britain are on our coasts, and around our dwellings we are disturbed by internal enemies," and they direct him to give his vote for a constitution and frame of government. And a committee was chosen to inform the government against loyalists, and another to hire men to complete this town's quota. It was also voted that the families of those who have gone to the war be provided for.

In 1778, the town voted to accept the articles of confederation. A report of the committee to hire soldiers for the war stated that a seventh part of the male inhabitants were enlisted in the war as soldiers, and the sum of eighteen hundred pounds was voted to defray the expenses of raising the town's quota of the Continental army.

On the 20th of May of the same year the inhabitants gave their votes in favor of the first constitution and frame of popular government in Massachusetts. But the people of the colony rejected it. At the same time provision was again made for the families of non-commissioned officers and soldiers who had gone to the war.

In 1779, a committee against monopoly and forestalling was chosen, and ninety-two votes were cast for a constitutional convention,—none against it. The town, notwithstanding the straits to which it was reduced, did not forget the men who had gone to the battle-fields, as appears by the frequent votes passed in aid of their families. An instance occurred this year in a vote of twenty pounds to the heirs of John Druce "as a bounty for his enlisting into the Continental army." They also still resolved to maintain the war by hiring and paying men to enlist into the service, and exempted them from taxation.

In September, 1780, a committee was chosen to procure beef for the army, and in January of the following year the sum of one hundred and twenty thousand pounds was granted to hire the men called for to serve in the Continental army for three years and to pay for beef for the army. The General Court having required Wrentham to furnish a certain number of shirts, hose, and blankets, the selectmen inform the assessors that the sum of four hundred and sixteen pounds in silver is necessary for this purpose, and as there is no money in the treasury they are requested to assess the sum upon the inhabitants in silver money.

This was about the time when, notwithstanding successes at the South, the country seemed to be on the brink of ruin. Although aid seemed at hand upon the arrival of Rochambeau and De Grasse, and although some temporary relief had been obtained, yet no sufficient and reliable means of supplying the wants of the army had been provided. The enemy was in possession of a large part of the country; the Americans, whose campaigns were to be extensive, had scarcely an army and were wholly without money. Their bills of credit were worthless, not being a legal tender, or taken even for taxes. Borrowing of France, Spain, and Holland was attempted. Franklin obtained a gift of six millions of livres from Louis XVI., who also guaranteed a loan of ten millions made by Holland to the United States. This success, added to the labors of Robert Morris, the new treasurer, who brought not only zeal and great ability but his own private fortune to the rescue, brought confidence to the public, and economy took the place of waste.

Upon the conclusion of the war the town instructed the representative "to use his influence to persuade the General Court to call on Congress to redeem the outstanding bills of credit now in the hands of treasurers and individuals in this State; and that the delegates in Congress be directed to obtain without delay a liquidation of all Continental accounts, that this State may speedily know their due proportion of the public expense, so that a just average may be made through the United States as soon as may be of the public debt.

The town, in 1776, being threatened with a visitation of the smallpox, Josiah Blake's house was ordered to be used for a hospital. And the next year Dr. Daggett was authorized "to carry on inoculation of the small pox at that house on certain conditions."

The town at last agreed, in 1778, that the inhabitants of the West Precinct might be set off into a separate township, according to certain metes and bounds. The General Court passed an act in accordance with the desire of the petitioners, incorporating the inhabitants of the West Precinct into a township by the name of Franklin, with boundaries which differed but little if any from the bounds of the precinct. This was on the 2d day of March, 1778.

Foxborough having been incorporated June 10, 1778, from parts of Wrentham, Walpole, Stoughton, and Sharon, a report was made of the amounts due to several persons within the limits of the new township, being the sums which they had paid towards building the meeting-house. The whole sum was £26 0s. 10d. 3qr.

In 1779 the salary voted the Rev. Mr. Bean was one thousand pounds. The year previous his salary was one hundred and thirty pounds. This shows how rapidly and alarmingly the currency had depreciated. To illustrate this, I will add that the assessors were directed in assessing the one thousand pounds for Mr. Bean to make a separate column of what each person's proportion would be in a tax of £66 13s. 4d., and that any person might pay his proportion of said sum as follows, viz.: Indian corn at three shillings per bushel, good ground malt at five shillings per bushel, rye at four shillings, clear salt pork at five pence per pound, good mutton at two pence two farthings per pound, tried tallow at sixpence per pound, good wool at one shilling four pence per pound, good flax at eight pence per pound, and other necessary articles as they were commonly sold before the year 1775. The inference is that the one thousand pounds in the currency of that day was equal to only £66 13s. 4d.¹

It was in the same year (1779) voted "that Mr. Bean use Doct. Watts' hymns as well as psalms in singing in public assembly in this town."

Having in May, 1780, voted against the new constitution, the inhabitants granted fifty thousand pounds to defray town charges, and, upon the 4th of September, cast their first votes for a Governor and other State officers. Fifty-seven votes were given, all for John Hancock. The representative was instructed to vote for the repeal of the excise act, "because it obliges every individual who consumes rum and other spirituous liquors to pay duties on the same; the most wealthy, who purchase large quantities, are not subject to pay any duties on the same, as the act now stands."

The voters expressed their disapprobation of the act of the Continental Congress called the Commutation Act (granting half-pay for life to all officers who should serve until the end of the war); they also disapproved of the Society of the Cincinnati.

For some years the subject of a new county had been agitated, and Wrentham was quite urgent upon the matter, sending delegates to conventions holden to consider that subject, and instructing the representatives in General Court to endeavor to accomplish it. Boston was the shire town, and all county and court business must be done there at very great inconvenience. But the new county was not established by the General Court until 1793.

On the 2d day of August, 1784, the town voted to join with the church in giving Mr. Adoniram Judson a call to settle in the ministerial office as a colleague with the Rev. Joseph Bean. There were one hundred and five votes in his favor and eighty-four against him. Mr. Judson declined the call, and a committee was chosen for the purpose of hiring preaching. Mr. Bean died Dec. 12, 1784. The kind offers of several clergymen, who had tendered each a day's preaching for the late Mr. Bean's family, were accepted.

Mr. Bean's publications were a century sermon, preached Oct. 26, 1773, one hundred years after the town was incorporated, and printed by request in 1774; and a sermon preached before the congregation of the First Church and Parish of Wrentham "On a Day of Public Humiliation, Fasting, and Prayer," A.D. 1775. Published in 1837.

Of Mr. Bean's ancestry but little is known. It seems that he was established in business in Cambridge, Mass., and was converted under the preaching of Whitefield and Tennent. He left his business and entered college and was graduated, at the age of thirty years, in 1748. He was ordained Dec. 5, 1750, and married Elizabeth, daughter of the Rev. Henry Mesinger, his predecessor in the ministry in Wrentham. The epitaph on his gravestone is as follows:

"Near half an age with every good man's praise
Among his flock ye shepherd passed his days;
The friend ye comfort of ye sick and poor,
Want never knocked unheeded at his door.
Oft when his duty call'd, disease & pain
Strove to confine him; but they strove in vain,
All mourn his death; his virtues long they tri'd;
They knew not how they lov'd him till he dy'd."

In October, 1785, the town voted to join the church in the call and settlement of the Rev. David Avery to the work of the ministry in this place by one hundred and fifty-one votes to one against it. A committee having been chosen "to fix his settlement," reported that two hundred pounds be given to Mr. Avery; and one hundred pounds per annum as his salary. This report was adopted by the town.²

¹ A committee reported that the payments made to Mr. Bean since the commencement of the war would not be equal to seventy pounds in silver.

² "The Rev. David Avery was born April 5, 1746, in Franklin, Connecticut. His father's name was John. He was converted by

Mr. Avery's reply to the invitation of the church and town was as follows :

"TO THE CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH AND SOCIETY OF THE TOWN OF WRENTHAM.—Brethren and Gentlemen, as you were pleased on the tenth of October last to unite in inviting me to settle in the Gospel Ministry I have taken your proposals into serious and mature consideration, and do now in the sincerity and cheerfulness of my heart declare my acceptance of your call. And I do also engage without reserve in the strength of Christ carefully and faithfully to exercise my office amongst you for your spiritual advantage and highest interest as long as the preaching of Whitefield, fitted for college at D. Wheelock's school, Connecticut, entered Yale College, and was graduated in 1769. He engaged in teaching Indian schools. He studied theology with Rev. Dr. E. Wheelock, of Dartmouth College, preached on Long Island, and in 1771 was ordained as missionary to the Oneida Indians. Leaving this field he returned to New England and was installed at Gageboro' (now Windsor), Vt., March 25, 1773, and dismissed April 14, 1777, to go as chaplain in the army. On his return he was settled at Bennington, Vt., May 3, 1780, and dismissed June 17, 1783, and settled at Wrentham May 25, 1786, and dismissed April 21, 1794. He preached afterwards to a congregation at North Wrentham, where a church was organized in 1795, until some time in 1797, when he removed to Mansfield, Conn. He engaged in missionary labor under the direction of the Massachusetts Domestic Missionary Society, going into New York and Maine. He afterwards, from 1798 to 1801, preached in Chaplin, Conn., having gathered a new church and society there, called the Union Church. In 1817 he visited his daughter, Mrs. Hewett, in Shepardstown, Va. He received a cordial and unanimous call to settle in Middletown, in the vicinity of Shepardstown, but was taken ill and died there, and was buried on the week of his intended installation, the clergy of the invited council officiating as bearers. His voice was so clear and sonorous and his articulation so distinct that it was a common saying in the army that every soldier in a brigade could hear all that he said. When the news of the battle of Lexington reached Gageboro' Mr. Avery's parishioners assembled in arms, formed themselves into a company, elected him for their captain, and marched for Cambridge on the 22d of April. Mr. Avery preached at Northampton the next day from Neh. iv. 14. They arrived at Cambridge Saturday 29th, and were honorably received and congratulated by the troops assembled. Mr. Avery preached on Sunday afternoon to the troops from a temporary stage erected in the college area, from Neh. iv. 14, and on Monday he began a regular course of morning and evening prayer with the regiment to which he belonged. On Tuesday he commenced visiting and praying with the sick and wounded regulars in the hospitals. May 11th, fast-day, he preached on Cambridge common; May 29th he volunteered with an expedition to Noddles' Island, where there was a brisk skirmish, standing guard two hours. July 20th, having preached to the troops again, it being a fast-day ordered by the Continental Congress, he on the 27th read to the troops the declaration of war against Gen. Gage. His people (of Gageboro') consented that he might engage in the next campaign, the neighboring ministers agreeing to supply his pulpit two-thirds of the time while he was absent. Mr. Avery often acted as physician and assistant surgeon. He was at the taking of Burgoyne, the capture of the Hessians at Trenton, and in the battle of Princeton. When settled at Bennington, at the request of the Governor and Council he took the field with Gen. Allen, and was in the battle of Bennington and assisted in dressing the wounds of the soldiers."—Hist. Mend. Ass.

divine wisdom shall see fit to continue me with you. And may God Almighty grant that we may be mutual comforts and blessings to each other that we may rejoice together in each other at the appearing of Jesus Christ, to whom be glory in the churches throughout all ages world without end. Amen.

"DAVID AVERY."

Three years afterwards his salary was increased to one hundred and thirty pounds, so well and smoothly had pastor and people moved together. So auspicious a settlement would seem to augur well for church and people. The vote was nearly unanimous, it seemed to be hearty. Yet the dawn was soon overcast and a violent ministerial quarrel commenced, destined to end only with the disruption of the pastoral and ministerial relation.

In 1791 the warrant for town-meeting, among other things, contained an article "to see if the inhabitants . . . are satisfied with the Rev. David Avery as a Gospel Minister," and "provided the major part of the town are satisfied with the Rev. David Avery, to see if the town will consent that any persons that are dissatisfied may go to any other society to do duty and receive privilege," and "to see if it be the mind of the town to recommend the Rev. David Avery to call a church meeting, agreeable to the request of Deacon David Holbrook and others presented to him Oct. 15, 1790." Although no action was taken at this meeting, yet the fact that such an one was called was equivalent to a declaration that war had begun. It is true that in the scanty memorials of that controversy we find no record of its severity or bitterness in hostile speeches and partisan manifestoes preserved, yet tradition says it was marked by unusual asperity, that not only the community, but families were divided into Averians and Anti-Averians. A few years since people were living whose memory went back to that time, who, in their young days, had had their ears stunned with the din of the conflict, and whose eyes saw the veteran combatants go to the field with as much zeal as the Crusaders of former days went against the Infidel. Meeting after meeting was held, council upon council convened, war-worn veterans were appointed to guard the door of the church to keep out the minister whom they had so unanimously called. The division was so wide and so deadly that reconciliation became impracticable. In the progress of the controversy Mr. Avery and his adherents withdrew, or were forced from the meeting-house, and the pulpit was supplied by a committee. Eventually, as a result of this unfortunate division, the church at North Wrentham was organized, largely from those who had adhered to Mr. Avery.

A committee, chosen by the town, to treat with

Mr. Avery, to see on what conditions he will agree to dissolve his pastoral connection with this society, reported his answer as follows: "As things appear to me, I do not think it consistent with my duty I owe to God and this people to treat with this committee on the subject of dissolving my pastoral relation." It was then resolved, after long debate, that Mr. Avery come into this meeting, and give his reasons why he could not treat with the committee on the subject of dissolving his pastoral relation with this people. This meeting was adjourned to eight o'clock the next morning, and a committee chosen to invite Mr. Avery to attend, and then the meeting was adjourned until one o'clock, at which time Mr. Avery attended, and read before the town his reasons why he could not treat with said committee. The moderator then, in behalf of the town, requested the reverend gentleman to lay his reasons on the table, or a copy of them; but he said he should not. It was then voted by the town that he be requested to lay said reasons on the table, that they might be considered by paragraphs, but in the interim the reverend gentleman withdrew. It was then determined "that a committee of ten be chosen, five from each side of the question, to consider the difficulties the town labors under respecting their pastor, and that they act discretionary and report to the town at the adjournment." This committee were Elias Bacon, Lemuel Kollock, John Hall, Abijah Fisher, David Fisher, Thomas George, James Smith, Amos Walton, Daniel Messinger, and Ebenezer Blake, Jr., and, after conference, reported that they could not agree.

In the warrant for the April town-meeting was an article "to see if it be the mind of the town to employ the Rev. David Avery any longer as a public teacher of piety and religion and morality, or after due consideration of the ill consequences which may be expected from our remaining in our present unhappy situation, whether it is not best for the cause of religion and the happiness of this society to employ a public teacher whose sentiments and performances may better correspond with the ideas of this society in so important a station;" also, "if circumstances require a separation, to determine on what conditions it shall be made, and which party shall improve the meeting-house.

Upon the 4th of February, 1793, the town, upon a vote by yeas and nays, "resolved by seventy-four to one not to employ Mr. Avery as a gospel minister in this place any longer." Lemuel Kollock, Esq., Oliver Pond, Esq., and Dr. Jenks Norton were appointed a committee to inform Mr. Avery of this vote. On the 11th of the same month it was resolved that a conference be held "on the subject of our difficulties with the Rev. Mr. Avery and his adherents, and the propriety of his removal from the ministerial office in this place, and that several neighboring divines be requested to attend and assist us in said conference, and that we request Mr. Avery and his adherents to join with us in this conference and in the choice of divines for that purpose; and that, after sufficient inquiry may be made into the nature and grounds of our difficulties, and each party have expressed their ideas upon the subject, the divines be desired to give their opinion on the case and to advise the parties to such measures as may tend to dispel the difficulties and reinstate peace and harmony; and if Mr. Avery don't think fit to join in such conference that he and his adherents be requested to join in calling an Ecclesiastical Council to hear and judge and give their advice upon all the difficulties which shall be stated to them by the aggrieved bretheren of the church and congregation previous to the choice of the council." A committee was appointed to wait upon Mr. Avery and inform him of these votes and request his answer. Mr. Avery's answer was as follows:

"To those of the inhabitants of the town of Wrentham who have assumed to act as a town-meeting and to pass votes relative to me, David Avery, minister of the Congregational Church and people in said town.

"GENTLEMEN: I have this day received from you two proposals viz: First, that I with my adherents hold a conference with you on the subject of your difficulties with me and the propriety of my removal from the ministerial office in this place. Secondly, and if I don't think fit to join in said conference that I and my adherents be requested to join in calling an Ecclesiastical Council to hear and Judge and to give advice upon all the difficulties which shall be stated to them by the aggrieved bretheren of the church and congregation previous to the choice of the Council. To these proposals I beg leave to answer so far as they respect my voice, that I see not that I can comply with them as I deem your meeting illegal and you not to be in a proper capacity as the town of Wrentham for making these proposals.

"DAVID AVERY."

The above answer being read and duly considered, it was voted that a committee of five men be chosen to join with the aggrieved brethren of the church "to state all the difficulties we labor under respecting the Rev. David Avery, our pastor, and to lay it before the council." This committee consisted of Lemuel Kollock, Esq., Capt. Benjamin Shepard, Nathan Blake, Oliver Pond, Esq., Jeremiah Day, Dr. Jenks Norton, and Maj. Samuel Cowell.

Previous to these votes and acts of the town the church had been deeply stirred by the controversy. In the year 1792 there had been a trial of the pastor before the church upon charges of heresy and imprudence, of which he was acquitted by a small majority.

We have now but scant means of ascertaining what were the peculiar tenets of Mr. Avery that were deemed so heretical. But the statement of the Rev. Elisha Fisk, who succeeded him in the ministry at Wrentham, may be received as no doubt a true and careful one. He says, "Some errors in the doctrines of my immediate predecessor and his treatment of those who differed from him were said to be the exciting cause of the difficulties which had existed. One of the subjects on which he strongly and frequently insisted was that the atonement consisted in the obedience of Christ, and that his sufferings and death made no part of it only as they were matters of obedience. This was contrary to what was believed to be the teaching of the Scriptures on a fundamental point, to the articles of faith and to the preaching of the former ministry. In some other minor points he was thought to be incorrect. Instead of being conciliating towards those who were dissatisfied it was said that he was overbearing, and made the impression that there was a ruling mind in the church, and that what he wished must be done. For this all the church and people were not prepared."

Speaking of Mr. Avery himself, Mr. Fisk says, "He was a man of commanding personal appearance, of a handsome address, of a loud and well modulated voice. Apart from his band and black coat, he might have been taken for a general instead of a chaplain in the army, as he actually had been."

At the request of a minority of the church a meeting was called in August of the same year for the purpose of conference on present difficulties, and, if necessary, to appoint a mutual council. A discussion arose as to what was to be submitted to the council. The Anti-Averians wished to lay before them all the difficulties in which they found themselves, and to ask the advice of the council thereon involving the question of dismissing Mr. Avery. But the influence of the pastor was strong enough to restrict that action to the precise grounds of complaint which had been alleged in his recent trial by the church. Thus limited, the council simply revised the doings of the church, reversing its judgment in some particulars, and sustaining it in others, and advised Mr. Avery carefully to review his sentiments, and to avoid in his public discourses all expressions which may tend to destroy solemnity and excite levity, and in all his conversation to express himself with prudence and moderation, and the church were advised to exercise candor and tenderness towards their pastor.

Some twelve months before this Mr. Avery had been requested by thirteen members of the church to call a meeting thereof to take the opinion of the church upon certain questions involving the points deemed by these members heretical. To this request he replied "that, if the whole church should request him to call a church meeting, he would not do it unless he thought it best." In 1793, at a church meeting, the aggrieved brethren requested Mr. Avery and his adherents to join them in the choice of an ecclesiastical council "who should consider all our matters of grievance respecting Mr. Avery's doctrine and conduct, and the expediency of dissolving his pastoral relation." Whereupon Mr. Avery invited the majority to repair to his house, and there it was voted not to join with the minority in the choice of an ecclesiastical council. Then a letter was addressed to him, as follows: "Rev. Sir,—Forasmuch as division and disunion are become very prevalent in this place by reason of your sentiments and conduct, which we have publicly complained of and which we apprehend have been principally condemned by the late mutual council; and forasmuch as there appears not the least prospect of harmony being restored to this divided church and town without your removal, we therefore most earnestly request you to ask a dismission from your pastoral relation to us." This was dated Feb. 8, 1793, and was signed by twenty-two members of the church. The aggrieved brethren then joined with a committee of the town in a letter-missive to several churches, desiring them to meet in council to consider the subject of recognizing them as the First Church in Wrentham.

In accordance with this request the churches above mentioned sent delegates to a council which convened on the 26th day of March, 1793, and invited Mr. Avery and his adherents to join with a view to restore the peace and union of this town, and particularly to consider the subject of a petition to the General Court for an act of incorporation.

Mr. Avery refused this invitation. Then the council determined among other things that about one-half of the acting male members appeared to be conscientiously aggrieved with the pastor's deviation from principles and discipline, that Mr. Avery's adherents have petitioned the General Court for an act of incorporation; that the step which the aggrieved brethren have taken in calling a council, appears to have been the only one left them to obtain redress; that they have honored themselves by seeking in a patient and persevering manner redress of their grievances according to the usual practice of Congregational Churches; and after some reflections and suggestions arising from their unhappy condition recognize them as the original Congregational Church in Wrentham, together with such as should join them. At a church meeting May 23, 1793, the minority took into consideration the result of the late council, and after stating also the fact that Mr. Avery's adherents had petitioned to be incorporated as the original Congregational Church in Wrentham, declare that this was probably done by the advice of Mr. Avery, who thereby had left the rest of the church and the town to take care of themselves or to worship with a minister whom they had long considered a grievance; that they had been recognized by the council as the original church, and finding that the petitioners have notified the town according to the order of the court and thereby fully manifested their intention to be a separate society, therefore voted that the pastoral relation between this church and the Rev. David Avery is dissolved. After voting to adhere to the church covenant of 1699, they also passed a vote to request the town to join them in obtaining and settling a minister. It may be remarked here, that the town had in April, 1793, remonstrated against the incorporation of a new society.

In June Mr. Avery appointed a meeting of all the members that formerly belonged to the church to meet at the meeting-house. The recognized church met at the house of Abijah Fisher, and chose a committee to inform Mr. Avery "that if he or his adherents have any business with us or any proposals to make to us they may know where to treat with us." The committee reported to Mr. Avery at the meeting-house, who said in reply to their message that he knew but one church in this town.

On June 25, 1793, Mr. Avery had a council at his house, who sent a message to the recognized church that they were ready to receive any proposals. That body replied that their recognition shall be no obstacle to the general peace and union of the congregation, and upon Mr. Avery's being removed from every pretence of a pastoral relation to the church in this town, they would joyfully consent to a firm union. After one or two more messages all communication ceased. In July the church voted that since the deacons, treasurer, and a number of the members had gone off with Mr. Avery having all the church lands and other property, that a committee be chosen to settle with their late treasurer, and request him to deliver up the property in his hands for the use of said church, and to demand of Mr. Avery peaceable possession of the church lands and to forbid any person to improve said lands and prosecute them if necessary. Deacons Thomas Man and Jacob Pond were invited to join the original recognized church. In December, Mr. Avery was invited to join them in calling a mutual council to give their opinion and advice upon all matters of difficulty and the propriety of his dismission from his ministerial office under all circumstances. Twenty-four members joined in this invitation. Mr. Avery replied that he did not know them in their assumed capacity; that it was too weighty a matter to act upon without the sanction of the church, and would be incompatible with the rules of Congregational Churches and the eighteenth chapter of Matthew. He was asked to put his answer in writing, but he refused. Some other attempts were made but proved fruitless; and as it was improbable that Mr. Avery would ever consent to submit the question to a mutual council according to their request, it was resolved by the old church to summon a council for that purpose. The town was notified and requested to join, and did join.

Mr. Avery and his adherents were also notified and requested to join. In the mean time while the above correspondence was taking place between the members of the recognized church and Mr. Avery, the town was also acting on the same subject. A correspondence ensued between the town and Mr. Avery by committees, but it ended in a flat refusal of Mr. Avery to recognize the town-meetings as legal. The town, therefore, after exhausting all other means, requested him to ask a dismission. This he refused, and the town proceeded to declare his ministerial relation to it dissolved by seventy-seven votes against twenty-seven. This was on May 20, A.D. 1793. It was also made a matter of complaint that Mr. Avery and his adherents had inaugurated a movement for a new incorporation; and the town declared that if it took place it would be of itself a dissolution of the relation between it and Mr. Avery, and voted in June to hire a gospel minister to supply the pulpit here agreeable to the request of the original Congregational Church in this town. At the town-meeting in June a letter from Mr. Avery was read, referring to the town's vote of dismissal and declaring it illegal, and tendering his services to the town as its minister, requesting that he might not be obstructed in the free and unembarrassed use of his office in this place. In reply the town declare that "the tender of his services has but little claim to attention, but that they wish not to disturb him in the free exercise of his ministrations to those who wish to improve him, provided the town is not interrupted thereby; that the town propose soon to have a preacher of the gospel, and remonstrated against his using the meeting-house and pulpit any longer as a minister, and caution him against obstructing the town in the free and unembarrassed use thereof for the public worship of God in future." A committee was chosen and instructed to keep the meeting-house shut on the Sabbath in future "unless the committee chosen to procure preaching should desire it; provided that Mr. Avery might have it for his council; further, if he and his adherents will engage to let us have it in peace when we shall want it at all other times it may be open for their improvement." In January, 1794, the town voted as has been stated to join the original Congregational Church in calling an ecclesiastical council.

This council assembled at the house of Col. Benjamin Hawes on the 25th day of March, 1794, and after a vain attempt to persuade Avery to join it, proceeded to the meeting-house and conducted their proceedings in public.

The report of the council, which was unanimous, sustains the disaffected brethren and town except in voting Mr. Avery's dismissal without the advice of a council. By their advice both the recognized church and town voted again that Mr. Avery be dismissed from his pastoral and ministerial relations. The brethren notified him of this vote, he in reply censured their proceedings and still claimed to be their minister. In May of the same year the brethren of the recognized church proceeded to organize. Deacons Man and Pond were invited to return, but as they did not, the church made choice of deacons pro tempore. Mr. Avery's adherents generally were also invited. A committee was appointed to reckon with Thomas Man, church treasurer, that the church might know what was in his hands, and forbid him from paying any of the church money to Mr. Avery; also a committee was chosen to demand of Mr. Avery the church records.

On the 30th day of July the Averians invited the brethren of the recognized church to join in requesting Mr. Avery to join with the church in calling a mutual council to consider, first, how the parties should be reunited; second, the dismissal of the pastor in his especial relation to them, the Averians; and if this be deemed expedient that the council should prescribe the way in which his dismissal ought to be effected. To this the recognized brethren on the 11th day of August reply, first, that the matters embraced in the communication are important, and that they wish to treat them with all respect which their unhappy situation. . . . requires; that reunion with the Averians is their earnest wish (excepting Mr. Avery himself). . . . that they consider Mr. Avery legally dismissed and therefore cannot comply with the second request of his adherents. This drew out an able rejoinder from the Averians, concluding with a proposal to join in requesting Mr. Avery to unite with the church in calling a mutual council to consider first whether he is or is not the minister; second, if he be the minister, is it expedient that he should be dismissed from his special relation to us (the adherents), and if expedient how it shall be effected; third, how shall the parties be reunited?

The brethren of the recognized church replied and declined the proposal. This was on the 20th of September. On the 2d of October Mr. Avery, on behalf of himself and his adherents, made a communication, stating that they should make no further proposals at present.

In 1795, Deacons Man and Pond refusing to give any account of church property in their hands, and having attempted to seize the tankards and other vessels made use of at communion seasons, the church voted that unless they should appear at the next church meeting, and give the church satisfaction, they ought to be dismissed. John Hall, Philip Blake, and Amos Walton were chosen deacons, and in March Deacons Man and Pond were dismissed. The new officers were instructed to demand the church records of Mr. Avery, and a committee was chosen to confer with Mr. Avery's adherents, with a view to accomplish a reconciliation.

On the 20th of October a council, held at Mr. Avery's house, resolved that reunion was very desirable, and therefore advised Mr. Avery to ask a dismissal, and the church (that portion of it which adhered to him) to grant it. This was accordingly done in presence of the council, and communicated to the brethren of the recognized church, who acknowledge the receipt, and state that they are heartily desirous of reunion as soon as a church meeting could be regularly appointed for that purpose; this was signed by eight members. The council being, as they say, discouraged by this reply, proceeded to the business before them. After deciding various questions of church discipline, they recommended the adherents of Mr. Avery to serve the moderator of the recognized church with an attested copy of the result of this council, and also to hold themselves, for four weeks afterwards, in readiness to reunite with them upon gospel principles, but if they should refuse a reunion, then it was the opinion of the council that the churches ought to allow them to be a church of Christ in regular standing, and that they, the council, would consider them a sister church, and treat them in all respects according to the rules of Christian fellowship and holy order. Upon the 23d of November the recognized church informed those who lately adhered to Mr. Avery that they desired reunion, and waited to hear them speak their wishes on the subject, and in December a conference was voted.

The committee of conference met, Mr. Emmons being with them by request. The Averians presented two papers containing proposals. The first proposed that the recognition should be renounced and the votes dismissing the deacons canceled. This the recognized church agreed to, with the amendment that when they dismissed the deacons they thought it justifiable, and had seen no reason to alter their opinion, but for reasons mentioned would cheerfully rescind that vote, and do hereby rescind it. This amendment was rejected by the Averians. The second paper contained a renunciation on the part of the Averians of superiority to the other brethren, and all pretensions to separation, although they had heretofore claimed to be the church of Christ in Wrentham. The third paper proposed amnesty and oblivion. The brethren of the recognized church responded to these proposals after some statements, first, that they would overlook error of judgment, and suppress unchristian and unfriendly reflections upon conduct; secondly, would require the same of the Averians; thirdly, that members of each communion should be mutually admitted to the other; fourthly, that this reciprocity should also be extended to the deacons of either body; fifthly, and also to the church records of each party, that they may be admonished in time to come not to fall out by the way; sixthly, each party shall consider these united factions as the same church as before the separation, mutually renouncing all claim to superiority; seventhly, this reunion to be publicly ratified in church meeting on some future day mutually agreed upon as a day of humiliation, fasting, and prayer, to seek the divine favor and direction in their choice and settlement of a gospel minister.

The brethren of the recognized church on the 9th day of December voted not to accept the proposals of the Averians without the amendments which they had appended, but if the Averians would not accept the amendments then they were requested to consider the proposals of the recognized brethren. On the same day the Averians proposed reunion on the ground of an abandonment of the recognition and a mutual rescission of all votes passed since (excepting only that vote passed by the Averians themselves dismissing Mr. Avery), and retaining the covenant and the officers of the church before the separation. To this the other party say "we have received a paper . . . containing new proposals, to which we cannot . . . reply until you have given a definitive answer to our last communication."

To this the Averians reply that they are ready to accept any amendments to their first proposition that would be proper, but cannot accede to such as had been offered.

The other party replies that it cannot consent to this (i.e., to withdraw its amendments), and proposes a committee of conference. The last communication was as follows:

"To the brethren of the recognized church:

"We see no advantage arising from going over the ground again. We will wait thirty minutes longer to receive of you a definite answer to our last proposals. Your neglecting to comply with our request in the proposals for a definitive answer we shall consider as a rejection of said proposals.

"Dec. 9, 1795, 40 minutes after 5 in the evening."

After this the church meeting was dissolved. On the 14th of December Deacon Man was dismissed from his office as treasurer. Afterwards, in August, 1796, it was voted to hear and confer upon any proposals that one, any, or all of the church lately adhering to the Rev. David Avery have to make respecting a reunion with the church. June, 1797, the deacons were instructed to supply the pulpit if the town's committee do not, and a committee was chosen to help the deacons settle their accounts relative to lawsuits. It appears by an account of the deacons presented to the church in 1797 that a suit was commenced by Thomas Man against Aaron Hawes. It was tried in 1795. "The trial took up a great deal of time. Mr. Avery was the mover and prosecutor in the action which was brought to try the validity of the vote dismissing Deacon Man, as if that was valid the vote dissolving his pastoral relation was also valid, and the town having concurred his salary was gone from the time of the dismission. So that Mr. Avery was on trial. The judges were of opinion that Mr. Avery's principles of church government were arbitrary and erroneous; that the vote for dissolving his pastoral relation was regular and valid; that the vote of the church given by a majority dismissing the plaintiff from the office of deacon was regular and effectual, and that he could not maintain the action."

In July, 1798, the church (recognized) voted unanimously to desire the Rev. Elisha Fisk "to preach in this place longer than the time for which he is now engaged," and in November he received a call to settle in the ministry at Wrentham. This call was renewed on the 6th day of March, 1799, unanimously, and on the 25th day of April, 1799, he gave an affirmative answer, as follows:

"To the Original Congregational Church of Christ in Wrentham:

"Having received from you brethren an invitation to take the pastoral care and charge of you as a church and to settle with you in the work of the gospel ministry, I do by this declare my acceptance of it.

"ELISHA FISK."

The town had, in November of the year 1798, concurred with the church in the settlement of Mr. Fisk, on condition that he be supported by the Congregational society then projected. This society was incorporated in February, 1799. A number of the inhabitants of Wrentham petitioned the General Court to incorporate them into a religious society by the name of the Congregational Society in Wrentham. They set forth that they have raised by subscription three thousand eight hundred and sixty dollars as a fund, the interest of which is to be appropriated to the support of a Congregational minister, and pray to be incorporated for the purpose of holding and managing said fund. The General Court passed an act in response to this petition, and made the society capable of receiving and holding grants or devises of lands or tenements, bequests, donations, etc. By this act of incorporation, and the proceedings of the society under its provisions in connection with the church, the relations between minister and town which had so long subsisted were terminated.

Mr. Fisk thus entered upon a pastorate which reached to more than fifty years. At the date of his ordination, June, 1799, the church is said to have been reduced to ten members. Such was the force and bitterness of the Averian controversy. In his semi-centennial discourse he says he was the forty-ninth candidate, only one other of the forty-nine having received a call. He has been thus described (it is said by Dr. R. S. Storrs) with reference to that period, "Of observing mind, careful and conciliating in his conversation and manners, interesting and popular in his pulpit performance, he succeeded, as few other men would, in uniting and holding together very discordant materials, not only at the commencement of his ministry but through the vicissitudes of more than fifty years. He gained and kept the enviable reputation of 'peace-maker.'"¹

The foregoing account of the Averian controversy was taken by the writer, so far as the action of the church is concerned, from the church records more than twenty years ago; and it has been repeated here at length, precisely as it was on the occasion for which it was originally prepared, because it probably exists nowhere else but in the writer's possession, the church records having since that time been lost. At the time referred to these records were in good condition, including even one small volume in the handwriting of Rev. Samuel Man.²

The Congregational Church in Foxborough, in Franklin (once West Wrentham), and in the north parish of Wrentham, now Norfolk, have been formed by those who were formerly members of the original church here organized in 1692. Since the incorporation of the society for the support of the minister no tax has been assessed for that purpose. At the time of Mr. Fisk's settlement the house of worship had neither bell, clock, nor organ. A bell and clock, however, were added probably some time before 1806, as we find the parish assuming at that date the expense of taking care of them. An organ was purchased by ladies of the town by the manufacture and sale of straw and chip bonnets. This instrument was formally dedicated, the Rev. Mr. Fisk preaching from the text, "Praise him with stringed instruments." In his sermon Mr. Fisk defended the use of musical instruments in public worship. That modest organ has been succeeded by others, until, by the munificence, chiefly of one of our citizens, the fine and large one now used was placed in its present position.

After the final settlement of the religious and society disturbances, which were so happily extinguished in the fortunate choice of Mr. Fisk, the people here were peaceable and prosperous.

The population of the town was by the census of 1800 two thousand and sixty-one (2061), and was chiefly agricultural.

But in 1812 the General Court incorporated Nathan Comstock and others by the name of "The Wrentham Manufacturing Company," for the purpose of manufacturing cotton and wool at Wrentham, in the county of Norfolk. In 1813 the Franklin Manufacturing Company was incorporated for the purpose of manufacturing cotton and woolen cloth and yarn in the town of Franklin, upon the same stream; and in 1814 the Walomopogge Manufacturing Company, "for the purpose of manufacturing cotton and woolen cloth and yarn in the town of Wrentham." The former company's mill was commonly called the Bush Factory, the last named the William arrived in 1687, admitted freeman in 1642, member of the church of Salem July 2, 1641, removed to Wenham, where he was town clerk, and representative from 1647 to 1650, and died in 1654. His widow married a Rix of Salem. His grandson, Daniel, removed from Wenham to Upton in 1748, and died about 1761. He had eight children,—Samuel, one of the sons, removed to Shelburne, and was ancestor of Rev. Pliny Fisk. Daniel, the oldest son, born about 1723, married Zelpah Tyler, and had five children. Of them, Robert, born Feb. 24, 1746, married Mary Hall, and had four children. The oldest was Elisha Fisk."—Hist. Mendon Association.

Eagle Factory, while the lowest on the stream was called the City Mills. These mills were all erected upon Mill Brook, so called, the last named near the outlet of the Great Pond, where Crossman & Whiting had the first corn-mill, as related in earlier pages, and the second one on the site of Adams' corn-mill at Jack's pasture. This southwesterly branch of Charles River afforded nearly all the water-power within our present limits. After the introduction of the power-loom in the manufacture of cotton and woolen fabrics, a rush seems to have been made into the business of manufacturing, and a very large number of companies were chartered in Massachusetts to carry on this special branch of industry. The Stony Brook Manufacturing Company was also incorporated in 1814, and is to be added to the list of our manufactories. The business which these companies were organized to carry on was conducted by various owners, agents, and lessees, and with various success. At first they were employed in the manufacture of cloth, and the noise of the looms could be heard proclaiming the power of the stream if not the profit of the manufacturers.

Eli Richardson, Esq., Allen Tillinghast, Esq., and Maj. Thomas S. Mann are remembered as energetic and intelligent manufacturers, who for many years were engaged in business on this old Mill Brook. It is apprehended that none of the numerous mill-owners became wealthy in the prosecution of their calling.

The factory which was first built on or near the site of the present one in South Wrentham or Shepardsville, so called, is supposed to have been the first mill in the vicinity in which water-power was applied to the spinning of cotton or wool. And by some this mill is supposed to have been one of the earliest in the country in which such application was made, it being said to have been the third. It seems that as early as 1795 Mrs. Susannah Shepard was manufacturing goods at that mill. In confirmation of this statement reference is made to an original agreement between herself and Stephen Olney, of Providence, R. I., dated Nov. 13, 1795, as follows, viz.:

"Agreed with Mrs. Susannah Shepard, of Wrentham to make her a chaise by the first of March next for £55 she finding the harness, the Wheels, Leather for top and Lining—remainder to be paid in Goods at Wholesale cash price of her manufacture.

Manufacture of Straw Goods.—Some years ago the late Judge Staples, of Rhode Island, read before the Rhode Island Historical Society, in Providence, a paper upon the rise and progress of the straw-braid business embracing many facts. He said the straw business began very early in Tuscany and in some of the States of Italy. Bonnets and hats of this material were imported ready-made into England. Subsequently they were made an article of export to the American colonies, and were kept for sale in Providence. In the latter part of the last century Mrs. Naomi Whipple, wife of Col. John Whipple, who kept a store at the foot of Constitution Hill, North Main Street, was celebrated for the taste she displayed in trimming hats and bonnets. The braiding of straw in this country was begun in 1798 by Mrs. Betsey Baker, daughter of Joel Metcalf, then with Mrs. Whipple (now, at the date of the paper, of Dedham, Mass.). From her several acquired a knowledge of the process of braiding. Another account informs us that Mrs. Whipple kept a small millinery shop in her husband's store, and that her bonnets came through New York from Europe. She and Hannah (probably Betsey) Metcalf unbraided a piece of the braid and thus learned how it was constructed. Procuring some straw they successfully imitated the braid, and soon after made and sent a box of her own bonnets to her New York importer. In the summer of 1799 several Providence girls came to a boarding-school in Massachusetts wearing their home-made bonnets, which created no little excitement. One of these, Sally Richmond, came to Wrentham Academy (if this means Day's Academy it is a mistake as to time, that institution not having been commenced until some years afterwards; it may be that Mr. Williams' academy at West Wrentham was the one intended). She taught the ladies where she boarded. And in this way straw-braiding was introduced into this State through Wrentham. The first bonnets were made of oat straw flattened, and contained from sixteen to eighteen yards. So popular were these bonnets that no lady was thought to be in style without one, and the demand for them gave a vigorous impulse to the trade, and the sale extended throughout the country. This demand added much to the business of small trading stores by exchange of their goods for straw-braid. The braid thus collected was converted into bonnets, and this led to special manufactories of straw goods.

Messrs. Fisher, Day & Co. entered into this business about the year 1804 and continued until 1816. In the neighboring town of Franklin the Messrs. Thayer carried on the business from about 1810 to 1816, and subsequently Maj. Davis Thayer continued in the business many years, and it is still carried on in the factory of Davis Thayer, Jr., on or near the old site, with greatly enlarged facilities and success. This latter account of the rise and progress of the straw-braid industry may be found in substance in "Dr. Blake's History."

The principal manufacturer of straw-bonnets in Wrentham was Amariah Hall,¹ familiarly known as "Bonnet Hall." He began business about 1802 at the house known as the White house, that being the name of its former occupant. This house stood on the site now occupied by our almshouse. One room in this house was appropriated to this purpose, so small was the business then. There were braiders in almost every family. Mr. Hall continued in the business for some years at this place. Afterwards, about 1812 or a little later, Mr. Hall built the house now owned by Daniel Brown and used as a boarding-house for the employés of Messrs. Brown & Cowell. This was built for a hotel by Mr. Hall and occupied by him as such. An addition to the main building was used by him for the manufacture of straw goods which he continued to carry on. A few years after this Mr. Hall failed in business and returned to Raynham, which was his native place. Mr. James Ware took this building and kept a store therein, dealing also in straw goods. He had also, in company with Asa Day, dealt in straw goods at their store, afterwards known as the "Green Store," on the Norfolk and Bristol turnpike, in Wrentham. Others engaged at later dates in this business, notably Robert Blake, Esq., who acquired a handsome competency for those days and retired. He was one of the unfortunate passengers of the ill-fated steamer "Lexington," which was destroyed by fire on Long Island Sound in 1840, and was among the lost. Howard Mann, Esq., also made straw goods in Wrentham, occupying, after his business became large, the same buildings that Mr. Hall, his predecessor, had done. The business done by Mr. Mann and by the copartners, Mann, Swift & Co., was probably larger than had been done by any one individual or firm before in this place in the same line of business. It is not recollected that any of the manufacturers of straw goods had previously organized factories or shops with machinery used and shop-hands regularly employed. The old custom of trading straw-braid at the stores in exchange for goods was abandoned. People who worked in it in a moderate way either sold their braid to the manufacturers or made it up into hats or bonnets and then sold them in their new shape. We have now no means of knowing the number or value of the goods made at the time when Fisher, Day & Co. and Amariah Hall were in the business. They probably made a few thousand hats and bonnets annually. After Mann, Swift & Co. left the business there was a manufactory of straw goods in the westerly part of the town, at Sheldonville, of which Alonzo Follett was the proprietor and manager. This was actively continued until the buildings were destroyed by fire. Mr. B. H. Guild, also, and F. N. Sheldon & Co. subsequently, at different times engaged in the manufacture of straw goods at Sheldonville. After a long interval the business was again revived in the central village by Messrs. John C. and Lyman A. George, and afterwards was carried on for some years by William E. George, under whose energetic administration, supplemented by the increased use of machinery and other facilities, a much greater amount was done than ever before. Mr. George was succeeded by Messrs. Brown & Cowell, who began their work in the factory buildings which had been erected by Mr. George. They had hardly commenced when the buildings were destroyed by fire. Mr. Brown erected another building near the site of the former one a few years since, and by the introduction of the sewing-machine large quantities of goods are manufactured by this firm in the shop which, before its use in making this kind of goods, were made by people at their own firesides in this town and vicinity.

It should have been stated that the Messrs. Ide

¹The facts stated in this note are furnished by J. W. D. Hall, of Taunton, Mass. Amariah Hall was sixth in descent from George Hall, one of the first settlers in Taunton, Mass. He was born in Raynham, and after giving up business in Wrentham returned thither. He was exceedingly fond of music, and composed several of the old tunes which are remembered and sung to this day. This was seventy or eighty years ago. They are named as follows: "Morning Glory," "Summer," "Canaan," "Falmouth," "Massachusetts," Raynham, "Restoration," "All Saints, New," "Crucifixion," "Solitude," "Contemplation," "China," "Civil Amusement," "Harmony," "Devotion," "Hosanna," "Zion," and others. When he visited Raynham, during his residence at Wrentham, "the choir would get together and sing his tunes in honor of the composer, and old vocalists say that many of his old-fashioned tunes of real harmony were much appreciated."

Another composer and teacher also lived in Wrentham, Samuel Billings. He resided in the house formerly occupied by Deacon Elijah, and Deacon Smith Pond, in Pondville, where, as my informant, Mrs. J. M. Pond (widow of Deacon Smith), says "he wrote his beautiful music," he would compose a tune, perhaps an anthem, and perhaps finish it late at night and then awaken his wife, get her to dress at midnight and sing it over with him. He taught singing schools five evenings in a week for three months at a time. The late Gen. Preston Pond, a well-known teacher and singer, said he found no music so sweet as Billings'. His musical talents were highly appreciated, and for a long time he was a very popular teacher. Deacon Handel Pond, also a native of Wrentham, where he spent most of his years, was a noted teacher and composer.

succeeded Messrs. Mann, Swift & Co., continuing the business for a few years. A straw-manufactory was for a short time in operation in that part of Wrentham which is now Norfolk, under the management of Mr. Allen and afterwards of Mr. Perry.

The value of the goods denominated straw goods now made (1884) in this town is estimated at $250,000 for the year. From the census report of 1880 we learn that the number of establishments in the straw business in Massachusetts was 33, having a capital of $2,361,960. The average number of hands employed was, of males above sixteen years, 2531; of females above fifteen years, 5185; children and youth, 93. The total amount paid in wages in the year was $1,968,232; value of materials, $4,117,162; value of products, $6,898,628.

Jewelry.—Another industry having small beginnings in this town has grown to be the controlling business. This is the manufacture of those kinds of goods that come under the general name of jewelry. Beginning early in the century in the neighboring town of Attleborough, it was certainly to be expected that it would spread into adjoining territory. In that part of Wrentham now known as Plainville, but at the early date above mentioned called Slackville, in honor of people named Slack who lived there, an old stone mill is remembered which was sometimes called Slack's mill. It was a small mill, but to the passer on the highway it was a conspicuous object, because it was almost the only object, save here and there a dwelling-house, to be seen between the wharf, so called, in Wrentham and the old Hatch Tavern in Attleborough. This mill, it is said, had a checkered history, and its owners a fluctuating if not a money-making business. It seems that, whatever in its earlier days may have been the business to which it was devoted, it was used for a grain-mill by the Slacks prior to its being occupied by George W. Shepardson, who seems to have been the first to introduce the manufacture of jewelry into Wrentham. He was at work there prior to the year 1843. His line of goods was chiefly buttons for vests and pantaloons, although we have placed him for convenience in the list of jewelers. He is said to have employed some fifteen to twenty hands, making some eight or ten thousand dollars' worth of goods per annum. He was there about two years. He was succeeded by H. M. Richards, Esq., of Attleborough, in March, 1843, who engaged in the business of making fine gilt jewelry, amounting to about twenty thousand dollars per year, as nearly as can now be ascertained. He employed from twenty-five to thirty hands. Mr. Richards occupied the mill for about a year, when Mr. Shepard-son again resumed it. But he did not occupy it long, and eventually removed to Providence, R. I. It is not known that any other person engaged in the business at Plainville, either while Messrs. Shepardson and Richards were there, or subsequently, until Joseph T. Bacon, Esq., purchased the property and demolished the old mill and built the large shop now (with important additions) occupied by Lincoln, Bacon & Co. The firm of Bacon, Hodges & Mason followed next after Messrs. Shepardson and Richards, in 1844. They continued together in the business for three or four years, when Mason retired. Then Messrs. Bacon & Hodges were the partners until 1850. At that date Mr. Hodges left, and Josiah Draper and John Tift united with Joseph T. Bacon in the firm-name of Draper, Tift & Bacon, and conducted the business under this style until Mr. Tift died, in 1851, when another change took place, and Frank S. Draper, son of Josiah, and Frank L. Tift, son of John, and Joseph T. Bacon and James D. Lincoln formed a copartnership under the style of Draper, Tift & Co., which continued until July, 1860, when Frank S. Draper retired, and the firm took the name of Lincoln, Tift & Bacon. In 1863 or 1864 the manufacturing business at Plainville was carried on in the name of J. T. Bacon & Co., and the wholesale business in New York in the name of Lincoln, Tift & Co., the same gentlemen constituting both firms. In July, 1882, Messrs. Harland G. Bacon, son of the senior member, and Daniel O. Schofield, of New York City, became copartners, the style of the firm being Lincoln, Bacon & Co., both in New York and in Wrentham.

Another large factory building was erected some years since by Mr. J. T. Bacon and his partners, which is occupied by the Plainville Stock Company and by Messrs. Wade, Davis & Co., and others. A large number of hands are employed by the companies engaged in the manufacture of jewelry and goods in that line,—the ten or fifteen hands of Mr. Shepardson in 1843 having increased to hundreds, and in place of his eight or ten thousand dollars' worth of goods, the amount now manufactured in that village alone, by the opinion of a competent judge, cannot be less than five hundred thousand dollars' worth annually.

In 1880 the number of establishments in Massachusetts was one hundred and five; the amount of capital, $1,936,800; number of males employed above sixteen years, 2485; number of females above fifteen years, 743; children and youth, 37; total amount paid in wages during the year, $1,464,993; materials, $1,681,034; products, $4,265,525.

Instead of a few scattering buildings that might have been seen some years ago at Plainville, there are now at least two hundred, some ten having been erected in the last year (1883).

A fine, large school-house has recently been built and finished, so as to serve not only for the schools in that village, but with a hall convenient for public meetings and other purposes. The Grand Army of the Republic have also a commodious building for the purposes of their organization.

The spacious workshops can employ five hundred hands. The number actually employed varies as the business varies, "ranging probably from three hundred and seventy-five (375) in dull times to five hundred when business is good." Very marked progress has been made in this village in recent years, and the indications point to future prosperity.

It may be remarked here that before 1860 the manufacture of jewelry was commenced by Messrs. J. H. Sturdy & Co. at Sheldonville, and afterwards by the same firm at Wrentham village, where it was continued some few years, employing a large number of hands and doing a large business.

Quite recently the firm of Cowell & Hall have established the business again in this village.

About sixty years ago Col. Rhodes Sheldon came from Cumberland, R. I., to the westerly part of Wrentham and commenced the business of building boats and transporting them to Boston for sale. This business he carried on for many years, and was succeeded in it by his sons George and Orrin, the last named of whom still carries it on at the old place. In Col. Sheldon's time the usual amount done may have been about four thousand or five thousand dollars' worth per year. In the year 1845, or about that time, it went up to ten thousand dollars, and last year (1883) it was about seven thousand dollars. This industry has been steadily continued until the present time. Under the administration of the elder Sheldon quite an impulse was given to that part of the town, manifested in an increased number of dwellings, in the erection of one church edifice, and in various other ways. Other parties have at different times engaged to some extent in boat-building, but they have long since abandoned it.

The business of manufacturing boots was carried on here at various times, a considerable amount being done in that line, giving employment to a good number of men. The firms of Pond, Cook & Co. and Aldrich, Cook & Proctor were conspicuous in this line of business. It has now ceased altogether for some years, not being able to make headway against the sharp competition which other towns put forth.

While the jewelry business and the straw business are larger than all others here, yet we must not forget the manufacturers of fine wool shoddies, extracts, and yarns, and other manufacturers who are doing something each in his own line to employ himself and give employment to others. In the first-named business, it being estimated by one conversant with the subject that the amount of its annual products is about sixty thousand dollars, it would not be, perhaps, unsafe to say that the others make the amount up to one hundred thousand dollars.

The manufacture of cotton and woolen fabrics, of straw goods, of jewelry, and of other things by water-power or by steam-power began long after the occurrence of the facts narrated in the early portion of this history. The usual mechanical arts have, of course, been prosecuted always, and in former days a considerable amount of business was done in the line of carriage building.

In an old house not now inhabited, but yet standing near the station of the New York and New England Railroad Company at West Wrentham, known formerly as the Heaton place, Nathaniel Heaton many years ago set up a printing-press. Occasionally an old book has been seen purporting to have been printed there by him. His brother Benjamin, who graduated at Brown University in 1790, published a spelling-book and a preceptor which are supposed to have been printed by Nathaniel. Silas Metcalf, Esq., one of our oldest citizens, who has always lived in the westerly part of the town, well remembers the fact that printing was done in the Heaton house, and that he used to go there when a boy for books. Nathaniel removed (at what date is not now known) to Smithfield, R. I., and thus terminated the printing business in Wrentham.

Prior to 1815 all mail-matter for Wrentham Centre and also for Franklin was brought from the Druce tavern, so called, upon the turnpike,—Norfolk and Bristol. About that year a post-office was established in the village of Wrentham, and David Fisher, Esq., the landlord of the "Roebuck" tavern, was appointed postmaster.

It has not been ascertained that there was any mail-carrier employed by the government to supply Wrentham and Franklin from this solitary post-office on the turnpike. People went to that distant tavern for their mail-matter. Capt. Charles W. Farrington, now one of our oldest citizens, was often sent there when a boy for letters and newspapers, as he informed the writer. And he further says that the good people who came this way from the neighborhood of the office would bring along such letters and newspapers as belonged here, and on Sundays Maj.

Druce, the postmaster, would do likewise when he came over to attend meeting.

War of 1812.—The part which Wrentham took in the so-called French and Indian war has been related, and also more at length the patriotism the people displayed and the hardships they bore during the long conflict of the colonies with the mother-country. In the later war of 1812 we fail to find that many of the inhabitants engaged. It is known that some went to the forts in the harbor and to other places perhaps considered most exposed. These were probably drafted or ordered out for short terms of service. As all the muster-rolls of the officers and men who served in the second war with Great Britain are at Washington, it cannot be shown what service was performed unless with great labor and expense.

But one eminent man we know went from this town as a surgeon and served throughout the war as such,—Dr. James Mann.¹ He was born in Wrentham, and was the son of David Mann, who was a son of Pelatiah, who was a son of the Rev. Samuel Mann. He was born in 1758, graduated at Harvard University in 1776, and received the degree of M.D. at his Alma Mater, and also at Brown University and at Yale College. He was a practicing physician in his native town at the breaking out of the war. He enlisted as a surgeon in the army of the United States, and, it is understood, was on the Niagara frontier in 1814, and in the performance of his duty as a surgeon at the battles of Chippewa and Lundy's Lane, and continued in the service for many years after the end of the war. He died in 1832.

The Civil War.—In regard to this conflict we are not left so much in the dark. Evidence of its having existed and traces of its effects encounter us on every side. Moreover, no contest on this side of the Atlantic ever was honored with so many histories, or ever had such full and careful records. Indeed, it is a matter of some difficulty to know what to select out of the great mass for a history like this. It would be impossible for the writer to describe the spirit which was aroused by the first attack of the seceders upon a national fort. The story has often been told.

What was true of other towns in Massachusetts was undoubtedly true of Wrentham. It is not the place here to give a history of the several regiments and companies in which our townsmen served; that has been done elsewhere. But it falls within the plan of this sketch to relate the action of the town regarding the war of 1861. Sumter was fired upon on the 13th of April, 1861. Soon afterwards, viz., on May 6, 1861, a town-meeting was held at the old vestry of the centre meeting-house (so called), which was very fully attended. At this meeting, after warm and patriotic utterances, a preamble and resolutions were passed. The first resolution was as follows, viz.:

"Resolved, By the legal voters of the town of Wrentham, in town-meeting assembled, that the sum of ten thousand dollars be and the same hereby is granted for the support, encouragement, and relief of those of our fellow-townsmen who have gone and of those who may hereafter go into the service of the United States as soldiers, and of their families.

"Second. That the money thus appropriated be expended by the selectmen, to be assisted by a committee of three, if necessary, of whom the treasurer shall be one.

"Third. That each volunteer shall receive from the town while in active service an amount sufficient, with the government pay, to make his monthly pay twenty-five dollars; and the further sum of one dollar a week be paid to the wife and for each child under fifteen years of age, and one dollar a day for each day spent in drilling previous to being mustered into the United States service.

"Fourth. To provide suitable uniforms, and all necessary equipments and clothing not provided by the government, to each citizen of Wrentham who shall enlist in the military service.

"Fifth. That the treasurer be authorized to borrow on the credit of the town such sums of money as shall be ordered by the selectmen, not exceeding ten thousand dollars."

After this meeting the citizens held a number of impromptu meetings in different parts of the town, which were enlivened by music and patriotic songs, and by occasional speeches. Volunteers began to come forward, and soon a company was under drill upon the common. This company was joined with others, and organized as the Eighteenth Massachusetts Regiment of Volunteers, and soon were away in the vicinity of Washington. Some Wrentham men had previously enlisted in the three months' regiments. In March, 1862, the military committee made a report. And in July, 1862, the town voted that the selectmen be authorized to pay a bounty of one hundred dollars to each volunteer who should enlist for three years, and be credited to the quota of the town; also that the treasurer be authorized to borrow money to pay said bounties; and the clergymen, selectmen, and all good citizens are earnestly solicited to encourage and stimulate, by public meetings and otherwise, the prompt enlistment of the requisite number of volunteers from the town, that our fellow-citizens already in the service may be cheered and sustained by accession of numbers and strength, the Rebellion crushed, and peace and prosperity soon smile upon our common country. Aug. 28, 1862, the selectmen having paid the sum of one hundred dollars to each volunteer in addition to the bounty voted by the town in July, the town at this meeting ratified that proceeding, and voted to pay a bounty of two hundred dollars to each volunteer who shall enlist for nine months, and be credited to the quota of the town on or before the second day of September next. The treasurer was authorized to borrow money. On December 8th the vote restricting the time for enlistment was reconsidered, and the doings of the selectmen and treasurer were approved.

In 1863 there were no votes passed by the people in town-meeting in relation to the war.

At the March meeting in 1864 the town voted that payment of State aid should be continued. In April it was voted to raise by direct taxation eight thousand dollars for recruiting purposes, and to refund to citizens money which they had contributed for the encouragement of recruiting.

In August the bounty to each volunteer for three years' service who should thereafter enlist and be credited to the quota of the town was one hundred and twenty-five dollars. The treasurer was authorized to borrow money to pay the same.

In January, 1865, the same bounty was voted, and it was also voted to pay the recruiting officers of the town two dollars a day and ten cents a mile for travel while they have been, or shall be, engaged in procuring volunteers for the town.

August 14th the town voted to reimburse to the citizens "such sums as they have paid for the purpose of filling the quotas of the town during the past year."

Wrentham furnished three hundred and thirty-six¹ men for this war, which "was a surplus," as appears by a report of the adjutant-general, "of seventeen over and above all demands." Ten were commissioned officers. The whole amount of money, exclusive of State aid, expended by the town on account of the war was $31,531.23.

In 1870 Wrentham again lost a part of its territory and a large number of its inhabitants. A new town was incorporated by the name of Norfolk, taking from Wrentham seven thousand one hundred acres, eight hundred and fifty people, and one hundred and forty voters, and property valued at three hundred and fifty-seven thousand four hundred and seventy-five dollars. This was done with the assent of the old town.

By a colonial census made in 1776 the population of Wrentham was 2879. In 1790, after the setting off of Franklin and also of a part of the town of Foxborough, the population was 1767.

By the census of 1800 it was.....	2061

In 1790 the number of houses was two hundred and forty-three; the number of families was two hundred and seventy-eight; the number of free white males sixteen years of age and upwards was four hundred and seventy-one; the number of free white females, nine hundred and seven; number of free white males under sixteen years, three hundred and eighty-seven; the number of all other persons was two.

In 1800 Wrentham was the third town in the county in population, being exceeded by Roxbury and Dorchester only; and in 1810 and in 1820 it held the same relative rank.

In 1832 a bank was incorporated with a capital of one hundred thousand dollars, and in 1836 this was increased to one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. Philo Sanford, Robert Blake, John Tift, Calvin Fisher, Jr., Daniel A. Cook, and Otis Cary have been its presidents. Calvin Fisher, Jr., and Francis N. Plimpton have been its only cashiers.

The fourth meeting-house erected near the spot occupied by its predecessors was dedicated in September, 1834. The old church building at West Wrentham gave way some time afterwards to a convenient house for religious purposes erected by the Baptist denomination at Sheldonville. A house for religious services was built by the Universalist society upon the site of the old Baptist meeting-house at West Wrentham. There is a chapel for the use of the Congregational society connected with the main building. This commodious and useful building was the gift of Braman Hawes, Esq., a native of Wrentham, and is denominated "The Hawes Chapel." The Roman Catholics have also a chapel for their religious uses, and there is also a chapel at Plainville under the charge, it is understood, of Independents. The Episcopalians a few years since established a church and erected a fine church building here.

Some years since the town erected a large and convenient building in Wrentham Village, for the accommodation of the high school and a grammar and a primary school. It was also provided with a spacious and convenient hall for the transaction of its public business; and the town bade adieu to the vestry of the meeting-house in which, and in its predecessors, it had held its town-meetings for more than one hundred and fifty years. School-houses have also been built at Sheldonville, Plainville, and at West Wrentham within recent periods, and the accommodations are ample throughout the town for the children and youth who go to them for instruction. The first school-house of the fathers, which was to be "sixteen foot," with allowance for a chimney, and was also to be for a "watch house," would be regarded as a myth did not the sober record fully attest it.

Twice since the incorporation of the town the events above related have been commemorated,—once in 1773 by the century sermon, so called, of the Rev. Mr. Bean, and again in 1873 by the historical address of the late Judge Wilkinson. The sermon was delivered Oct. 26, 1773, and "printed at the earnest request of the hearers for the preservation of ancient things to future posterity."

This was not on the Sabbath day, and, it may be presumed, was honored by a large attendance.

In the second case, notwithstanding the day was very stormy, a large audience gathered in the meeting-house which succeeded that one in which Mr. Bean preached his commemorative discourse one hundred years before. The interesting event had induced a good number of people from other towns and places to brave the violence of the storm. One of these, Professor George P. Fisher, of Yale College, a native of Wrentham, participated in the exercises. The address was delivered from short notes and was not published.

The fiftieth anniversary of the ordination of the Rev. Elisha Fisk was celebrated on the 12th day of June, 1849. In the sermon preached by Mr. Fisk on that occasion he reviewed the events of his ministry of fifty years, incidentally speaking of events in the history of the town. The sermon was published, together with an appendix prepared by Mr. Fisk's colleague, the Rev. Horace James, giving an account of the celebration. One passage is quoted: "The day of jubilee arrived. The weather was delightful. The church was filled to its utmost capacity. A multitude of the sons of Wrentham, and many connected with them by marriage or other agreeable associations, were gathered in their childhood's home to do honor to him who from their earliest recollection had ministered at the altar of God."

Conclusion.—In concluding the "Annals of Wrentham," the writer would say he has followed the course adopted by him in the preparation of some historical sketches, published in a newspaper in 1873, namely, he has let the records, from which the early history is mainly derived, tell their own story, with only such change of form as to make them narrative, and such comments as seemed needed for explanation. Judge Wilkinson, in his address, pursued a similar course, taking his facts chiefly from the same sources, so far as he proceeded, but covering much less ground than the present narrative embraces. His manuscript (which I have kindly been permitted to inspect) is unfinished, consisting of notes and memoranda which he probably intended at some time to put into form. The Rev. Dr. Blake, in his historical address at Franklin, June 12, 1878, also has given from the same sources so much of the ancient history of Wrentham as was needed to introduce the history of Franklin, whose centennial was celebrated on that day.

Let it be hoped that this attempt "to preserve (in the language of Mr. Bean) these ancient things" may not be altogether unsuccessful.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

HON. JOSIAH JONES FISKE.

Josiah J. Fiske was born in Sturbridge, Mass., Nov. 28, 1785. His ancestors were among the earliest settlers of Watertown, and came from Weybread, County of Suffolk, England, in 1642. As early as the eighth year of the reign of King John (A.D. 1208) we find the name of Daniel Fise, of Laxfield, appended to a royal grant which confirmed a deed of land in Digniveton Park, made to the men of Laxfield by the Duke of Lorraine. This grant is in the public record office in London. Simon Fiske held land in Laxfield early in the fifteenth century, and was lord of the manor of Stodhaugh. There are in several churches monumental tablets and brasses bearing the arms of the family, which seems to have been prominent in the counties of Suffolk and Norfolk. Col. F. S. Fiske, of Boston, has in his possession an interesting copy of the "Confirmation of Arms and Grant of Crest from College of Arms, London," issued to the Fiske family in 1635. Nathan Fiske was the first American ancestor, and from him the line of descent to the subject of our sketch is as follows: Nathan² (born Jan. 23, 1671), Henry³ (born Jan. 24, 1707), David⁴ (born Dec. 17, 1759), Josiah J.,⁵ the son of David and Eleanor (Jones) Fiske.

W. T. H.

Hon. Josiah J. Fiske was graduated at Brown University, where he was a classmate and friend of William L. Marey, sometime Governor of New York. After leaving college, in 1808, he was for a short time preceptor of an academy in Maine; but he soon determined upon the law as a profession, and studied first in the office of the late Nathaniel Searle, LL.D., of Providence, and afterwards with Timothy Bigelow, Esq., of Boston.

Mr. Fiske developed marked ability as a lawyer, and soon found himself in the enjoyment of an extensive practice. His office at Wrentham became a favorite resort for students; perhaps few lawyers, unconnected with the law schools, have superintended the legal instruction of a greater number of young men. To strong powers of logic and analysis, Mr. Fiske added both quickness of perception and readiness in expression; he had an energy of character, a perseverance in carrying out his plans, which no obstacles could discourage; and if he had continued to devote himself exclusively to the law, there can be little doubt that he would have ranked among the most eminent in that profession. But he lived in the time when the great manufacturing interests of New England were just being founded. Early foreseeing their importance, he was tempted to devote to them much of his own energy, and during the latter years of his life his attention was given to manufactures almost exclusively. His own enterprises were located in his native town, Sturbridge, and the now flourishing village of Fiskdale commemorates his name. He laid the foundation of the Sturbridge cotton manufactures; his first mill was built in that town as early as 1827, and in 1834 he built another larger mill, containing ten thousand spindles and two hundred looms.

Mr. Fiske was of the stamp of man that leaves its impress on the day and generation. He was active, intelligent, strong; strong in character and influence, strong in mind and judgment, with that enterprise and public spirit which seeks not selfish ends alone, but labors for the good of all. He found his work to do in the world, and, doing it well, found also work for others. In public affairs he was prominent; possessing the well-won confidence of his fellow-townsmen, he was often chosen to positions of honor and trust. State senator from 1823 to 1826, inclusive, he was in 1831 a member of the Governor's Council. He was appointed upon the first Board of Railroad Commissioners created by the State, and, of many minor positions, was aide-de-camp to Maj.-Gen. Crane from 1823 to 1827, a member of the Grand Lodge

F. A. M., of Massachusetts, and for several years District Deputy Grand Master.

Like most active men, Mr. Fiske was in advance of the general thought and sentiment of his time. Subsequent developments have proved the wisdom of many of his views for the improvement of the towns of Wrentham and Sturbridge which may then have been deemed unwise or impracticable. In his manners he was always kindly and genial, and this virtue was above all conspicuous in his home life. His wife, Jerusha, was the daughter of Dr. Jenckes Norton, of Wrentham, and Jerusha Ware. He died Aug. 15, 1838, at Sturbridge, the place of his birth.

Two of Mr. Fiske's brothers were also graduates of Brown: David Woodward, who practiced law in Wrentham several years, but finally settled in Detroit, where he died in 1871, and Calvin Park, a physician, who spent nearly all his life in Sturbridge, and died in Chicago in 1874. Of the ten children of Mr. Fiske, Josiah J. and George Jenckes were well known as members of the Boston firm of James M. Beebe & Co., contributing largely, by their skill and energy in the management of the business, to the great success of that firm. Josiah died unmarried in 1850. George died at Nice, in France, in 1868, leaving a widow, Frances Lathrop, the daughter of James M. Beebe, a son, George Stanley, born in Paris in 1867, and a daughter, Esther Lathrop, born at Nice in 1868.

JOSEPH NORTON, the eldest son, and Elizabeth Stanley are the only surviving children of Josiah J. Fiske. Joseph Norton Fiske was born in Wrentham, March 4, 1814, and received his early education at Day's Academy. He had at first intended to take a collegiate course, but developed a strong inclination for mercantile pursuits, and in 1833 entered the counting-room of Shaw, Patterson & Co. as clerk, where he remained five years, and then became the confidential clerk of George B. Blake & Co. In 1841 he engaged in business for himself, but from 1844 to 1846 was obliged by ill health to remain inactive.

Mr. Fiske then became a member of the Boston Brokers' Board, and opened a banking-house on State Street. Though he began with a small capital, his business rapidly increased and became very lucrative. Continuing in it for twenty-four years without intermission, Mr. Fiske retired in 1870, and passed three years traveling in Europe with his wife. Since then his time has been occupied in the care of his own estate and various trusts. He married, in 1849, Charlotte Matilda Morse, daughter of Dr. Elijah Morse, of Mount Vernon, Me., and grand-daughter of Dr. Jacob Corey, of Sturbridge.

J. T. BACON.

Joseph T. Bacon was born May 21, 1818. He is the son of George and Avis B. (Fales) Bacon, and grandson of Ebenezer Bacon, one of the prominent men of his day in the town of Attleborough. He served as senator from his district, and being public-spirited and possessed of sterling qualities, was looked upon as a leader in opinion and enterprise by his fellow-townsmen. Edward Bacon, the father of Ebenezer, was one of the early settlers of Attleborough.

Joseph T. Bacon, being the son of a farmer in moderate circumstances, had no special advantages afforded him for obtaining an education further than the public schools of his town offered.

At thirteen years of age he was placed to learn a trade with Robinson & Co., button manufacturers, and remained with this firm until he was eighteen, when, in copartnership with his brother Ebenezer, he engaged in the manufacture of jewelry at Robinsonville, making a specialty of rings. Some two or three years later Edward Richards was associated with the firm. In 1838 or 1839, Mr. J. T. Bacon withdrew from the firm of Richards & Bacon, and moved to West Attleborough, where he formed a copartnership with Lewis Holmes for the manufacture of jewelry, and the firm continued, under the firm-name of Bacon & Holmes, until about 1841, when Mr. Holmes withdrew, and Messrs. Hodges and Mason associated themselves with Mr. Bacon, and continued to do business at West Attleborough until 1844, when the firm moved to Plainville. Their first factory at Plainville was a small affair, truly, compared with their present large establishment, but they were successful, and gradually, but surely, built up a trade and retained it. About 1847, Mr. Mason withdrew, and later on Mr. Hodges also. In 1850, Mr. Bacon met with serious loss by fire; his factory was burned, and he had no insurance. About 1850, Mr. Bacon formed a copartnership with Messrs. Draper and Tift. The factory was rebuilt and the business resumed under the firm-name of Draper, Tift & Bacon. John Tift died in 1851, and Francis L. Tift, his son, took his place as soon as he became of age. Josiah Draper retired, and his interest was continued by his son, Frank S. Draper. Mr. J. D. Lincoln was also admitted as a partner, and business was conducted under the firm-name of Draper, Tift & Co. Later on Mr. Draper retired, and the firm became Lincoln, Tift & Bacon. The business is conducted under the firm-name of Lincoln, Bacon & Co. Messrs. Bacon and Lincoln have in a measure withdrawn from the active superintendence of the business, leaving the prosecution of the business chiefly in the hands of the younger partners. They now do a business of about two hundred thousand dollars per annum, employing about one hundred and twenty-five hands. They make stock plate goods, chiefly ladies' ware.

Mr. Bacon is a liberal Republican in politics, but will not accept office of any kind. He shrinks instinctively from everything savoring of notoriety. He married Emeline M., daughter of Harland Hodges, of Maine. To them were born three children,—Harland G. (who is in business with his father), Charles B. (who was a brilliant, promising young man, but died in his seventeenth year), and a daughter, Maria (who died at the age of five years).

JAMES DANIELSON LINCOLN.

James Danielson Lincoln was born in Brimfield, Hamden Co., Mass., March 30, 1823. His father, Dr. Asa Lincoln, was a native of Taunton, and his mother, Sarah (Danielson) Lincoln, was a native of Brimfield. When James D. was seven years of age his mother died, leaving a family of ten children. After her death he went to live with Fisher Thayer, an uncle by marriage, residing at what was then called "River End," in the eastern part of Franklin. Here his boyhood was spent, doing chores about the house and attending school from twelve to fourteen weeks each year. When he was seventeen years of age the family removed to Wrentham. His uncle was a manufacturer of thread, and young Lincoln had charge of preparing it for market. He attended Day's Academy two terms, not neglecting, however, his duties in the shop. In 1850 he left Wrentham and obtained a position in New York, in the boot- and shoe-store of Howard Mann, where he remained about a year. Upon leaving Mr. Mann he was urged by Mr. John Tift, of Draper, Tift & Bacon, to connect himself with that firm as salesman, offering him either a small salary or one-quarter interest in the business.

Not wishing to connect himself with the proprietorship of a business of which he knew nothing, he chose the salary, with the stipulation that he should have an interest in the business at any time he might desire. He went with this firm in March, 1851, and the following June Mr. Tift, who had charge of the business in New York, died, leaving the entire business of selling the goods to Lincoln. When Francis L., son of John Tift, became of age, a change took place in the firm. He and Frank S. Draper, son of Josiah Draper, took their fathers' interest in the business, Mr. Lincoln was admitted as a partner, and the firm took its old name of Draper, Tift & Co., Mr. J. T. Bacon and Mr. J. D. Lincoln being the "Co." From that time to the present, through the various changes of the firm,—Lincoln, Tift & Bacon, Lincoln, Tift & Co., and now as Lincoln, Bacon & Co.,—he has continued to be a partner.

Messrs. Lincoln and Bacon now leave most of the active business to the younger members of the firm.

In 1880 he married Eliza Taylor Melcher, of Laconia, N. H. He has a pleasant home in Plainville, where they now reside. Mr. Lincoln, as a business man, has been successful and honorable, and in his intercourse is affable, courteous, and gentlemanly, impressing all with whom he comes in contact with the kindness of his nature and the honesty of his motives.

WILLIAM SHERBURNE.

William Sherburne was born March 30, 1802, in Cumberland, R. I. He is the son of William and Sarah (Lovett) Sherburne, and grandson of Benjamin Sherburne. This Benjamin had a large family of children. William, his son, was born Dec. 25, 1760, and died Sept. 15, 1846, in his eighty-sixth year. His wife (Sarah Lovett) lived to be aged ninety-one years. Their children were Lucy, deceased (Mrs. Darius Cook); Amey, deceased (died unmarried); Henry, deceased; Nancy, deceased (Mrs. Silas Metcalf); Sally, deceased (Mrs. George Gilmon); Eleanor, deceased; William; George, deceased; Eliza, deceased (Mrs. Bradbury C. Hill); Cornelia, deceased (Mrs. L. Tourtellott); and James.

William Sherburne had but limited advantages in his youth. His father was a blacksmith, and young Sherburne had to work in shop and on farm at the age when he should have been at school. He, however, laid the foundation for a strong and healthy physique. At twenty-two years of age he hired out at two shillings per day to work on the farm which he now owns, and where was born the woman who afterwards became his wife. This was Lydia Jenks, daughter of Luke and Roby (Arnold) Jenks. They were married April 16, 1828. Their children were Roby M., Eliza E., Alice J. (deceased), William J. (deceased), Alice A. (deceased), Marion L. Immediately upon his marriage Mr. Sherburne hired a farm and began farming for himself. Through persevering industry and prudent management he prospered, and about 1860 he purchased the farm on which he now resides. He has been a resident of Wrentham nearly eighty years, his father having removed here when William was a mere lad. In his younger days he did military duty nine years as a member of the Franklin Artillery Company. Mrs. Sherburne died July 16, 1876. Mr. Sherburne is a Republican in politics, and a highly esteemed citizen.

RHODES SHELDON.

Rhodes Sheldon, the son of Roger and Huldah (Streeter) Sheldon, was born in Cumberland, R. I., July 21, 1786.

His ancestors came originally from England, where the family is an ancient and honorable one, and were among the early settlers of Rhode Island. Roger was by occupation a farmer and shoemaker; during the war of the Revolution he made shoes for the colonial soldiers. He was a strong advocate of liberty, and from the signing of the Declaration of Independence to the day of his death he advocated the abolition of slavery.

He had quite a large family of children, and of course could give them only the ordinary common school advantages. Rhodes was brought up on the farm, but upon arriving at manhood he began boat-building,—small craft, such as ships, boats, etc. About 1823 he moved to West Wrentham, and established himself in this business, which he continued to the time of his death. He was very successful, and became quite a large land-owner. He was the leading spirit of his section, was public-spirited and benevolent, and it was almost entirely through his aid and instrumentality that the beautiful and thriving little village which now bears his name was built up. He always took great pleasure in assisting any worthy and industrious man in getting a home of his own, and he would build and furnish houses for his workmen and give them time to pay for the same by their labor.

Mr. Sheldon was a man of robust and vigorous physique, peaceable and kindly disposed, and by his benevolence and friendly spirit endeared himself to all who knew him. He was not only a successful man, but an eminently useful man to the community in which he lived. In politics he was a Whig and Republican, and a Baptist in religious belief. He was twice married. His first wife was Prusha, daughter of Stephen and Huldah Inman, of Cumberland, R. I. Their children were Stephen, deceased; Huldah, deceased; Mariette; Nathaniel; George; Orin; William, deceased; and Willard, deceased; the two latter twins. All of whom were born in Cumberland, R. I. Mrs. Sheldon died Jan. 3, 1850. Mr. Sheldon married, as his second wife, Mrs. Catharine Tilton; by this latter marriage there was no issue. He died Dec. 15, 1866.

Of the children, Stephen died in his nineteenth year. Huldah married Milton Grant and died, leaving two children. Mariette married George Wellman, of Sheldonville, and is still living.

George, who pays this tribute to his father's memory, married Amy A. Aldrich, by whom he had one child, which died in infancy. Upon the decease of his first wife he married Mrs. Mary J. Thayer; they have four children.

All of the sons of Rhodes Sheldon have been engaged more or less in boat-building. Nathaniel gave it up and is now engaged in butchering. George retired some years ago from active business. Orin still continues the business in connection with William Sheldon, George's son. They have the original shop in Wrentham where Rhodes Sheldon successfully prosecuted the business for so many years, and also a boat store in Boston for the disposal of their goods.

HORACE L. COOK.

The first of this branch of the Cook family of whom we have authentic record was Elder Josiah Cook, who preached in Cumberland, R. I., in the days of its early settlement. He was a man of stern morality and rigid uprightness of character. His wife was Mary Staples. Their son, Abner Cook, was a farmer, and married Rhoda Thompson, by whom he had children, one of whom was named Horace, who was also a farmer, and married Lucretia Bates, by whom he had Amory B., Delilah O., Ely E. (deceased), Senah A. (deceased), Lucretia (deceased), Senah A. (2d, deceased), Martha A., Horace L., Rhoda T. (deceased), Mortimer C., Massena A., Warren F., and Alonzo. Horace L. was born Aug. 26, 1816, was brought up a farmer's son, and had the advantages only of the common schools of his town. He married, Jan. 23, 1845, Lucy A. E. Hawkins, daughter of Rufus and Anna (Ballou) Hawkins. She was born in Cumberland, R. I., Sept. 8, 1826. Their children are Eldora L., born Dec. 7, 1845; died Aug. 1, 1847. Frederick H., born Dec. 15, 1848; died Jan. 23, 1869. Everard R., born March 6, 1854, and now resides with his parents. Mrs. Cook is descended from Andrew and Rebecca (Robinson) Hawkins, of Smithfield, R. I. Their son, Darius, was born in that town, and was a farmer by occupation. He married Esther Haskall, and had four children,—Rufus, Sally, Amos, and Polly. Rufus was a carpenter by trade, married Anna Ballou, and had children,—Charles (deceased), Martin (now residing in Madison County, Ohio), and Lucy A. E. (now Mrs. Cook). Horace L. Cook is a Republican in politics, is a prosperous farmer, resides on the old homestead in West Wrentham first settled by his grandfather, and has a beautiful home, the result of his industry and prudent economy.

JABEZ FISHER.

Hon. Jabez Fisher was born in Wrentham, Nov. 19, 1717. He received only a common-school education, but was distinguished for ready and strong common sense, and for intuitive perceptions of the proper adaptation of means to the ends proposed. He was sound and practical, at the same time able to detect sophistry and baffle cunning. He was remarkable for an inflexible adherence to principle. He was courteous in manners and strongly desirous of being useful. He represented the town of Wrentham for a number of sessions in the Provincial Assembly. In 1774, in October, he was a member of the House of Delegates, which met at Salem and formed themselves into a Provincial Congress, also of the Second Congress, which met at Cambridge, and also of the Third, of which Dr. Warren was president. This last Congress remained in session until July 19, 1775, when the representatives who had been elected under the provisions of the province charter assembled. Mr. Fisher was also a member of this body, and was one of the renowned twenty-eight who were then elected councilors, to act as a distinct branch of the Legislature and to exercise the executive powers of the government. John Adams, Samuel Adams, Thomas Cushing, Robert Treat Paine, and John Hancock were among those elected. Mr. Hildreth, from whose biographical sketch of Mr. Fisher the foregoing is condensed, continues, "No member of that honorable board was in labors more abundant than he. No one's judgment was more highly estimated. No one's firmness less distrusted." He was regarded as the special watchman of the country part of Suffolk (then including Norfolk), and relied upon to bring into action all the force, moral and physical, of that section. He never disappointed expectation nor failed in any purpose which he deliberately formed. No man knew better what was practicable, and no man deliberated more thoroughly. He was a delegate to the Convention of Massachusetts for the adoption of the Constitution of the United States in 1788, for which he labored and voted. He died in 1806, aged eighty-nine years.

CHAPTER LVI.¹

FOXBOROUGH.

Incorporation of Town—Early History—The First Settler—Jacob Shepard—List of Early Settlers—Early Votes—The Pioneer Schools—The First Town Clerk—Church History—Early Votes—Manufactures, etc.

FOXBOROUGH was incorporated June 10, 1778. The title reads, "In the year of our Lord 1778. An Act for incorporating certain lands in the County of Suffolk, formerly belonging to the town of Dorchester, but now to the towns of Wrentham, Walpole, Stoughton, and Stoughtonham, with the inhabitants living thereon, into a town by the name of Foxborough."

The act recites that the lands formerly belonged to Dorchester, but such portion as was previously included within the limits of Walpole had never been a part of Dorchester.

Walpole, incorporated Dec. 10, 1724, had before been a part of Dedham, incorporated 1636, which had heretofore been called "Contentment." But by far the largest part of this territory was once Dorchester.

The original Dorchester, incorporated 1630,— "Mattapan,"—comprised only the little region between the Neponset River, the town of Boston, and the bay; but in 1636 the General Court granted to the Dorchester Plantation the "Unquety Grant," containing some six thousand acres, from the south bank of the Neponset to the top of the Blue Hills, from which was carved Milton, incorporated in 1662; and in the following year the court annexed to Dorchester the "New Grant," so called, being all the territory, not before granted, between Dedham and the line of the Plymouth Colony, about which line there was a dispute long unsettled.

The southern boundary line of Dorchester was first marked in 1664. It was run again by the agents of Dorchester from "Angle Tree," upon the line of Attleborough, to "Accord Pond," on the borders of Hingham, Abington, and Scituate, "twenty-five and a half miles and twenty rods." This old boundary line was confirmed to Dorchester by the General Court in 1720. Dorchester then extended from Dorchester Point (now South Boston) to within one hundred and sixty rods of the line of Rhode Island; about thirty-five miles as "y^e road goeth."

The dismemberment began in 1724, when the southwest portion of the South Precinct was set off to Wrentham, formerly a part of Dedham, incorporated in 1673. The petitioners gave for cause, "that they lye thirty miles from the old meeting house, and fifteen from the southern meeting house of Puncapaug, so that they are under great disadvantages for attending the public worship there." The part thus set off to Wrentham was larger than one-half of the present town of Canton. Two years later the remainder of the "New Grant" was set off, and incorporated as Stoughton, so called for Governor William Stoughton, of Dorchester. When the question was before the town of Dorchester, thirty-four voted in favor of the partition, twenty-nine against it.

The first precinct or parish of Stoughton, being the northerly portion, was, in 1797, incorporated as Canton. Previously, however, i.e., in 1765, the northerly portion of the west part of Stoughton, or Massapoag, had been incorporated as a district by the name of Stoughtonham; and by the provisions of the general act of 1775 that district became a town to all intents and purposes.

In 1783 it became Sharon, Stoughton remaining a town by itself. Thus, from Dorchester came Canton, Stoughton, and Sharon entire, Foxborough substantially, and a large portion of Wrentham.

When Foxborough, as such, was created, all this territory belonged to the county of Suffolk; but it was all set off to the present county of Norfolk when incorporated, March 26, 1793. John Shepard was born Feb. 25, 1705, and died April 3, 1809, aged one hundred and four years, one month, and six days. He was born in what was then Dorchester, now Foxborough; and a most respectable antiquarian has recently once more given currency to the story that he had been (through legislative changes) a resident of three different counties and five different towns, and yet lived in the same house all the time.

As we have seen, Foxborough was carved in 1778 from Wrentham, Walpole, Stoughtonham, and Stoughton; principally from the two latter towns. It is natural, therefore, to inquire what the conduct of these two towns had been during the Revolutionary struggle.

Stoughton had been a little backward in support of the Boston Committee of Correspondence in 1773 and the early part of 1774, but the County Congress was held at Doty's Tavern in Stoughton, now Canton, Aug. 16, 1774, and Joseph Warren was present, and there was no hesitation afterwards. The town was represented at the famous County Convention at the house of Daniel Vose, in Milton, Sept. 9, 1774, when Warren said, "On the fortitude, on the wisdom, and on the exertions of this important day is suspended the fate of this new world and of unborn millions." Then the "Suffolk Resolves" were unanimously adopted.

On the 19th of April, upon the "Lexington Alarm," nine companies, or four hundred and seventy men, marched from Stoughton and Stoughtonham. Among these it is easy to distinguish the Foxborough names.

July 10, 1775, Stoughton and Stoughtonham assembled together, and elected Thomas Crane as their representative to the General Court, to be holden at Watertown, July 19, 1775.

Our act of incorporation establishes the territory we have been discriminating, "with the inhabitants living thereon," "into a town by the name of Foxborough." It is said to be the only town of that designation in the world, so that there can be no mistake as to our identity. Whence the name? The name itself proves the inhabitants loyal to liberty.

Charles James Fox, born 1749, son of Lord Holland, in Parliament before he was twenty years of age, was already an eminent man when, in 1774, he opposed the Boston Port Bill and defended the conduct of the colonies. He said, in 1775, of Lord North, the prime minister of George III., "The King of Prussia, nay, even Alexander the Great, never gained more in one campaign than Lord North has lost. He has lost a whole continent." One of Fox's biographers says, "During the whole American war, Mr. Fox successively protested against every measure of hostility directed against the colonies." Of him the Foxborough soldiers, who marched in quickstep at the "Lexington Alarm," and to Bunker Hill and Dorchester Heights, had heard, and, whatever the faults of that famous British statesman, no friend of American independence need blush to bear his name.

May 22, 1776, the town of Stoughton passed this resolve: "That if the honorable Continental Congress should, for the safety of this colony, declare us independent of the Kingdom of Great Britain, we, the inhabitants, will solemnly engage, with our lives and fortunes, to support them in the measure."¹

It may not be out of place, however, to add here the tradition that Seth Boyden (then eighteen years of age), Ebenezer Forest, Samuel Forest, and Oliver Pettee (father of Martin Pettee), of Foxborough, were, in the last year of the Revolutionary war, taken by a British fleet while cruising on an American privateer, and were thrown into the prison-ship at New York, whence they were released at the close of the war. Of Abijah Pratt, who was afterwards a lieutenant in his company, his descendants relate that, enlisting as an undersized lad of sixteen, he stood on tiptoe behind the other recruits in an agony lest he should fail to pass the military inspection.

But who were the inhabitants incorporated? How many were there of them? Whence did they come, and how long had they been here? These questions are not easily answered, because the town records contain no list. A distinguished antiquarian has furnished a list of those males of sixteen years and upwards, supposed to have resided on the Foxborough territory Jan. 1, 1777, collated by him from an original schedule, prepared at that time by Mr. Hill, one of the selectmen of Stoughtonham. It is suggested that there may not have been so many residents, but it is thought useful to preserve the list, in all one hundred and six in number:

"January 17, 1777.² Nehemiah Carpenter, 3; Jacob Cook, 1; Josiah Robbins, 1; Jacob Lenard, 1; Joseph Wood, 1; John Comey, 4; John Sumner, 3; Job Willis, 2; Zebulon Dean, 1; Widow Elizabeth Payn, 4; William Payson, y^e first, 2; Spencer Hodges, 1; Thomas Richardson, 2; John Richardson, 1; Daniel Robeson, 1; Seth Robeson, 1; Joseph Payn, 1; William Payn, 2d, 5; Jacob Payn, 1; John Payn, 1; Lem. Payn, 1; Eleazer Belcher, 1; Josiah Blanchard, 1; David White, 1; Samuel Balcom, 1; Joseph Tifney, 1; David Forrest, 1; William Clark, 1; Elijah Mors, 1; Joseph Rhodes, 3; Nathaniel Clark, 2; Maj. Samuel Billings, 4; Josiah Farrington, 1; Ebenezer Billings, 3; Levi Morse, 1; Ebenezer Hill, 3; Elijah Billings, 2; David Wood, 3; Tim Clap, 1; Ezekiel Pierce, 1; Jethro Wood, 1; Capt. Nat. Morse, 2; John Smith, 1; Lem. Lyon, 2; Lieut. Ezra Morse, 2; William Billings, 1; William ———, 3; Zuriah Atherton, 1; William Clapp, 1; William Comey, 2; Capt. Israil Smith, 1; Beriah Billings, 1; Jeremiah Rhodes, 1; Jonathan Billings, 2d, 1; Jonathan Billings, 3; John Basset, 1; William Wright, 1; Samuel Bradshaw, 2; David Wilkeson, 1; Thomas Pogge, 1; Joseph Rhodes, 1; Stephen Cobb, 3; Ephraim Shepard, 1; Nathan Clark, 2; total, 106."

Many of the residents upon the present territory of Foxborough, previous to 1778, are known, and their places of residence can be identified.

In 1713 the proprietors of the outlying lands in Dorchester were incorporated into a distinct body from the town, and were henceforth called "The Proprietors of the Undivided Lands." This body held its meetings until after 1770, and from it the title to much of the lands in Foxborough was derived.

² The figures after each name indicate the number in family.

Previous to either of these dates, however, i.e., about 1669 and 1670, there was laid out to William Hudson two tracts of land adjoining each other, containing five hundred acres, annexed from Dorchester to Wrentham in 1824, but now in Foxborough, and known as "Shepard's Farm." William Hudson conveyed the tract to "Thomas Platts, of Boston, butcher," Oct. 21, 1676, in consideration of two hundred and seventy-five pounds, "the same situate, lying, and being in the wilderness, between Dedham and Seaconet, commonly called or known by the name of 'Wading River Farm.'" Under the will of Thomas Platts, probated Aug. 8, 1692, the farm passed to his son, Thomas Platts, of Boston, victualer, who, by deed dated July 11, 1704, conveyed it to "Jacob Shepard, late of Mystic (now Medford), but now of Wading River, planter." Thus Jacob Shepard¹ was certainly here in the wilderness in 1704, and, so far as any known record, must have been the first settler of Foxborough. If he had half the trouble in discovering his place of settlement that I have had in establishing the fact that he was the pioneer settler, he must have been endowed with a large share of perseverance and patience.

In 1718 his widow administered upon his estate, inventoried at £1339 19s. 6d., and in 1727 partition of the lands was made between the widow, Mercy, John, Thomas, Joseph, and Benjamin. His son John is the patriarch John before spoken of as born here in 1705, and possibly, nay, probably, was the first white-born child of Foxborough. The cellar is still to be seen over which that house stood.

Afterwards, Timothy Morse, of Walpole, bought of Edward and Samuel Capen three hundred acres of land, late in Dorchester, but then in Stoughton,—the southeasterly end of the forty-seventh lot in the twenty-fifth division. This must have been subsequent to 1726. Timothy sold to his son Timothy in 1749, who became a settler. A portion of this land is now owned by Jarius Morse. The name of Timothy Morse, Jr., appears in the tax-list of 1742; that of Eleazer Robbins, from Walpole, appears in the same list. Robbins owned about one thousand acres of what is now called East Foxborough. He had three daughters. One of them married one Dr. Winslow, from Freetown; another married Abijah Pratt, of Foxborough (to whom we have alluded); and the third married Kingsbury, the great-grandfather of our present worthy citizen, Joseph A. Kingsbury. Robbins' house stood nearly opposite the present Kingsbury homestead. Of Dr. Shadrach Winslow, one of our former worthy townsmen, now nearly eighty-six years of age, writes, "He was a man of marked mind, and was probably the most scientific individual who ever resided in the town of Foxborough. After graduating at Yale College, and receiving the best medical education the country could afford, about 1778 he embarked as surgeon on board a privateer, made several trips successfully, but was at length taken prisoner and carried to England and confined in Dartmoor prison for several months, where, by exposure, he sustained injuries which greatly impaired his health, and from which he never recovered. His profound knowledge of his profession led him to despise quackery in all its forms, and to which he never descended. He became a citizen of Foxborough about the year 1784. Notwithstanding his talents and high attainments he declined all participation in governmental affairs, not accepting even a town office. He loved retirement. Books were his companions and friends. He was social and courteous to all his friends. He was a gentleman in the full sense of the word."

The Morses and Boydens came from Medfield; the Capens, from Dorchester, now Stoughton; the Belchers, from Stoughtonham, now Sharon; the Everetts, from Dedham; the Carpenters, from Rehoboth.

Seth Boyden's name appears in the tax-list of 1742. He was the ancestor of all the Foxborough Boydens. The record shows that he bought a tract of some two hundred and forty acres (now what-is known as the Amos and Seth Boyden estate) about 1738. Ebenezer Warren, the brother of Gen. Joseph Warren, removed here about 1779 from Roxbury, where he was born in 1749. A son of Gen. Warren, visiting his uncle, died, and was buried in the old burying-ground; but his remains were removed, some years since, in a most uncereemonious, not to say uncivilized, manner, in a raisin-box for a casket. Ebenezer Warren was a stanch patriot and true man, and always a leading citizen, but of obstinate and unyielding temper. He was its delegate to the State Convention which adopted the Federal Constitution, the magistrate of the infant town, and was for many years a judge of the County Courts. The Clarks,

Was this William Shepard the father of the Jacob Shepard, and grandfather of the John Shepard, named on pages 54 and 55 of the "Centennial Record"? And isn't it probable that William settled here on his return from Providence way?

Everetts, Bakers, Carpenters, Pratts, Pettees, and Belchers settled here after 1750.

In 1776 the annual town-meeting of Stoughtonham was held March 11th. Of those then elected to the town offices the following became two years after citizens of Foxborough, viz.: Ebenezer Hill, Selectman; Nathaniel Clark, of the Committee of Correspondence, Inspection, and Safety; Nehemiah Carpenter, Constable, as he was for many years in this town; Jonathan Billings (2d), Surveyor of Ways. Seth Boyden was collector for the second ministerial precinct in Stoughton in 1750, as appears from the rate-book, now in the hands of his descendants. That precinct included Stoughton, Sharon, and a large part of Foxborough.

They also have "the records of the proprietors of a lot of land, being y^e forty-fifth lot in y^e twenty-five divisions of land (so called), lying, and being in y^e Township of Dorchester, and now in y^e Township of Stoughton, in y^e County of Suffolk; and is held in common by the said proprietors,—Begun the tenth day of April, 1739." This record was kept by Seth Boyden as the "Proprietors' Clerk." This lot was partly in the present Sharon, and partly in Foxborough, and contained the iron-ore bed worked so long. The sixth article in the warrant, issued March 4, 1738, by Jonathan Ware, Esq., of Wrentham, is "to determine in what manner y^e Iron oar and stream in s^d land shall be divided or disposed of." Capt. Preserved Capen was moderator of the first two meetings, held respectively at the house of Mrs. Mary Billings, widow of Beriah Billings, innholder, and Capt. Samuel Billings. Both Beriah and Capt. Billings lived in what now is Foxborough. It was voted that the iron "oar," then or thereafter found, should be reserved to the use of all the proprietors, according to their interest, each of whom might between the last Tuesday in August and October "dige oar annually, and at no other time of the year."

"The Brook or Stream" was also reserved for the use of the proprietors "to build a mill and dam on, provided they do not raise such a head of water as to float the adjacent lands or meadows, at any other time of the year than between y^e first day of October and the 20th day of April, annually." And in the same custody we find a bond of Nathan Clark, Jr., "Bloomer" (or maker of iron blooms), and Nathaniel Clark, "Cordwinder" (cordwainer or shoemaker), for one hundred pounds, dated Dec. 20, 1760, and conditioned upon draining off "their forge pond, by hoysting the gates by the first day of May, so long as it is improved for a forge pond." Nathan Clark and Nathaniel Clark (the Stoughtonham committee-man of 1776) lived on what after became Foxborough territory, and the sureties named in the bond were Elkanah Billings (one of the proprietors), Josiah Morse, and Ebenezer Hill, Foxborough men. The said forty-fifth lot of land contained four hundred and thirty-seven acres, of which two hundred and thirty-two and one-quarter acres were set off to Seth Boyden, with an additional allowance for "bad land," in the whole probably nearly two hundred and seventy acres. By this record of the last meeting of the proprietors, held Sept. 12, 1757, it appeared that Daniel Bacon had "duge and carried off, without leave, seventeen tuns seventeen hundred and fifty pounds of iron oar, and Michael Woodecock nine tuns and fourteen hundred of iron oar, without proper leave." By Boyden's account he received seventy-five tons of ore as his proportion in the years 1740 to 1755, inclusive.

It was at this forge and from this iron ore that the first cannon were cast for the war of "'76," by one Uriah Atherton; and the "grog cups" used on the occasion are now in the hands of one of his descendants. This honor is claimed by Bridgewater; but there is a well-authenticated tradition that the "Bridgewater folks" came here to learn the trade, and proved themselves ready apprentices. A cannon-ball cast by Atherton at this forge is deposited in Memorial Hall.

Boyden was a man of intelligence, and held a full share of offices in Stoughton before the incorporation of Foxborough, as the ancient papers we have to-day would show. Among them is a warrant addressed by the Selectmen of Stoughton, April 25, 1768, to Seth Boyden, directing him "to take care of and award the wages," viz.: "All y^e roads lying in that part of Stoughton called Robinses Corner" (i.e., Robbins), as the part of Foxborough where Boyden lived appears to have been then called. He was to give the highway tax-payer the proffer of doing their proportions, etc., in labor at "£0 2s. 4d. a day for a man, and £0 4s. 8d. a day for a man and yoke of oxen and cart."

Amos Boyden was early a surveyor in Foxborough, as appears from a warrant addressed to him in the second year of incorporation (i.e., 1779), directing him "to take and award all y^e highways or roads in your squardren," etc. Also, "all y^e other roads belonging to y^e town of Foxborough in that part that of late belonged to Stoughton."

The expense of the school in "Robinses Corner" is show by the following receipts. It was, perhaps, as burdensome to our fathers proportionally as to us; but we find no record of complaint for what are called "public burdens."

According to the list, which has before been given at length, there were, at the time of incorporation, sixty-four families, containing one hundred and six male inhabitants, sixteen years of age and upwards, in that portion of Stoughtonham which became Foxborough. This makes no account of the inhabitants living upon the lands of Wrentham, Walpole, and Stoughton, incorporated with those of Stoughtonham. The names of quite a number have been named of those who, before incorporation, dwelt upon the lands of Stoughton and Wrentham.

In 1765 Stoughton, including the present Stoughton, Sharon, Canton, and all of Foxborough (except such portions as once belonged to Wrentham and Walpole), contained a population of 2295, and 567 male inhabitants, sixteen years and upwards, or almost exactly one in four of the whole. In 1777 Stoughton contained 532 males, sixteen years and upwards; Stoughtonham, 300. In 1778 Stoughton had 504 polls in valuation, Stoughtonham 209, and Foxborough (now appearing in census for the first time) had 113. Stoughton and Stoughtonham had each lost to Foxborough, and all three had doubtless lost by the ravages of the war.

According to the proportion of Stoughton and Stoughtonham, the population of Foxborough at its incorporation must have been about 450. In 1781 it had 133 polls, and had, perhaps, nearly 550 inhabitants. In 1790 the census gave the town a population of 640; in 1800, 779; in 1810, 870; in 1820, 1004; in 1830, 1168; in 1840, 1494; in 1850, 1880; in 1860, 2879; in 1875, 3168. At a town-meeting held Nov. 11, 1832, a committee appointed to consider the expediency of building a town house, reported that "the whole number of voters are supposed not to fall much short of 200, and we may confidently anticipate that at no distant period that number will actually attend town-meetings." The expectations of the committee were more than realized Nov. 9, 1840, when, under the stimulus of the "Log Cabin Campaign," the town polled 252 votes; but that number was not again reached for years. In 1875 the population of Foxborough was 3168, and its polls numbered 695. It has, therefore, increased about sevenfold since its incorporation in these respects. The soil of the lands set off as Foxborough, better known as "Foxbery" at that time, was not rich or productive, and the people who dwelt upon them were poor also, and rather looked down upon by their wealthier neighbors of Walpole, Wrentham, Sharon, and Mansfield. In 1781 the State tax of the town was less than that of any town in Suffolk County save Hull.

In 1796 its State tax was the smallest paid by any of the towns in Norfolk County; in 1810 the smallest except that of Dover; in 1820 the smallest except that of Dover and Stoughton (the mother-town); and in 1830 the smallest, still excepting Dover.

In 1876 there were twenty-four towns in Norfolk County; of these, fourteen towns had a greater valuation than Foxborough, nine had a less valuation. In amount of taxable property it surpassed its neighbors of Sharon, Walpole, Mansfield, and Wrentham. In population it is the twelfth town of Norfolk County. Of the first settlers of Foxborough as a town, John Everett was a blacksmith, Aaron Everett a carpenter, Joseph Everett, a tanner and currier and a glove-maker. One citizen made hats and another stamped calico.

Swift Payson was the first town clerk, 1778 and 1779. He was son of the Rev. Phillips Payson, pastor of Walpole, one of the eleven candidates voted for, in 1729, for minister of the church in Dorchester. The good parson established his son as a farmer in Foxborough. This Swift Payson was a humorous, whimsical, but kindly character. Passionately fond of music, his first accumulations, as a boy, were devoted to the purchase of a violin. Horrified at the sound of the instrument, accidentally heard after a long concealment, the father cried, "Where did you get that fiddle?" "I bought it, sir," was the apparently innocent reply. "Then sell it at the first opportunity; let me never hear it again." Shortly the Ministerial Association met with Mr. Payson, to whom, sitting in the parlor, demurely entered the lad with his violin. "Gentlemen, would either of you like a first-rate fiddle? My father says I may sell it, and I thought it only right to give you the first chance." It is to be hoped the boy's wit saved his fiddle. It may have done good service in Foxborough, for tradition says our people, in the midst of hardship and privation, were yet gay and pleasure-loving, and "often danced on sanded floors to the scraping of the catgut;" and the discovery of red ears at huskings was the same then as now. Joseph Hewes lived in the house afterwards occupied by Col. Henry Hobart, well remembered as one of the strongest and most reliable citizens of Foxborough. Joseph Hewes practiced medicine, and removed to Providence, R. I., where he accumulated considerable property.

John Everett, the blacksmith, lived in a large house, sheltered by two fine old trees, an elm and a white-wood tree. Upon a limb of the last he hung a tavern sign which welcomed the wayfarer.

Joseph Comey was the village shoemaker; Simon Pettee was a gunsmith; Stephen Pettee, a farmer; William Pettee, a laborer and a famous singer; Benjamin Pettee lived in what is known as Daniel Carpenter's "old house;" Forrest, Guild, and Jedediah Morse lived in what is now called "New State." David Stratton, the Shepards, Sherman, and Clafflin (another shoemaker) lived in the southern part of the town.

On the great road from Worcester to Taunton lived Grover, Shaw, the Paines, Seth Robinson, Ebenezer Warren, Spencer Hodges. On the road leading to Mansfield (through East Foxborough, or "Robbinses Corner," before the roads through Witch Woods or over Robinson Hill was laid out) lived Robins, Kingsbury, Pratt, Bird, Comey, Sumner, and Leonard families. Near Sharon lived the Boyden, Clap, and Clark families.

Near the northeast corner of the town lived Eleazer Belcher, who cultivated a farm, made potash, and kept a little store. Before Belcher, however, Joseph Rhoades, living a mile from any other person, kept a store in his corn barn. The Morses lived near Swift Payson, on the road to Walpole, or what is and was one hundred and twenty-five or one hundred and fifty years ago called "Crack Rock." Another branch of the family lived at Robbinses Corner. At the Centre were Leonard, Cook, Jeremy Hartshorn, Samuel Baker, and Nehemiah Carpenter.

It is said that the old Deacon Baker house, alias Bird house, has sheltered six generations, and always loyal except in one instance. The old Ironside Patriots, Baker and Belcher, who lived there at the time of the tea-tax, declared "tea shall not be drank in this house;" but Mrs. Belcher's taste for the cup was stronger than her patriotism, and, detailing her daughter as guard at the door, she would indulge in a "sip" of tea in the absence of her liege lord. The disloyal cup still exists, but in the hands of loyal subjects.

Moseley was a deserter from an English man-of-war, who hid himself in Foxborough, where, long after, his wife joined him. He bought a piece of land of Samuel Mann, in the dense woods, for which he paid four dollars. On it he built a log cabin with one room and loft reached by a ladder. Afterwards a rude shelter was put up for cow and pig. Near by was a never-failing spring. A flat rock was the door-sill, upon which played successively eleven daughters, some of whom became mothers of highly respectable families. Roses long grew spontaneously where the rude home of the sailor fugitive had been.

Francis (or François) Daniels was a Frenchman, from Normandy; a Protestant, deeply religious. He came to Boston as a "stow-away," and was advertised and sold for one hundred dollars to pay his passage. He was purchased by John Hewes and brought to this town, and not only redeemed himself from servitude, but poverty, by his industry and perseverance, breaking up quite a large farm with the rudest implements; the farm is now owned by one of his descendants, and his blood flows in the veins of many of us. You can see here to-day his sabots, or wooden shoes, that he wore when he came to this town.

The first school-house in the town was not more than fourteen feet square. There were on one side three seats running the whole length of the building, except a space at each end to enter. There was an entry just large enough for the door to open and shut without injury to the children. The room was lighted by three windows, one on each of three sides, each containing twelve panes of small glass, six by eight inches. There never was such an article as a desk for the teacher. Private kindness furnished a small table, with a single drawer, and a comfortless chair.

A male teacher kept the winter school, and was expected to teach reading, writing, and arithmetic, with something of English grammar; but the female teacher of the summer school was allowed to dispense with the latter of the "three R's." But she must understand how to knit and sew, for the accomplishments of young ladies in that age were the marking of linen, making thread lace, and embroidering muslin.

All the people west of Foxborough Centre sent their children to this school-house, which was always full. The children wore coarse homespun cloth, stout leather shoes, and yarn stockings, and the girls had striped shawls pinned beneath the chin. For, as has been said before, the Foxborough people at that early day were very poor, and money was exceedingly scarce.

The women spun wool and flax, and wove cloth. When the good dame had a few yards of linen, or some spare sheets, she took them to the calico artisan, who stamped them with bright colors for dresses.

Carriages were very rare in the country towns. In 1753 a tax was imposed upon them, for the purpose of encouraging the linen manufacture. In 1757 there were six carriages in Stoughton; but it may be doubted whether either of these was owned in that part of Stoughton which was incorporated in Foxborough. Two women often rode on the back of one horse, which they caught, saddled, bridled, and mounted at the horse-block, without masculine assistance.

The simplicity and rude fashion of living one hundred years ago gave to our fathers

"An undergoing spirit to bear up Against whatever ensued."

In the act of incorporation the motive recited by the Legislature for passing it is substantially as that passed fifty-two years before by the ancestors of some of them, for being set off from Dorchester to Wrentham,—

"Whereas, a number of inhabitants belonging to the towns of Wrentham, Walpole, Stoughton, and Stoughtonham have represented to this Court the inconvenience they labor under on account of their distances from their places of publick worship in the towns to which they now belong, and have earnestly and repeatedly requested that they may be incorporated into a town, be it therefore," etc.

The controlling suggestion then was the inconvenience of the petitioners in attending "public worship." Probably some of them lived at least ten or twelve miles from the meeting-house, the stated services of which the law compelled them to support, and which alone they had a right to attend, save by a courtesy, then rarely expected or extended, for it must not be forgotten that until 1833 all tax-payers were compelled by law to support public worship in the towns where they resided. In that town and no other did they pay, or could they pay, for preaching. There, and nowhere else, had they a right of property therein, or felt themselves at home. There was no shrinkage of creed to fill the pews. To transport the large family of those days over such roads as then were, twenty or twenty-five miles, to meeting and home again, was indeed a Sabbath-day's journey. It was an intolerable grievance. It was so great a grievance in the Foxborough case that the earnest and repeated request must have been effectual long before probably, but for a reason about to be given. It appears that as early as 1757 the royal policy was adopted of opposing the incorporation of new towns, because thus the size of the House of Representatives was increased,—a body that was generally hostile to the king's prerogative,—and so, when absolute necessity seemed to require a new organization, it was conferred in the shape of a "district" instead of a township, without the right of representation, as in the case of Stoughtonham, in 1765, and Mansfield, in 1770. Hence, if Massachusetts had remained a province, the Governor would have been reluctant to organize Foxborough as a district, and pretty certainly would not have assented to its incorporation as a town. Its people were uninfluential, poor, and patriotic. They were such "As dare to love their country and be poor."

After the expulsion of the royal Governor there was, of course, no longer any objection of a similar character to the incorporation of towns.

But the years 1775–77 were busy and crowded years, full of labors and terrors for both people and Legislature, and in this way it probably happened that Foxborough was not made a town till 1778.

It was not customary, certainly, to incorporate a town or district until it was clearly in a situation to provide "publick worship" for itself.

In almost every such case its capacity to that end had been previously tested as a precinct or parish. Foxborough had not been a precinct, but it had a meeting-house, or an apology for one, supposed to have been erected as early as 1763, perhaps about the commencement of the effort for separate organization.

Nehemiah Carpenter and Jeremy Hartshorn gave the land for a common, on which to build the church, and for a burying-ground.

It was centrally located, but was covered with rocks, shrub-oaks, and bushes, with a few sterling oaks, that should have been spared. The building was spacious enough, but the people were too poor to finish it. At the first town-meeting it was voted "to choose a committee of three persons to provide for the laying the floor and making the doors of the meeting-house, and to provide for the glazing so many of the windows as the committee shall see fit."

It had been used for religious services without doors or windows, as a mere shelter from the storm. It was better than worshiping on the naked hills or under the shrub-oaks. It was many years before the ceiling or walls were plastered or the most ambitious thought of painting it. It grew dark with exposure, and seen on the plain by the traveler, from north or south, it looked like a black cloud.

"What house is that?" asked a stranger. "It is the Lord's house," answered the citizen. "Ah, I thought it was the Lord's barn," retorted the irreverent stranger.

All the town-meetings were held in the meeting-house, as was customary; indeed, everywhere the town was the parish, and immediately took upon itself (as indeed the law obliged it) the care and expense of providing for "publick worship." The meeting-house was for many years the only public building in the town, and scarcely any town-meeting occurred in which there was not something done about it. "Pew spots"—i.e., flooring upon which to erect pews—were many times sold to obtain money for necessary repairs or improvements, as (March 2, 1799) "will purchase stuff enough to finish of y^e meeting-house." No committee on public buildings ever had more thought or care. Plans of improvements were submitted, pews were constructed in the galleries, a porch was built on one side, and long after on the other side. "The town voted to sell the two hinder seats on the floor at publick vendue." The town chose a committee to seat the singers in the meeting-house. In 1788 it was voted that "Serviors clear the bushes from around the meeting-house, and allow the men the same price for their labor as they worked on the highway." Aaron Everett got sixpence half-penny per square in 1790 for mending the windows. In the same year leave was granted to build horse-sheds, and, long after, to erect a horse-block "the fore side of the meeting-house, they defending the same," and so on, again and again. Clearly the town thought it owned the meeting-house; and perhaps, legally, it did, as well as the land under it. But the town had not originally built the building, as it was erected before any town was incorporated. In 1821, Rev. Thomas Williams, being about to leave the society, offered it five hundred dollars (the amount of his original settlement) if it would erect a new meeting-house. The offer was at once accepted by a bare majority.

The work of tearing down the old building began the next morning by volunteers, amid wild excitement, and denunciation by some.

Dec. 22, 1821, the selectmen, by their warrant, warned the town to assemble at their meeting-house on Monday, the 4th day of January, 1822, "to see," among other things, "if the town will repair their meeting-house, or do or act anything relative to the premises." The record of this town-meeting mournfully commences: "Pursuant to the foregoing warrant the town assembled on the spot where the meeting-house stood. Voted, to direct their treasurer not to prosecute any person or persons on account of the parish taking down their meeting-house."

The town's "meeting-house" had disappeared, and they certainly never had any other. They were not permitted to use the new brick meeting-house, built in 1822, and taken down in 1855 or 1856, and for many years a place was hired for the transaction of the town's business.¹

A hundred years ago the minister was the most important and influential person in a New England town. Foxborough was not fortunate. A strong pastor would have given stability to the people and been a natural leader, in temporal as well as spiritual things. Rev. Mr. Britt supplied the pulpit, perhaps before as well as after the incorporation, and for many years the town chose a committee to procure preachers. Several clergymen declined overtures for settlement, apparently on account of a want of harmony in the proceedings. Rev. Mr. Kendall was ordained in 1786, with great unanimity, and dismissed with greater unanimity in 1800. Then the Rev. Daniel Loring was called by the casting vote of old John Shepard, when near one hundred years of age, and in two years dismissed, serious disaffection having meanwhile occurred. The only useful and successful man among the early ministers was Rev. Thomas Williams, before alluded to, who came from Providence to Foxborough. Church psalmody made the usual dissension in Foxborough, and the peace-loving Mr. Williams found it necessary to employ the diplomacy of a Talleyrand in introducing music to the choir.

The first bass-viol was manufactured by Marcus Everett, as to the wood-work, and finished by George Holbrook, a bell-maker by trade, and a famous music-teacher. It cost four dollars, and was an excellent instrument. When it was brought into the choir the old Frenchman, Francis Daniels, was horrified. In vain did some learned in Scriptures reason. There might be biblical authority for the harp, and even the viol, but certainly none for the bass-viol; and the only compromise attainable was that he should quit the church when the profane performance began and return when it was over.

The first intruding denomination was the Baptist, next the Universalist, and lastly the Catholic.

The first Baptist meeting-house was located near the entrance of the road to "Witch Woods," and the house now occupied by Ashael Dean was the parsonage. It was removed early in May, 1843, to the site of the present town hall or house, and enlarged and otherwise improved. When their present church was built it was sold at auction, and was converted into a box-manufactory, which was destroyed some two years since by fire.

¹ Jan. 4, 1822, to Nov. 14, 1836, town-meetings were held in Union Hall, over the school-house, which was built in 1793, near where the Baptist Church now is; then in Sumner's Hall (where Union Building now is); from March 1, 1847, to April 7, 1856, in Cocasset Hall; April, 1856, to March 29, 1858, in American Hall (now Knights of Honor Hall); since then in town hall.

The Catholics have built their third house of worship, the others having been destroyed by fire.

In the early part of the century the Foxborough Female Benevolent Society, afterwards the Ladies' Charitable Society, was established, and became the source of much good. Dues were paid either in money or straw braid.

After some years George Stratton became owner of the iron-foundry. He also kept a store at Foxborough Centre, and his son kept the tavern, once conducted by Benjamin Comey. From Stratton the foundry passed into the hands of Gen. Leach, of Easton, and at his death to those of Martin Torrey and Otis Cary.

In the first years of its organization, being the last of the war, the town suffered severely from the State and Continental charges and burdens. Papers in the Massachusetts archives show that the town was more than once relieved from excessive and disproportionate rates and quotas. Like other towns, it in vain attempted to regulate the "price of things," constantly rising with the depreciation of the currency. To show how great that depreciation was we need only give one or two illustrations. In 1780 the town voted £4068, or more than $20,000, for mending the highways and bridges, paying some $60 per day for labor. In 1776 it voted $1100 for highways and bridges. In 1780 the State tax of Foxborough was £16,411, or more than $80,000. Sept. 4, 1780, the town voted to raise £21,000, or more than $100,000; but afterwards reduced the amount to £16,000. October 9th, Voted to levy £15,000 to procure beef on a requisition for the army, and to defray other town charges. But the following year there was an attempt to resume specie payments, for it was voted to raise "100 Spanish milled dollars for highways."

The truth is, the depreciation was such that a hundred paper dollars were worth about one dollar in specie.

For three different years the town treasurer of Dorchester paid out thousands more than he received,—so rapid was the downfall of currency. May 18, 1781, the town treasurer owed Foxborough £13,679. In 1782 the rate of Eleazer Fisher was remitted; rate, £124 10s.; silver rate, £0 11s. 4d. It will not be attempted at this time to produce much from the town records. A futile attempt was made as early as 1782 to support preaching by voluntary contributions: "Voted, To have contributions every Sunday after divine service is over, to pay ministers." The plan has often failed since.

There was frequent legislation against crows and blackbirds. There was a town defaulter as early as 1785, and to settle the defalcation the town took a farm and traded the same for preaching. In 1794 the selectmen were voted a committee to open a subscription for the relief of sufferers by fire in the town of Boston. As will be observed, Foxborough early adopted many popular measures. In 1798 the town voted "to allow 66 cents for eight hours' work, and $1.33 for eight hours' work of a man and a team sufficient to carry a ton weight." This was an eight-hour law.

April 6, 1801, "Voted, To admit the use of instruments of music in public worship."

In 1803 it was "Voted, Not to let the swine run at large," but the pigs had influence enough to procure a reconsideration of this vote, and ran at large some time longer.

In 1804, "Voted, That the Selectmen vendue Lemuel White and wife, two of the town's poor, or support them the best way they can devise."

May 5, 1804, "Voted, to purchase a hearse." The town had already bought "a grave-cloth," and it was soon voted to build a "herse-house," to be under the care of the Selectmen, and March 2, 1812, voted to paint the "herse-house."

Jan. 9, 1826, "Voted, That the Selectmen be instructed to remove Daniel Dassance, as soon as convenient, from the House of Correction, at Dedham, and build a cage and place it within his mother's house, and him the said Dassance therein, under the care of the Selectmen."

Dassance was a poor, insane person, whom the town was treating according to the custom or necessity of the time, who was afterwards provided for in the hospital at Worcester.

May 3, 1830, "Voted, That in our opinion the wearing of mourning apparel ought to be discontinued."

Jan. 7, 1833, "Voted, The town express their cordial approbation of the sentiments contained in President Jackson's Proclamation."

Hard drinking was almost universal when Foxborough was incorporated. Rum raised a meeting-house or a barn, or built a bridge. Every employer furnished it; every workman drank it. The only mechanical interest was the iron-foundry. It was a densely-wooded region, and the great specie-raising industry was charcoal-making. It was said that "the only export was charcoal, but that the imports were threefold,—molasses, codfish, and New England rum." Ruin fell upon the best men in the town, and the town itself. Distress was universal. The straw manufacture, then in its infancy, somewhat mitigated suffering; for by its aid the mother and little children, whom the husband and father had abandoned, were enabled often to keep the "wolf from the door."

Rev. Mr. Williams, Melatiah Everett, Esq., and Stephen Rhodes are entitled to great credit, not only because they clearly appreciated the necessity of reform, but had the courage to undertake it against discouragement and fierce opposition. The movement to suppress intemperance began in 1817, much earlier than in most cases, and was triumphant. Rum had conquered New England; but the manliness of her people overthrew the tyrant, as it is to be hoped it will yet again.

Perhaps increasing prosperity had much to do, also, with the improved tone and increased self-respect of the people of Foxborough.

We have just alluded to the straw manufacture, of which it is now possible to speak only in the briefest manner. The honor of being the first American manufacturer of straw bonnets is ascribed to Betsey Metcalf, of Providence, R. I., who imitated an imported Dunstable. She then was a girl of twelve years; but, as Mrs. Baker, she afterwards carried on the business, at first as a monopolist, but soon with competitors. It is said that Eunice, daughter of Aaron Everett, made the first bonnet in Foxborough. Soon after, Sally Mann made one. The straw was at first cut with a pair of scissors.

Straw bonnets soon became common in Foxborough and Wrentham, where Amariah Hall, who kept store, took them, paying in goods. Cornelius Metcalf, coming to Foxborough, married Hephsebeth Sumner, and bought the place formerly occupied by the first minister, Mr. Kendall. Mrs. Metcalf had great skill in making the straw bonnets. She adopted several children, took apprentices, and carried on the business in a small way. Metcalf Everett first made straw goods for the New York market. Elias Nason then kept a store, paying for straw goods partly cash and partly in other goods. Nehemiah Carpenter was afterwards associated with Nason in this business. Daniels Carpenter and John Corey afterwards separately manufactured straw goods on a much larger scale, paying cash for labor.

John Corey was lost in the burning of the steamer "Lexington," on Long Island Sound, in the winter of 1840.

Edson Carpenter and Milton, John E., and Henry H. Sumner, sons of John Sumner, afterwards carried on stores, where straw braid and bonnets were received in payment for goods.

The Sumner brothers, under the firm-name of J. E. Sumner & Co., manufactured largely of straw goods, and sold imported stock to smaller manufacturers.

Foxborough Foundry on Mill Street (usually called Cary's Foundry) has been in operation more than one hundred years, having been built in 1781 by George Stratton, Uriah Atherton, Joseph Hines, and John Knapp.

Pond's box-factory and saw-mill was started in 1850 by Daniels Carpenter, Lucius Pond, J. Fisher Pond, and V. S. Pond.

Dr. Gardner Peck, formerly a successful physician in Foxborough, engaged in the manufacture. Thus gradually the business grew and developed, until, in 1844, Oliver, Warren, and E. P. Carpenter, as associates in business, built what then was considered a marvel of a straw-factory, or works.

It was what is now the "Verandah House," used as a boarding-house. The business increased rapidly, and after several additions and alterations the first works were found altogether too limited, and in 1853 the Union Straw-Works were established; but the growth of the business made it necessary to enlarge its limits, which was done in 1856. The business increased from $75,000 in 1844 to nearly the amount of $2,000,000 in 1865. Foxborough has made, through its straw business, a name that in many foreign places is known better than the city of Boston itself.

Certainly to this business Foxborough is indebted for her modern prosperity.

On the 29th of June, 1778, the inhabitants of Foxborough first assembled in town-meeting, in pursuance of the warrant issued by Benjamin Guild, a magistrate of Wrentham, at the request of Benjamin Pettee, Swift Payson, Nehemiah Carpenter, Jacob Cook, Jacob Leonard, Amos Morse, and Samuel Baker. Josiah Pratt was moderator of the meeting; Swift Payson, clerk; Josiah Pratt, John Everett, Benjamin Pettee, Daniel Robinson, and Joseph Shepard were chosen selectmen; Nehemiah Carpenter was chosen treasurer, and John Comee, constable. They "Voted to adjourn the meeting for one hour and a half, then met" and chose five surveyors of highways, three for a committee of correspondence, five assessors, two tithingmen, two fence-viewers, two field-drivers, one sealer of leather, two hog-reeves,—a full complement of town officers.

The 29th of June, 1778, was a period of gloom and doubt in the Revolutionary struggle. But our immediate ancestors were ready to play their part like men. In 1780 they said, in their petition to the General Court, "We are willing to sacrifice our all in the common cause, if it should be necessary."

CHAPTER LVII.

FOXBOROUGH—(Continued).

MILITARY RECORD.

The Heroes of Three Wars—War of the Revolution—1812—War of the Rebellion—List of Soldiers, 1861–65—Patriots of 1776—Soldiers of 1812—Roll of Honor, 1861–65—Veterans of the War—Militia, 1796.

THE territory of Foxborough was made up from parts of Wrentham, Walpole, Stoughton, and Stoughtonham (now Sharon). Wrentham was incorporated in 1673; Walpole, in 1724; Stoughton, in 1726; Sharon, in 1765; Foxborough, on the 10th of June, 1778. It was born, therefore, amid the throes of the Revolutionary period. Lexington, Bunker Hill, the siege and evacuation of Boston, were memorable deeds already quite passed by in the rapid rush of events. Washington had occupied and evacuated New York; Long Island and Staten Island had been lost to the enemy, who had, moreover, taken the forts upon the Hudson River, and overrun the Jerseys, occupying Philadelphia. The fame which Washington won by the brilliant engagements at Trenton and Princeton had been somewhat dimmed by the indecisive or disastrous engagements at the Brandywine, Germantown, and Monmouth Court-House; but the failure of the Gates and Conway intrigue to displace him from the chief command demonstrated what a strong hold he already had upon the affections and respect of his countrymen.

In the North the patriots had been more fortunate. At Bennington, on the 16th of August, 1777, the sturdy Stark had defeated the Hessian Colonels Baum and Breyman, in the glorious battle of Bennington.

This victory reanimated the people of New England and New York, and prepared the way for the overthrow and surrender of the proud army of Burgoyne, Oct. 16, 1777.

The finances of the United States were in a most deplorable condition. The liabilities contracted by Congress amounted to $40,000,000; Massachusetts alone owed $5,000,000. The entire debt contracted for the war amounted to at least $65,000,000.

Continental money depreciated to at least six for one in New England, and eight for one in the South. At a later period the money wages, for one year, of Ezra Carpenter, here in Foxborough, upon the farm of Benjamin Pettee, now owned by Daniels Carpenter, was only sufficient to buy him a pair of cowhide shoes.

Thus the financial status of the infant republic was wellnigh desperate. Yet faith and hope were strong.

June 14, 1777, the flag of the stars and stripes had been adopted. Though harassed and depreciated, the immortal Washington was “Patient of toil, serene amidst alarms,

Inflexible in faith, invincible in arms.”

In that year, too, Lafayette had brought his sword, his youthful enthusiasm, and his loyal devotion to the American cause. Jan. 30, 1778, France and the United States signed two treaties,—one of friendship and commerce, the other of defensive alliance; and this alliance, embroiling England with France, eventually rescued our independence from the countless dangers that beset it.

June 13, 1778, the British Commissioners—the Earl of Carlisle, William Eden, and Governor Johnstone—communicated to Congress proposals as a basis of peace, an extension of colonial trade; no military force to be quartered in any colony without the consent of its Assembly; an arrangement for sustaining the Continental bills of credit and their ultimate discharge; a representation of the colonies in the Parliament of Great Britain, and of the British government in the colonial assemblies. In short, King George offered almost everything short of total independence; but Congress peremptorily refused to treat unless the independence of the States was first acknowledged or the troops withdrawn. This was three days after the incorporation of our little town. Five days later, on the 18th of June, Philadelphia was evacuated by the British.

Thus, amidst the mingled hopes and fears of Americans, Foxborough began its existence as a town. The inhabitants of the territory embraced in it had already evinced their willingness to share in all patriotic perils and sufferings. When enlistments were first called for, Lieut. Timothy Morse recruited twenty-four men in the crowded bar-room of the old tavern at Wrentham for three years' service. My grandfather, Ezra Carpenter, was at work in a ditch on the land now owned by his son, Daniels Carpenter, when the minute-men were first summoned by the alarm, upon the news of the battle of Lexington. He dropped his tools, ran for his musket and knapsack, seized a parcel of bread and meat, bade good-by to his friends, and started to join his company at Wrentham; but, failing to find it there, he continued his march alone to Dedham, and there joining other comrades, they continued on and overtook the company at Roxbury.

He was at the siege of Boston, and there, while doing guard duty, had a narrow escape from a cannonball, that came so near to him that he lost a portion of his shirt from his back and was thrown headlong to the ground, and reported by the soldier on guard with him as having been killed. He lived to the age of eighty-nine, and the speaker has often listened with boyish enthusiasm to his stories of Revolutionary service, protracted for three years. He was, doubtless, a soldier of Putnam's at Long Island; he certainly crossed the Delaware, under Washington, on the memorable Christmas-eve of 1776, and on Christmas morning, at eight o'clock, rushed in with his comrades upon the surprised and sleepy Hessians, confused with the last night's debauch. They had thrown their fresh-baked bread into the "horse-pond;" but it was, nevertheless, rescued on the points of bayonets, and proved, after a shaving process, a savory morsel to the half-starved Americans. This Foxborough soldier and his comrades, a number of whom lived and died within my remembrance, but of whose particular history I have no knowledge, wintered in 1776-77 at Morristown, in comparative comfort; but in 1777-78 the distress in the winter quarters of Washington's army was terrible, and the old campaigners often dwelt upon its details. Dec. 10, 1777, the army went into winter quarters at Valley Forge. Eleven thousand soldiers were quartered in log huts, each containing fourteen men. For want of shoes, all the late marches had been marked with blood from wounded feet. For lack of blankets, many of the men were compelled to sit up all night before the camp-fires. More than one-quarter were unfit for duty, because barefoot and otherwise naked. Provisions failed; more than once there was famine in the camp.

Such was the service and suffering of the Foxborough soldiers in the Revolution. As there were, of course, no records until after 1778, we are unable to find the responses the town would, if in existence, have made to the stirring appeals of James Otis, John Adams, Hancock, and Samuel Adams, addressed to the little rural municipalities; but we find, in the very first warrant issued for a town-meeting, dated June 12, 1778, "Article 5th: to see if the town will carry on the war by way of a rate, or act or do anything thereon they shall see fit;" feeling and assuming, as it were, the whole responsibility of carrying on the war. As the grandson of a Revolutionary soldier, I may be pardoned for expressing the gratification I have experienced in serving as your representative upon the commission which has deposited the noble statue of Samuel Adams in the capitol at Washington as the gift of Massachusetts to the nation and her tribute of admiration to him, often called "the pilot of the Revolution."

It is said and claimed that Uriah Atherton, of Foxborough, cast at Sharon the first cannon of the Revolutionary war.

The Revolutionary patriots of Foxborough bore the names of Boyden, Billings, Carpenter, Forrest, Harts-horn, Howe, Morse, Everett, Pettee, etc.; in all twenty-four in number.

The same names reappear, in the war of 1812, among the thirty-eight men furnished by the town to the light infantry company which reported at Roxbury, serving fifty-six days in and about the forts of Boston Harbor. Daniel Everett was its captain; Asa Plympton, lieutenant; Amos Morse, ensign. Of the soldiers of 1812, four are still living,—Alexander Boyden, Francis Carpenter, Daniels Carpenter, and Lyman Comey,—whose united ages are quite three hundred and thirty years.

July 2, 1812, the town voted "to make up to the soldiers detached from the militia in Foxborough and inhabitants of Foxborough, with the government pay, twelve dollars per month for May, June, July, August, September, and October, and ten dollars for November, December, January, February, March, and April, if they are called into active service."

Aug. 22, 1814, it was voted "to make up to the soldiers of the last detachment, and all who may be detached in Foxborough previous to March next, eighteen dollars a month each, and each five dollars bounty." At a meeting Nov. 7, 1814, the part of the vote about bounty was reconsidered.

It may be worth while to note that in 1815, at the close of the war, one hundred and fifty-two votes were thrown for Governor; and, in the absence of statistics showing the number of inhabitants of the town at that time, we are led to infer that Foxborough had a large representation of soldiers in the war of 1812. Foxborough furnished one man to the Massachusetts regiment in the Mexican war, whose name was Henry Hunnewell; but, as it is well known, that war was not popular in this region. Time passed and brought us to the Presidential election of 1860, and its immediate consequences, culminating in the fall of Fort Sumter. The deadening spirit of compromise and submission, which dominated in the large commercial cities in the winter of 1860 and 1861, had a palsying effect upon the patriotism of the country; but, with the outrage to the flag, American manhood flamed forth. Fort Sumter fell on Saturday, April 13, 1861. On Monday, April 15th, Col. A. B. Packard, of Quincy, commanding the Fourth Regiment Massachusetts Militia, received orders to appear at Boston on the following morning with his command. The adjutant, Henry Walker, of Quincy, sent them at once to the several companies by special messenger, who reached the last company (Company G, of Taunton) in a driving storm of wind and rain, beating up Capt. Gordon at 3 A.M. of the 16th of April. Company F, of the Fourth, was known as the "Warren Light Guard of Foxborough." It was organized under the act of Jan. 22, 1776, and in 1861 was said to hold the oldest charter in the State, granted upon petition, all similar having disbanded. In 1854 it was changed from an artillery into a light infantry company. In 1857 its location was changed from Norton to Foxborough. Its name was, of course, in memory of the martyr of Bunker Hill, whose brother, Judge Warren, resided in Foxborough in the house that his lineal descendant, our worthy citizen, Henry G. Warren, now owns and occupies. The son of Gen. Warren was buried in the old burying-ground, but his remains were removed some years since.

In April, 1861, David L. Shepard was its captain, Moses A. Richardson and Carlos A. Hart its lieutenants,—all of Foxborough. Alvin E. Hall, of Foxborough, was sergeant-major of the regiment.

Capt. Shepard received his orders at nine o'clock P.M., and immediately notified officers and men to report at the armory, at the Cocasset House, as early as possible on the following morning. The members of the company were scattered well over the town and out of town, but a large number reported equipped for duty at about ten o'clock. It was a solemn moment of parting. Excitement was intense. "Esquire" Bird,—as he was known and called by all, and of whom it could be truly said, if it could be said of any man, "an honest man is the noblest work of God,"—inspired with patriotic zeal and fervor, made a most feeling and eloquent address to the soldiers who had been called to defend the honor of their country, to which Capt. Shepard fittingly replied in behalf of the company. There were a number of our young men who volunteered to don the uniforms of members of the company, who had families, and to "fall in" and follow the fortunes of the company, and did so. The company were followed by a large number of friends and citizens to East Foxborough, where they took the train for Boston, and promptly reported at the State-House. The same readiness was evinced throughout the entire regiment. At Quincy, Adjt. Walker beat the drum for recruits. One man said, "I want to see my wife." "No time for leave-taking," said the adjutant; "fall in." "Do you want an Irishman?" said one. "Do you believe in the old flag? If you do, fall in." So he fell in, and marched in his shirt-sleeves.

The Fourth Regiment was prepared to march on the 16th, but no transportation could be furnished until the 17th, and it was quartered for the night in Faneuil Hall. As it was, it left the State for the seat of war before any other regiment. On Wednesday, the 17th, it left Faneuil Hall at three P.M., and marched to the State-House, where Governor Andrew made one of his most inspiring addresses. He said, "It gives me unspeakable pleasure to witness this array from the good old Colony. You have come from the shores of the sounding sea, where lie the ashes of Pilgrims, and you are bound on a high and noble pilgrimage for liberty, for the Union and Constitution of your country. Soldiers of the old Bay State, sons of sires who never disgraced their flag in civil life or on the tented field, I thank you from the bottom of my heart for this noble response to the call of your State and your country. You cannot wait for words. I bid you God-speed and an affectionate farewell." Col. Packard modestly responded: "Your Excellency, I am scarcely able to speak. All I can say is, we will endeavor to do our duty." Governor Andrew replied, "I know you will endeavor, and I know, colonel, you will succeed." The Fourth embarked at Fall River on the steamer "State of Maine" the same night, and arrived in New York in the afternoon of the next day. The boat was improperly ballasted, and her captain did not consider her safe to carry troops, so that Col. Packard telegraphed to Governor Andrew for instructions. He replied, "If the captain says he can carry your men, go on; Massachusetts must be first on the ground." After a short delay, reballasting the steamer, she proceeded to Fortress Monroe, about the safety of which much anxiety was felt, as it was insufficiently garrisoned and dangerously situated. Governor Andrew's order, issued from the office of the Adjutant-General, April 17, 1861, directed "Col. Packard, of the Fourth Regiment, Second Brigade, First Division, Massachusetts Volunteer Militia, to proceed to Fortress Monroe, by steamer to be provided, to enter into the service of the United States as United States Militia, and, on being joined by Col. Wardrop's regiment (Third Massachusetts Volunteer Militia), he will take command of them also."

The steamer left New York at nightfall, and was about thirty hours on the way. Capt. Shepard was ordered to take charge of the boat. Only two companies were allowed to remain on deck. The rest were sent below under a guard; the fear being that, if the men were allowed to rush to and fro, the inadequately-ballasted steamer might capsize. Arriving at Fortress Monroe at an early hour on the morning of Saturday, the 20th, and seeing no flag flying from it, "we spent," says an officer of the Fourth, "an hour of anxiety lying off and on, doubtful who held the fort. But at length the glorious banner of the stars and stripes was unfurled, and she landed her precious freight. We found some two hundred and fifty regulars, worn out with watching, who heartily welcomed us. The fortress was almost defenseless. We spent the next month in guard and fatigue duty, mounting guns, and storing provisions." The uniforms became so threadbare that the men, many of them, were obliged to wear their overcoats on parade, to cover their new raglan style of pants. As the regiment was the first to leave Massachusetts, it was also the first to reach the actual seat of war, and the first mustered in the service of the United States. It was mustered into the service April 22d. The Third and Fourth Massachusetts saved Fortress Monroe, whose value to the Union cause was beyond all price; for, had it fallen into the hands of the enemy, no one could estimate the cost in treasure and blood to have regained the same.

May 27th the regiment went from the fortress to Newport News, and fortified it.

It was at this time, under a commission from the town, that the writer visited Fortress Monroe as bearer of kind messages and remembrances from friends at home, and to provide for the needs and comfort of our soldiers. Reporting to Gen. Butler, who was then in command, I obtained a permit, and accompanied the general and staff to Newport News. The stern realities of war were still in the future, and when we landed, instead of finding the troops fortifying, or watching the enemy, who was said to be near at hand, behind intrenchments, the scene was more like an old-fashioned muster-field,—a regular holiday show. One of our soldiers, and about the first one I saw, had embarked in the butchering business, and was skinning a pig, shot on "Uncle Sam's farm." Another had gone into the horse and mule business, and was ready to swap or trade on most favorable terms, as he had purchased cheap of a contraband, in the absence of his master. Another had made an investment in the wood and live-feather business, and had borrowed a hand-cart to bring his goods or merchandise to camp, and was quite willing to throw in the meat of the poultry, and wood to cook with, if he could only have the feathers returned in good order for the filling of a bed. I had no occasion to complain of my rations during my visit, which will always be held in pleasant remembrance for the hearty welcome received. I don't know how I should have felt if I had been "armed and equipped as the law directs;" for a musket is a good thing for courage when you don't know who is around; but I confess I felt rather more secure and at ease within the walls of the fortress. But this is a digression, for which I beg pardon, and will return to our record.

Four companies as a battalion, united with some Vermont and New York troops, under Maj. Winthrop, participated in the unfortunate affair at Big Bethel, where plenty of pluck was exhibited, but little or no capacity. Company F was not ordered, but volunteered to go into the fight, and did go, instead of Capt. Bumpus' company, of Braintree. It is said that history repeats itself, but history would make a great blunder to repeat the battle of Great Bethel, if we can believe what is recorded of its generalship on our side. The Fourth was the only organization which marched into camp that night in regular order at shoulder arms.

The news of this battle created an intense excitement and feeling through the State, as the report first came that the Fourth Massachusetts was "all cut to pieces."

July 3d the Fourth, with the Third Massachusetts, were ordered to occupy Hampton, which they partially fortified.

July 17th they left Hampton for Fortress Monroe on their way home, having served their time of enlistment. The regiment was mustered out July 22d at Long Island, Boston Bay. They received high praises for their service from Col. Dimmock, the commandant of the fortress, and from Gen. Butler, who said in a farewell, "You have done your duty well. You have all along been in the advance at Fortress Monroe, at Newport News, at Hampton." I have dwelt with particularity upon its service as a three-months' regiment because of the stirring patriotism, promptness, and magnetic energy with which it was rendered at an awful crisis of our history. On its return to Foxborough, Company F, with full ranks, was warmly received; an address of welcome was made by E. P. Carpenter. But the service of the Fourth Regiment did not end here. When, in the early summer of 1862, Gen. Banks retreated down the valley of the Shenandoah, Governor Andrew called for more troops (May 26th), the Fourth Regiment was again ordered out. Lieut.-Col. Walker, the late adjutant, read the order at Quincy on his way to the railroad station. He drove through the country and caused alarm-bells to be rung. In forty-eight hours the regiment had eight hundred men in Boston. But they were not wanted, as the alarm had passed, and so they returned home.

In July, 1862, came the call for two hundred thousand nine-months' men. Lieut.-Col. Walker at once tendered the Fourth Regiment, the first offered, and, being accepted, went into camp at Lakeville in August. Company F did not lose its identity as a Foxborough company, though we find but a small number of the three-months' men upon the roll-call, as many of them had enlisted in other regiments, and the company was recruited for the most part with new members. They went into camp with C. F. Howard as captain, and Moses A. Richardson, of Foxborough, and Benjamin H. Richmond, of Norton, lieutenants. The company were mustered into service September 23d. Capt. Howard was commissioned major, and sworn or mustered in as such December 16th, which necessitated the election of another captain. On the election of First Lieut. William R. Black, of Company G, Taunton, as captain, Lieut. Moses A. Richardson resigned, and Benjamin H. Richmond, of Norton, was elected first lieutenant, and Isaac H. Bonney, of Foxborough, second lieutenant. Foxborough is accredited with forty-seven men in this company. Dec. 25, 1862, the regiment left camp for New York, and thence went to New Orleans. It was in the first Port Hudson expedition, when the noble old Farragut ran by in the "Richmond;" Col. Walker was put in command at Brashear City, whence, May 28, 1863, the regiment was again ordered to Port Hudson.

June 14th, Capt. Bartlett, of Company K, led the storming party, and was killed on the very slope of the enemy's works, gallantly leading. Four officers of the Fourth were in the advance, of whom one was killed and two wounded. The regiment lost every fifth man. Ten Foxborough soldiers in Company F laid down their lives in patriotic devotion to their country. Their names are found enrolled with the "heroic dead" in Memorial Hall, and will be held in grateful remembrance when your name and mine shall be forgotten. The regiment was mustered out Aug. 22, 1863, most of the men having been in service eleven months. Gen. Emory said, "It was one of the best regiments in my whole division. It was well disciplined. It was remarkable for its camp, police, and sanitary discipline. I remember signaling it before the whole division at Baton Rouge, on account of its extreme excellence in these respects." If you would learn more of the history of this regiment, call upon the living witnesses now before you, for their testimony would be the whole history of a Massachusetts regiment, that rendered invaluable service to the country, and gained imperishable laurels for itself.

Foxborough men are found enrolled in the Seventh Massachusetts, raised by that distinguished officer,

Maj.-Gen. D. N. Couch, at Taunton. It was mustered into the service June 15, 1861, and mustered out July 5, 1864. Upon its standard will be found a long list of battles in which it was engaged. Of this regiment, on the 5th of May, 1864, the first day of the Wilderness, Col. Briggs, of the Tenth, writes, "Men fell like leaves in autumn: yet the regiment stood firm, never wavered, till, the ammunition being expended, it was promptly relieved by Lieut.-Col. Harlow and the Seventh Massachusetts. Would I could sound a note to his praise, than whom none is more worthy!"

Some Foxborough soldiers served in the "Immortal Sixth Regiment," when called to serve one hundred days.

Eight companies of the Eighteenth Regiment were recruited chiefly in Norfolk, Plymouth, and Bristol Counties. Col. James Barnes, of Springfield, commanded it. It was mustered Aug. 27, 1861. Foxborough had a number of representative soldiers in this regiment, who have a good record, and two of Company I are registered with the "heroic dead."

About forty men are credited to Foxborough upon the roster of the Twenty-third Regiment, commanded by Col. Kurtz. Company K was recruited by Capt. Carlos A. Hart, in this town, and was known as the "Foxborough Company." It went into camp with the regiment at Lynnfield, in command of Capt. Hart, with John Littlefield and Benjamin F. Barnard, lieutenants. The regiment left camp for Annapolis, Nov. 11, 1861, and was mustered out at Readville, July 12, 1865. It went with Gen. Burnside to Roanoke Island. It fought its first battle Feb. 8, 1862, which lasted two days; twenty-five hundred prisoners were captured in the two days' engagements. It was at Newbern, Goldsborough, and in other engagements in North Carolina; and at Drury's Bluff, Cold Harbor, and the other terrific battles of Grant's campaign of 1864, in Virginia. Col. John W. Raymond, the last commander, says of this regiment, "In closing my narrative of the regiment, I cannot refrain from speaking a few words in commendation of both men and officers during the time I had the honor to command them. Their excellent conduct while in camp or garrison, their courage and bravery under fire, their vigilance and fidelity at all times displayed, entitle them to the highest praise, and have won for them the approbation of all who have been in command over them. Rest assured that the Twenty-third Regiment, as an organization, never brought discredit upon their native State; and I shall count it the highest honor of my life that I have been privileged to command it."

Such words, coming from Col. Raymond, are commendations that every soldier of the regiment may well be proud of, and its record needs no further indorsement to make it equal to the best.

One Foxborough soldier perished in Company A of the Twenty-fourth Regiment, in which a number enlisted, which fought from Roanoke Island to Petersburg. It was not mustered out of service until Jan. 20, 1866. On the 27th, Governor Bullock received its colors and said, "I welcome you home. But all have not returned. Eight officers of the line and two hundred and ten enlisted men have fallen in battle and by the casualties of war. It only remains that I should now transfer your colors to the great companionship in which they shall henceforth be preserved, and that, in behalf of a grateful people, I should greet and honor your return."

We had representatives in the Fifty-sixth Infantry, which left Massachusetts March 21, 1863, which emblazons heroic service upon its flag at Spottsylvania, North Anna, Cold Harbor, Petersburg, the Weldon Railroad, and the pursuit of Lee.

One of our honored dead was of the First Massachusetts Heavy Artillery, previously Fourteenth Infantry, which, after guarding the forts about Washington for two years, went into the field in 1864, and fought from Spottsylvania to Hatcher's Run. Foxborough men fought also in the Ninth, Seventeenth, Twentieth, Twenty-sixth, Twenty-eighth, Twentyninth, Thirtieth, Thirty-second, Thirty-third, Thirty-fifth, Thirty-eighth, Fortieth, Forty-seventh, Fifty-third, Fifty-fourth, and Fifty-eighth Regiments of Massachusetts; in her First, Second, Third, and Fourth Cavalry; in the Third, Twelfth, Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Sixteenth Massachusetts Batteries; in the First Heavy Artillery, in the Eighteenth and Twentieth Unattached, in the First Rhode Island Artillery and Seventh Rhode Island Infantry, and we had representatives in the regular army, navy, and Veteran Reserve Corps.

Having made up "Our Soldiers' Record," which must necessarily be imperfect in some respects for want of proper time to obtain the required data, we will now refer to the patriotism of the town, as shown by the acts of its citizens.

Almost immediately upon dismissing their fellow-citizens of Company F, Fourth Regiment, to the field of war, the citizens of Foxborough began to consider their duty as patriots in a larger way.

At a town-meeting held May 4, 1861, it was voted that the treasurer shall borrow ten thousand dollars for a war fund, to be paid in five equal annual installments, commencing Oct. 5, 1862. E. P. Carpenter, W. P. Shepard, Otis Cary, J. E. Carpenter, and Elisha White were constituted a committee to purchase clothing and supplies for volunteers, and to meet the various wants of their families.

It was also voted to appropriate three thousand dollars to procure rifles for the members of the rifle company, and E. P. Carpenter was designated as agent to obtain them.

The government refused to accept this company, and it was disbanded.

June 15th it was voted to pay aid to the families of soldiers, in accordance with Chapter 222 of the laws of 1861. E. P. Carpenter, as chairman of the Relief Committee, made a report of his visit to Company F, at Fortress Monroe, Va.

July 22, 1862, one hundred dollars was voted as a bounty to twenty-four persons, who might volunteer under the recent call of President Lincoln, and the bounty was afterwards raised to one hundred and twenty-five dollars.

August 14th the town passed the following vote:

"WHEREAS, The town of Foxborough is desirous of standing shoulder to shoulder with their fellow-citizens of other towns in filling up the second quota of three hundred thousand men ordered by the President of the United States to be drafted for service on or about the 1st of September next; and, whereas, the citizens believe that our old Commonwealth will fill said quota by volunteers without a draft becoming necessary; and, whereas, time is of importance, and the towns are not fully aware of the sum the exigencies of the occasion will require, but have full confidence in the patriotism and judgment of the selectmen; therefore, Resolved, That the selectmen proceed to take such measures as they may deem wise and expedient to enlist such numbers of men as may be required from this town by said draft; and the town pledges to them that such sums of money shall be voted to them hereafter as may be necessary to carry out this vote."

September 20th a vote was passed approving of the selectmen's offer of a bounty of one hundred and fifty dollars for nine-months' men. It was voted also to pay one hundred and fifty dollars to each inhabitant of the town of Foxborough enlisting in Company F of the Fourth Militia Regiment for nine months' service, and to as many others as might be needed to fill the quota. There were two negative votes. The treasurer was authorized to borrow for the purpose a sum not exceeding ten thousand dollars; it was also voted to extend the same aid to the families of drafted men as to volunteers.

March 26, 1864, it was voted to reimburse three thousand nine hundred dollars furnished by individuals to procure the town's quota of volunteers under the calls of Oct. 17, 1863, and Feb. 1, 1864. There was one vote in the negative.

June 18, 1864, it was voted that the treasurer have authority to borrow two thousand eight hundred and seventy-five dollars to pay expenses incurred in filling the town's quota under the call of March 14, 1864.

Aug. 1, 1864, it was voted to raise a sum not exceeding one hundred and twenty-five dollars per man to fill the quota under the call of July 18, 1864, for five hundred thousand men. March 11, 1865, it was voted to appropriate a sum not exceeding three hundred dollars to make up a deficiency in paying one hundred and twenty-five dollars each per man to fill the quota under the call of Dec. 1, 1864, for three hundred thousand men.

Let us not, in this retrospect, forget the labors and untiring sympathy of the women of Foxborough. In the war archives of the commonwealth is a letter dated April 19, 1861,—the very day when the streets of Baltimore drank the patriotic blood of Massachusetts,—addressed to Governor Andrew by Miss Frances Wight (now Mrs. Cogswell), of Foxborough, signed by one hundred young ladies of this place, offering their services as nurses, or to make soldiers' garments, to prepare bandages and lint, to do anything for the cause in their power to do. Governor Andrew, replying, writes, "I accept it as one of the most earnest and sincere of the countless offers of devotion to our old commonwealth and to the cause of the country." He concludes by asking them to "help those who are left behind, and follow those who have gone before with your benedictions, your benefactions, and your prayers." The good work inaugurated by gentle and enthusiastic maidens was, with unabated zeal, carried forward by all our women to the end of the great war for the Union. In this connection we must not forget to mention those young ladies who went out from our midst to teach the freedmen, for they had battles to fight, which, if it did not cost them their lives, required sacrifices that proved both their patriotism and philanthropy.

In an address of this character it were nigh impossible to mention all who were meritorious; but I cannot forbear alluding to those most worthy and patriotic citizens, and faithful and true friends of the soldier,—William H. Thomas, Ezra Carpenter, Richard Carpenter, Edmund Carroll, and Robert Kerr,—who have gone from among us; and, as we hallow the graves of our dead heroes, and erect monuments to their memories, let us not forget their faithful comrades in civil life who did valiant service for the cause for which they laid down their lives. In summing up "our record," I find that 55 men were furnished in 1861 for three years; 24 for three years, and 45 for nine months, in 1862; in 1863-64, 60 for three years, and 23 for one year, including officers and men; the whole number furnished was 276, being a surplus of 13 over the quota. The whole number of different men was 178, equivalent to 100 men each day of the war. Of these, there were 2 majors, 4 captains, 11 lieutenants, 13 sergeants, and 11 corporals, making 41 commissioned and non-commissioned officers, and 137 privates; 21 of this number died in battle or of disease. The amount expended by the town for bounties and enlistment expenses was $21,742.48. The amount of private subscriptions for bounties to volunteers was $7008.33; $1001.13 were spent for clothing and supplies for the soldiers, being for Company F at Fortress Monroe. Large contributions of clothing and supplies were sent through the Foxborough Relief Association and the Sanitary and Christian Commissions. Money contributions in this behalf may be estimated at $500. The material interests of Foxborough declined slightly during the war. In 1860 our population was 2879; in 1865 it was 2769. In 1860 our valuation was $1,287,735; in 1865, $1,284,524.

Never shall we forget the morning when the glorious news came that Gen. Lee's army had surrendered. It was a day of great rejoicing. The bells were rung, the glorious stars and stripes were flung to the breeze, and saluted with cheers and tears, for men and women cried for joy, and thanked God for these glad tidings, that foretold peace and the return of those that had led us to victory. A procession was formed, and marched with stirring music through the principal streets and to the town hall, which was filled. Prayer, earnest and fervent, was offered by Deacon Hewins, and some speaking was "in order;" but there are times when there is more eloquence in silence than in the best of oratory, and this seemed to be the time and occasion.

The war over, the town, in common with almost all its sister communities, began to consider its duty towards a fitting commemoration of the valor of its deceased soldiers, who went forth from it and fell in the service of their country. March 10, 1866, it was voted to refer the article in the warrant, in reference to a monument of the deceased soldiers, to a committee consisting of five,—E. P. Carpenter, William Carpenter, Otis Cary, William H. Thomas, and George T. Ryder,—who made an extended report, March 6, 1867, which was ordered to be printed. The committee recommended the building of a Memorial Hall as the most fitting monument to the valor and patriotism of the dead, whilst it would be at the same time eminently useful to the living. March 16, 1867, it was voted that the committee be instructed to procure plans and estimates in accordance with this report; also a plan for a monument, with estimates for cost of each, and to report on the same. There is, however, no question that the original report (to be found on the town records) substantially settled the question, and secured the building of the useful and substantial structure that adorns our village,—the Memorial Hall. It was erected in 1868, at an expense of some thirteen thousand dollars, including town appropriations and subscriptions, or gifts made by individuals. It was dedicated on Friday, the 17th of June, with impressive ceremonies. Hon. George B. Loring was the orator of the day, and made a most appropriate and eloquent address.

 French and Indian war, in 1747. Capt. Josiah Pratt and Capt. Eleazer Robbins, afterwards citizens of this town, commanded two of the nine companies that left Stoughton, April 19, 1775, upon the Lexington alarm. Uriah Atherton, Nehemiah Carpenter, Jr., and Dominic Dassance were also in the Continental army, either as militia or volunteers. Stephen Boyden and Asa Boyden were also soldiers of 1812; it is probable that still other names are omitted from the tablets in Memorial Hall.

Upon the opposite side of the door-way is inscribed the Congregational Church.—Soon after the destruction of the first meeting-house, erected in 1763, of this society the second one was erected in 1822, and dedicated in January, 1823. It was located near the site of the old edifice, and about one hundred feet northwest of Memorial Rock. It was taken down in 1855. The present church was erected in 1854.

The pastors have been as follows: Thomas Kendal, 1786-1800; Daniel Loring, 1804-6; Thomas Skelton, 1807-16; Thomas Williams, 1816-21; Willard Pierce, 1824-39; Daniel J. Poor, 1840-47; William Barnes, 1847-54; Edmund Y. Garrette, 1854-57; Noadiah S. Dickinson, 1858-69 (died March 27, 1876); Marshall B. Angier, Jan. 29, 1879-80.

The First Baptist Church was built in 1822, and cost twelve hundred dollars; it was located on Elm Street. It was about thirty-six by forty feet, and was the first house of worship in town in which a stove was introduced. It was moved in May, 1838, to the site now occupied by the town house, where it was lengthened twelve feet and a vestry finished in the basement. In 1850 it was sold, and became a part of the steam-mill of V. S. Pond, which was burned Jan. 27, 1876.

The Baptist church edifice, now occupied by the society, stands on School Street. It was built in 1850, at an expense of four thousand two hundred dollars. Improvements were made in 1856 and 1860, and it was enlarged and improved to such an extent as to make it proper to rededicate the building, which was done, in the presence of a large congregation, Jan. 22, 1879.

The pastors have been as follows: Warren Bird, March, 1822, to October, 1828; Timothy C. Tingley, July, 1831, to July, 1837; Silas Ripley, October, 1837, to May, 1841; Edwin B. Bullard, May, 1842, to May, 1843; Silas Ripley, June, 1843, to September, 1854; Isaac Smith, November, 1854, to January, 1867; Cyrus H. Carleton, November, 1867, died Dec. 25, 1868; William H. Spencer, September, 1869, to April, 1879; Millard F. Johnson, Sept. 1, 1879.

The Universalist Church was built in 1843, and is located at the head of Bird Street, fronting the common. It originally had a spire in addition to the belfry, but this was blown off in a severe gale. It has a finished vestry, anterooms, etc., in the basement.

The pastors have been as follows: Charles W. Mellen, 1843-46; E. C. Rogers, 1846-47; W. G. Anderson, 1847-48; Holmes Slade, 1848-53; Lucius Holmes, 1853-57; N. C. Hodgdon, 1858-59; C. A. Bradley, 1860-65; John M. Merrick, 1866-69; James H. Little, 1869-74; James Eastman, 1873-74; Allen P. Folsom, 1874-76; W. W. Hayward, 1876-77; Q. H. Shinn, 1878; Donald Frasher, 1881-83.

Roman Catholic Church.—The first Catholic Church here was erected in 1859, and destroyed by fire March 1, 1862. It was rebuilt in 1873, and burned Sept. 12, 1877. The present church edifice was completed in 1878.

There are also chapels for public worship at East Foxborough and South Foxborough.

The town house was built in 1857, at an expense of $15,496.79, which amount includes the cost of the land. The building committee were E. P. Carpenter, Otis Cary, Henry Hobart, Oliver Carpenter, and F. D. Williams. Vote to build passed March 14, 1857; first town-meeting held in new hall March 29, 1858. This meeting was opened by prayer by Rev. N. S. Dickinson. In 1874 an addition was built for school purposes at expense of $26,244.31. The building is heated by steam from a boiler in the basement, and is lighted by gas. The basement contains the lock-up (three cells), cistern (containing thirty-three thousand gallons of water for use in case of fire), the boiler-room, coal-bins, etc. The first floor of the main structure contains the lower town hall, thirty-six by fifty-four feet, with anterooms, town officers' office (with ante-room), in which is situated the safe recently erected at an expense of six hundred and fifty dollars, second primary school-room, public entrance to town hall, and ticket-office. The second floor is occupied by the town hall, fifty by seventy-five feet, with two ante-rooms, each twelve by twenty feet. It has a platform fifteen by twenty-six feet, and gallery seventeen by forty-five feet. The hall and gallery seat eight hundred persons. The school-house addition, so called, is occupied on the first floor by the first primary and second intermediate schools, on the second floor by the grammar and first intermediate schools. Each of these schools occupies a room thirty-five by twenty-four feet, furnished with the most improved school-furniture, and has commodious clothes-rooms, sink-rooms, and water-closets connected. On the second floor are also two dressing-rooms, each fourteen by fifteen feet (with water-closets), connected with the platform of the town hall. The upper floor is occupied by the high school,¹ which has a room fifty feet square, with commodious clothes-rooms and water-closets. The number of children which can be seated in these six school-rooms is over three hundred.

The town house is situated on elevated ground, having a large common in front of and between it and South Street. Foxborough steam fire-engine house is situated a few rods northeasterly of the addition. Cocasset engine-house is similarly situated, southeasterly of the building.²

The Union Straw-Works stands on Wall Street, and occupies, with machine-shop, foundry, gasometer, bleach-house and yards, stables, etc., about two hundred and ten thousand feet of land. Opposite are the Veranda and Hamlet Houses, boarding-houses owned by the proprietors of the Union Straw-Works. The expense of building these works, including the addition built in 1856, exceeded one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. Connected with these works, and owned by the same corporation,—the Union and Bay State Manufacturing Company,—are the “West Branch,” a large three-story building on Main Street (formerly the manufactory of Foxborough Jewelry Company), and the “South Branch” (known as “Nason’s Factory” when built, in 1810), situated on Water Street. These buildings are managed by William T. Cook & Co. (W. T. Cook and L. Porter Faught) for the corporation.

The Old Carpenter House was the first building erected in the Centre. It stood on a leading way off South Street, and near the town house. It was built in 1749–50 by Nehemiah Carpenter, who came to this place from Rehoboth. It afterwards served as an inn, and was known as the “Old Tavern.” It was torn down in 1880.

The Old Stone Factory, or Foxborough Laundry, is located in the section known as “New State,” on Granite Street, at the head of Cocasset Pond. It was erected about 1825 by Simon Pettee, and was for many years used for the manufacture of cotton cloth.

Memorial Hall was erected by the town in 1868, in the old burying-ground near the common, at a cost of thirteen thousand dollars. It is built of pebble-stone with granite trimmings, with slated roof and dome, on which is a large figure of a Union soldier with arms at rest. The interior is handsomely finished in oiled chestnut, the sides not occupied by the memorial tablets being fitted with cases containing the books of the Public Library. Over the entrance is a marble tablet inscribed, “Soldiers’ Memorial. Erected by the Town, A.D. 1868,” with bronze coat of arms of the United States at the right and of Massachusetts at the left. At the right of the entrance is the marble tablet with names of Revolutionary soldiers, and on the left the tablet with Foxborough’s roll of honor; immediately opposite, and surmounted by a large figure of the Goddess of Liberty in colored glass, is the tablet containing the names of “Our Honored Dead.”

The Warren House was one of the first houses of the modern style of architecture.

The Howe monument stands in rear of Memorial Hall. It is inscribed, “This monument was erected by Dr. N. Miller to the memory of his friend, Mr. ZADOCK HOWE, who died 1819, æt. 77, and who fought under the Great WASHINGTON. To those who view, before you’re gone, be pleased to put this cover on.” The cover referred to is a cast-iron urn, surmounted by an acorn dated 1810, and there is set in the urn a slate tablet, inscribed, “The grave is waiting for your body, and Christ is waiting for your soul; O may this be your cheerful study to be prepared when death doth call.” This slab and urn having been broken, it was replaced by the Centennial Committee, the original acorn being retained. The granite capstone is inscribed, “Wrought by the deceased, 1810,” and “Repaired by his son, Z. Howe, M.D., 1841.”

Change in Boundaries.—Since the incorporation of the town the following changes in its boundary-lines, etc., have been made,—viz., June 20, 1793, county of Norfolk established, thus removing Foxborough from Suffolk County. Feb. 3, 1819, boundary-line between Wrentham and Foxborough established. Feb. 7, 1831, part of Wrentham annexed to Foxborough. Jan. 30, 1833, boundary-line between Sharon and Foxborough established. March 27, 1833, and March 28, 1834, part of Foxborough annexed to Walpole. Feb. 28, 1850, part of Sharon annexed to Foxborough.

The fire department consists of steam fire-engine and hand-engine, hose, three carriages and supply wagon, two engine-houses.

St. Alban’s Lodge, A. F. and A. M., was first instituted in Wrentham in 1818. Charter returned to Grand Lodge in 1844. Reorganized in American Hall, Foxborough, in December, 1855, by fourteen members, since which over two hundred and fifty have joined it. Since reorganization, four flourishing lodges have been set off from it.

Historical Items.¹—“Oct. 20, 1635, about sixty men, women, and children, with their property of all kinds, left Dorchester for the valley of the Connecticut,—or Quonticut, as it was then called,—which had been described as extremely fertile. Among these were Mr. Rossiter, Mr. Grant, Mr. Smith, Mr. Carroll, Mr. Morse, Mr. Leonard, Capt. Clapp, and others. A portion of this number found a well-watered place, about twenty-five miles southwest of Dorchester, in what was afterwards known as Stoughtonham, and here they decided to remain.” (From Baker’s “Historical Collection of Massachusetts.”)

Leonards, Morses, and Clapps were names found among earliest settlers. Three Morse brothers were living on the stream now known as Rumford River, about a mile from East Foxborough village, long before Foxborough Centre had a resident.

The Centennial Celebration.—The centennial of the incorporation of the town of Foxborough was celebrated June 29, 1878, with imposing ceremonies. Hon. Otis Cary was president of the day, and Hon. E. P. Carpenter delivered the historical oration.

The Foxborough Times, in referring to this event, says,—

"The close of the first century of the corporate existence of our beautiful town was most appropriately and successfully observed, after a long and laborious work of preparation, on Saturday and Sunday last.

"That the one hundredth birthday of a town which has made the progress during that period that this has done should be joyously and thankfully observed, with a certain degree of pride and self-commendation, is not to be wondered at.

"One hundred years ago the residents of Foxborough were but few in number, and they were of a poorer class, even of those poverty-stricken times. They had of town property one small church building, without doors, and with unglazed windows, used as a place of worship and for the storage of powder.

"Their principal industry was the tilling of the soil; yet a few hoop-poles and considerable charcoal were produced and exchanged with the citizens of larger places for the few necessities of life which could not be produced from our own soil, such as new rum, molasses, and codfish.

"The number of inhabitants of this newly-organized town did not exceed four hundred and fifty.

"At the present time we have a population of nearly thirty-two hundred souls; a town house that cost nearly twenty-five thousand dollars, with a school-house addition worth as much more; six other school-houses, valued at from six hundred to two thousand dollars each; a thirteen thousand dollar memorial hall, with an excellent public library of nearly three thousand volumes therein; two commodious engine-houses; fire apparatus (with an able department to use it), which cost not less than ten thousand dollars, and which is worth, when it is considered the amount of property it has saved to our citizens, a much larger sum. We have an excellent and nearly self-supporting town farm. Our church societies, four in number, have each a convenient church edifice. Our common, at the Centre, is a prettily laid out green, with fence, walks, and shade trees, second to none in the State. We have an assessed valuation of over one and a half millions of dollars; an industry which tends to cultivate the taste of our citizens for that which is neat and tasty, that stops not its refining influences at the portals of the manufactory where they are inculcated, but they are carried into the homes and every-day life of our citizens, causing them to vie each with his neighbor in prettily arranging and keeping his grounds and buildings, thus making our town, as a whole, so neat as to give it the title of 'the Gem of Norfolk County.' We refer, of course, to the straw business,—an industry which has given employment in a single year to 3291 persons, and paid for labor in this town and vicinity $399,676.15. It has produced 2,473,819 hats, caps, etc., in one year, valued at cost at $1,493,986.40; and that we have other industries will not be doubted by those who witnessed the trade procession of Saturday. Our citizens are, on the whole, an intelligent, energetic, and generous people, well-to-do in this world's goods, and above the average communities in morality. Our town is noted for its enterprise and liberality, which caused people to expect from it a celebration of its centennial anniversary which should be second to none, and one which would be an honor to the town and its citizens."

Population.—In 1790, 640; in 1800, 779; in 1810, 870; in 1820, 1004; in 1830, 1166; in 1836, 1416; in 1840, 1294; in 1850, 1978; in 1855, 2570; in 1860, 2879; in 1865, 2778; in 1870, 3057; in 1875, 3168; in 1880, 2954; in 1883, 3000.

Statistical.—Population, 3000. Valuation, $1,500,000. Average rate of taxation in five years but $12.45 per $1000. Public property, consisting of town house and school building ($40,000), fire apparatus and engine-houses ($10,000), memorial hall and public library—2500 volumes—($17,500), town farm ($4000), school-houses ($8000), and other property, making total value over $80,000. Town debt but $15,000, funded at 4 per cent. Excellent streets, with sidewalks lined with beautiful shade trees, graded schools, public library, liberal supply of well-stocked stores, good postal, railroad, telegraphic, telephonic, and hotel accommodations.

Distance from Boston 25 miles, from Providence 20 miles, from Taunton 15 miles, Attleborough 9 miles. Boston and Providence and northern division of Old Colony Railroads pass through the town, giving unexcelled freight facilities. Freight rates the same as from Boston. Nine passenger trains daily to Boston.

Societies.—Royal Arch Chapter, Masonic Lodge, Knights of Honor, Good Templars, Order of Golden Cross, G. A. R. Post,—nearly all being flourishing and prosperous and occupying commodious halls. Foxborough Brass Band, organized 1844; Foxborough Savings-Bank, incorporated 1855.

Public Halls.—Town hall seats 600, lower town hall seats 200, Samaritan Hall seats 300, Union Hall seats 100.

Among the business enterprises now located in this town are the manufacture of straw hats (the largest straw-factory in the world), felt hats, sewing-machines, leather-board, packing-boxes, lumber, paper boxes, tin-ware, stoves, boilers, hollow-ware, stereoscopic views, slates, clothing, millinery goods, harnesses, carriages, baskets (2), toilet and common soaps (4), boots and shoes (6), brooms, music-clamps, dental goods, extracts and medicines (3), cider and glue, two iron foundries, planing- and saw-mill, steam laundry, steam printing-office, wool scouring-mill, two grist-mills, two granite-quarries, and others. Other products are lumber, wood, hoop-poles, charcoal, blacksmith work, florists' and green-house goods, ice, meats, cranberries, butter, milk, garden and farm produce.

Foxborough is a growing village, one of the prettiest and healthiest in the State, with town house, school-houses, engine-houses, memorial hall, public library, excellent fire department, and other public property valued at nearly one hundred thousand dollars, with a debt of but sixteen thousand dollars (funded at four per cent.), and the rate of taxation is small and constantly decreasing; situated but twenty-five miles from Boston, with seven trains to that city each day; freights to all points the same as from Boston.

The Union straw-works, the largest straw shop in the world, is located here, and residents are desirous of having new industries located in the town, and will encourage and assist any which may come.

The manufactory of the Rotary Shuttle Sewing Machine has just been established here, and other new enterprises are under way, all of which insures the growth and continued prosperity of the town.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

ISAAC SMITH, M.D.

Isaac Smith, born March 5, 1809, in Milton, Mass., was son of Lemuel and Mercy (Sumner) Smith. Isaac Smith, grandfather of Dr. Isaac, was probably a native of Bridgewater, as that was the residence of his father, but passed most of his life in Randolph, engaged in agriculture. Lemuel, his son, was a shoemaker. He had six sons and one daughter,—(1) Lemuel, Jr., who died aged twenty-three years. (2) Clarissa, she married first Mr. Ham, of Lisbon, Me., and second, Mr. Horton, of Gloucester. She is now a widow, has one child living, a son, Albert Ham. (3) Isaac. (4) Edmund, he was a physician in Boston for many years, where he died, and is buried at Milton, his native place. (5) Albert is a wholesale boot and shoe dealer in New York City. (6) Luther N. married in Lisbon, Me., moved to Aroostook County, and died there of heart-disease. He was a farmer. (7) Francis A. married a Miss Bosworth, of Plympton, and resides in Stoughton; is a book-maker. Isaac Smith had only such educational advantages as the common schools of his native village afforded. After his twelfth year he left the paternal home to battle with the world and win such fame and fortune as might fall to his lot. He had only a bright mind, a brave heart, determined will, and willing hands; he shrank from no labor, however distasteful, that would help him in his onward and upward course. He first hired out as a chore-boy and general farm laborer, living two years with one family; then he went to Stoughton, and obtained employment in a boot and shoe manufactory as a cutter. His industry and perseverance soon won for him the confidence of his employer, and in the absence of the regular manager he acted as superintendent. Here he remained five years. During this time every spare hour and moment was devoted to study. When he was nineteen years of age he went to South Reading (now Wakefield) Academy. Here he continued his study for two years, working out of school hours to pay his board. In the course of these two years he was authorized to preach, and was called as pastor of the Baptist Church at East Stoughton. His means were very limited, and he accepted the call, and at twenty-two years of age he was settled as a pastor. His parish being small, the young minister had here ample time and opportunity for the continuance of his beloved studies. He remained in charge of this pastorate for twenty-three years, making many and strong friends. In the session of 1850 he represented the town of Stoughton in the State Legislature. His predilection had always been for the study of medicine, and, after having pursued a scientific and classical course, he commenced his study with special reference to the practice of medicine. Dr. Smith did what probably no one else has ever attempted,—he took the college catalogue, and with that as his guide he purchased the necessary text-books, and completed the entire course of study as set forth therein, and with such success that Dartmouth College granted him the degree of A.M.

His early medical education, like his other attainments, resulted mainly from private application, with occasional assistance in the society of his father-in-law, Dr. Macomber, and subsequently a full course of study with Dr. Haines, a graduate of Castleton Medical College, Vermont. After several years' assiduous and earnest study, he passed examination and obtained the degree of M.D. from the University of Vermont. In 1854 he accepted a call to preach from Foxborough, Mass., and came to that place as pastor of the Baptist Church, where he officiated for twelve years, when his voice failed, and he gave up the ministry and adopted the practice of medicine, which, for the last seventeen years, has been his work. About the time of his entering the ministry, July 30, 1832, he married Angelina Macomber, of Marshfield. (Mrs. Smith's paternal grandmother was descended from Peregrine White. Her maternal grandfather, Gad Hitchcock, was a physician, and a graduate of Harvard College in 1768; he was also a surgeon in the Continental army. Her great-grandfather, Gad Hitchcock, Sr., was an Armenian minister, and graduated at Harvard in 1743. Her father, Charles Macomber, was a physician and a Harvard graduate in 1799. The Hitchcocks and Macomers were both of Scottish origin, Macomber being a Gaelic name, signifying son of the counselor.) Their children were, (1) Alonzo, who died in infancy; (2) Angelina M., died aged six years; (3) Charles M., now pastor of Spring Hill Baptist Church, of Somerville, where he has been for thirteen years. He received degree of D.D. from Judson University, Arkansas; has one child, W. French, a Harvard graduate, who, after finishing his college course, went to Germany, where he continued his studies for two years, and received the degree of "D.Ph." from Göttingen University. He is now at Boston, as Massachusetts State assayer. He has one child, Inez. (4) Isaac, Jr., graduated at Dartmouth, receiving degrees of A.M. and M.D. He married Annie L., daughter of Oliver Carpenter, and had one child, Bertie C., now at Brooklyn, N. Y. He was a prominent surgeon and physician of Fall River, and but a short time prior to his death (Jan. 20, 1881) received an appointment as Professor of Clinical Surgery in the Boston College of Physicians and Surgeons.

Dr. Isaac Smith is a self-made man of the highest order. His energy and perseverance have been rewarded by both a high social position and sound financial standing. In all the relations of life he has done his work well. His strong adherence to friends, and chivalric, steadfast, and tender devotion to wife, children, and a large circle of friends, have often been marked, and caused him to be revered by many who will long remember his pleasant and instructive words. He has honored the positions he has held, and from the stand-point of a hale old age, can look back upon a laborious, useful, and well-spent life.

JAMES EDSON CARPENTER.

James Edson Carpenter, the eldest son of Edson Carpenter and Sarah Reed (Jones) Carpenter, grandson of Peter Carpenter, and great-grandson of Nehemiah Carpenter (the first resident of Foxborough Centre), was born in Foxborough, in a building then standing where the "Cocasset House" now is, Jan. 30, 1829. His great-grandfather, Benjamin Jones, was a soldier in the French and Indian war.

An ambition to obtain knowledge was early fostered by his mother, who had been a school-teacher, and was of a naturally studious family. From instruction obtained from her and from the public school he became fitted for Day's Academy, Wrentham, at the age of twelve. He attended this academy two years and a Mansfield school one term, and then became a clerk in his father's store, having progressed in mathematics and Latin beyond the point now expected of a high school graduate. The above completed his elementary instruction, yet he never ceased to be a student, becoming, by attentive study at leisure moments, a proficient Greek and Latin reader.

He remained in his father's employ until he was twenty-two years of age, during which time he showed abilities as salesman and book-keeper of no mean order. He edited and published, in 1849, the first local newspaper, the Salmagundi Journal. In 1852 he opened "country stores" in South Walpole and East Foxborough; continuing these but little more than a year, he returned to his father's store, and there continued until 1855, at which time he built the American Hall building and devoted his entire attention to public business.

In early years he was a pronounced Whig, and so remained until the organization of the American party, in which he was one of the first to be enrolled, and in behalf of which he was a zealous worker. He introduced and advocated its principles in his native town, and exerted himself in obtaining for it numerical strength and party power. He tenaciously held to the tenets of this party, and in 1857 assisted in organizing the order of American Phœnix, which, it was hoped, would continue the work in which the "American" was engaged when the more important question of abolition of slavery caused it to suspend its labors. He joined the Republican party at its formation, and worked with it until the Greeley campaign; he then became an "Independent," and so remained until a few years prior to his death, when he returned to the Republicans, voting for such of their nominees as were total abstinence men, and "scratching" all who were not. As a nominee for Presidential elector on the Greeley ticket, he received the largest number of votes cast in this State for any candidate on that ticket.

He was always opposed to the Prohibition party, although for the greater part of his life a strict total abstinence man in theory and practice. Until engaging in business in Washington, in 1864, he never used liquor or tobacco in any form, but he then and there contracted habits which afterwards contributed largely towards his adversities. In 1876 he became interested in the Temperance Reform movement, and continued an earnest worker therein until his last sickness. He was president of the Foxborough Good Samaritan (Reform) Club several terms, and to his exertions the club was indebted for its hall, and the town for the improvement of an unoccupied school-house, now the Samaritan Hall building.

While in the Senate, to which he was elected when twenty-five years of age, he decided to study law, and entered the office of Hon. S. C. Maine. He was admitted to the bar of the Superior Court in 1857, and to that of the United States Circuit Court in 1867. From the date of his admission to the beginning of his last sickness he had a large practice, and at one time had offices in the cities of Boston, New York, and Washington. His services in suits where accounts were in controversy, and where sound legal knowledge was demanded, were valuable, and his opinions sought and respected by his brother lawyers.

He was first elected upon the School Committee in 1852, and he served on that board nearly half the time during the remainder of his life. As town clerk he served from 1855 to 1861. He also served many years on the auditing and minor committees, and as moderator of town-meetings. He was in the State Senate in 1855 and 1856, serving on the Committees on Claims, on Bills in the third reading, and as chairman on the Committee on Prisons. In 1870 he was a member of the House of Representatives, serving on the Committee of Probate and Chancery. He held a commission as justice of the peace, and of the quorum, and sat as magistrate on many cases, but ceased to act as trial justice when the prohibitory law was enacted. He was postmaster during the administration of President Lincoln, and assistant postmaster several years previous. He was one of the incorporators, and for many years treasurer, of the Foxborough Savings-Bank and of the Foxborough Loan Fund and Building Association. He also represented a number of life and fire insurance companies as agent. In 1858 he purchased a right from the owners of the Morse patent to construct a telegraph line from Mansfield to Franklin, and organized the Massachusetts Central Telegraph Company to build and operate it; the line was built as far as Foxborough, and an office opened in the American Hall building. In 1862 he was one of the most interested and persistent in obtaining a charter for the Foxborough Branch Railroad Company, and was a director and clerk of the corporation until after it had obtained additional powers and become the Mansfield and Framingham Railroad Company.

About this time he became interested in patent-rights, and in addition to his other business instituted, and for several years managed, the National Inventors' Union and the New England Gallery of Patents. He acted as director and treasurer of no less than thirteen corporations or associations having for their object the manufacturing of patented articles. In 1870 he formed a company to manufacture straw goods in Foxborough, and a charter was issued to the Foxborough Straw-Works, but actual business was never commenced.

He was deeply interested in Freemasonry, and was one of those who were instrumental in the building of the Masonic Hall. He was a member of St. Albans Lodge, Keystone Chapter, Pawtucket Council, Royal and Select Masters, Lafayette Lodge of Perfection, and of Boston Commandery of Knights Tem-plar. He was a warden of St. Albans Lodge six terms, and the Master of the lodge three years. In 1859 he was a member of St. John's Encampment of Knights Templar, and accompanied it on its pilgrimage to Richmond, Va. In 1863 he was a member of the Union League, and assisted in spreading its influence.

To those few who were intimately acquainted with him he was genial and unreserved, entertaining and instructive; but he was naturally reserved and studious, more inclined to seek the companionship of his library of standard works than that of "society," while the loss of his property added to his retiring and reserved demeanor. He had at one time acquired a moderate fortune, but he lost all through investments in petroleum stock and advances to the Gilmore Petroleum Company, of which Governor Gilmore, of New Hampshire, was president and he the treasurer. The last few years of his life were spent in an unsuccessful attempt to retrieve his financial losses.

He had two brothers—Thomas Williams C., died 1872, aged thirty-six, and Francis Augustus C., died 1867, aged twenty-four—and two sisters—Sarah Isabel C., died in 1835, aged one year, and Mary Palmer C., died in 1851, aged thirteen. His youngest brother, after graduating at Harvard College, entered his office and was reading law until removed by death.

Nov. 9, 1851, he was married to Rowena Augusta, daughter of Jeremiah and Anna (Carroll) Boyden, of South Walpole. Her grandmother was the granddaughter of Nehemiah Carpenter, who was his ancestor, as above stated. They had four children, all of whom are now living. Robert Winthrop C., born June 4, 1853, studied law with his father and was admitted to the bar of the Supreme Court on attaining his majority, June 4, 1874. He now practices law, is a justice of the peace, and commissioner of insolvency for Norfolk County. Charles Edson C., born Feb. 24, 1857, is a clerk in Attleborough; Eugene Maine C., born Oct. 14, 1859, is a printer in Foxborough; Anna Isabel C., born June 6, 1868, is attending Foxborough High School.

His mother died in Providence, R. I., Aug. 10, 1883, aged eighty years and fourteen days. His father and widow still reside in Foxborough.

He was confined to his house by his disease nearly a year prior to his death, and died in Foxborough, Jan. 30, 1880, aged fifty-one years, and was buried with Masonic ceremonies, in Rock Hill Cemetery, Feb. 1, 1880.

THE HODGES FAMILY.

On the enrollment list of Taunton in 1643 appears the name of William Hodges. Tradition says he was one of three brothers, William, John, and Richard, who came to America as early as 1633. John and Richard settled in Salem, and William in Taunton. William is mentioned by Governor Winthrop as commander of a ship in voyages to and from England in connection with Capt. John Gallop, whose daughter, Esther, afterwards married Henry, son of William. William died in 1654, leaving two sons, John and Henry. From John and Henry have descended the two great branches of the Hodges family in Southern Massachusetts.

Henry, born in 1652, who married Esther Gallop in 1674, is ancestor of the Hodges family of Norfolk County. According to his will, proven in 1717, he left eleven children,—William, John, Joseph, Henry, Benjamin, Ephraim, Mary, Esther, Charity, Elizabeth, and Abigail. His son Henry married Sarah Leonard, and died in 1735, in his seventieth year, leaving four sons and several daughters,—Josiah, Eliphalet (who came from Taunton and settled in Sharon, now East Foxborough, on the land where Marcus P. Hodges now lives, between 1738 and 1745), James, Henry, Anna (married George Williams), Abigail (married Mr. Harvey), Betsey (married Benjamin Wilbur), Eliphalet, born 1712, married Abigail Fillebrown, of Mansfield; their daughter, Isabel, married John Everett, of Wrentham, and had children,—George, Eliphalet, Sally, Stephen, John and Abigail. Josiah, son of Henry and Sarah (Leonard) Hodges, was born 1710, married Mary Cooledge, of Watertown, and died in 1798. His wife died in 1808, in her eighty-seventh year. Their children were Benjamin, Lydia, Phoebe, Molly, Sarah, Betsey, and Josiah. (Henry, grandson of the first Henry, well known as Capt. Hodges, lived in Taunton, married Mary, daughter of Joseph Eddy, and died in 1779, aged fifty-five, leaving six sons,—Zephaniah, Spencer, Henry, Elkanah, James, and Abiathar. Spencer, son of the third Henry, married Mercy, daughter of Nathan Dean, and had children,—Spencer, Elkanah, Otis, Lydia, and Mary. Spencer, Jr., married Esther, daughter of Swift Payson, of Foxborough; Elkanah married Trulove Clark, who now lives in Foxborough, aged ninety-two years; Otis married Virginia Clark; Lydia married Leonard White; Mary married Melzar Skinner, of Mansfield, and removed to New York. Spencer, Jr., left three children,—Spencer P., Esther C., and Henry. Elkanah left one son, Albert, and one daughter, Elvira, who married Sanford Leonard, of Foxborough. Otis left two sons, George and Henry.) Benjamin, son of Josiah and Mary C. Hodges, born in 1745 and died in 1814, was a farmer, and cleared and prepared for cultivation a large tract of land near the present Hodges homestead. He married, first, Esther, daughter of Robert and Ruth (Fisher) Allen, of Walpole. She was born in 1749 and died in 1780. Their children were Sewall, Daniel, and Esther. He married, second, Miriam, daughter of Josiah Pratt, of Foxborough, born 1755, died 1825. Their children were Rachael and Hannah (twins), Joseph, James (who died in infancy), Benjamin, and Annie. Sewall and Daniel located on the ancestral domain, where they always lived as prosperous farmers, and died within twelve days of each other. (Daniel married Nabbe Richards; Esther married Moses Richards; Rachael married Solomon Richards; Hannah married Thomas Billings, of Canton; Joseph married Nancy Hodges, and moved to Belmont, Me.; and Annie married Amos Barden, of Walpole.)

SEWALL HODGES, son of Benjamin and Esther (Allen) Hodges (William¹, Henry², Henry³, Josiah⁴, Benjamin⁵, Sewall⁶), was born Feb. 3, 1773. His education was obtained under the difficulties of a hundred years ago in the little old school-house at East Foxborough, whose broad, open fireplace, big stones for andirons, and big logs for burning, remained longer in memory than the lessons acquired. He married, first, Sally, daughter of John and Unity (Shepard) Billings, of Canton, Nov. 6, 1805. She was born Feb. 27, 1778, and died May 1, 1816. They had four children,—Sally, married James Daniels, of Foxborough; Mary, married Job Sherman (see his biography); Alfred married Jerusha Comey, died in 1875, leaving two daughters,—Martha L. and Emma B.; and Orna, who married Allen C. Doolittle, has one daughter, Sarah B. Mr. Hodges married, second, Judith, daughter of Seth and Mary (Harkness) Sherman, of Bellingham, Nov. 6, 1817. She was born Sept. 17, 1784, and died April 30, 1862. They had six children,—William S. (died aged two years); Abigail S., married Richard Battey, of Smithfield, R. I., died Nov. 21, 1882; Ruth A., married, first, Solomon Sherman; had three children,—Ellery C., Elbridge G., twins, and Louis A., who died in 1878; second, married S. C. Shepard, of Mansfield; Judith S., married Asa Stone, of Providence; Anne Maria, married Zelotes Buck, of Clinton, and has three children,—Elma M., Abby H., and Edward E.; David S., died aged four years. In 1834, Mr. Hodges built that part of the Boston and Providence Railroad passing through his farm. After the double track was laid, Oct. 22, 1849, while crossing the track he was struck by a train, and so severely injured that his death occurred in a few hours.

Mr. Hodges has worthily borne the character of his ancestor, the first Henry, who was called "Honest Henry," and, like his immediate predecessor, has been an honorable, industrious, and valuable citizen. He was kind and indulgent in his family relations, a strong friend, firm in principle, and exemplary in conduct. He stood in advance in great moral movements, signing the first temperance pledge in town. He was ever a friend to the poor and to the slave. He cast the first "Free-Soil" vote in the town of Sharon, willing to be deemed radical in the consciousness of being right. He was of a reflective turn of mind, and delighted in studying the creative forces of nature, and tracing all things from cause to effect. He was an appreciative reader, and contributed to establish and support a circulating library in Foxborough in order to obtain the reading matter he desired. He was a member of the first parish church in Sharon, was a cordial friend and supporter of the Rev. Jonathan Whittaker, and when his pastorate terminated by a schism in the church and society, Mr. Hodges following his convictions of right and duty, became a member of the Friends' Society in Mansfield. All of his children, beside the common school, attended a Friends' school in Providence. One of his daughters writes concerning him: "He was the teacher of my lifetime. Whatever good there is in me I owe to him. He was truly a religious man, for few more than he revered the Bible. Many of his explanations of texts are still fresh in memory. His views were spiritually in advance of the age in which he lived."

BENJAMIN HODGES, son of Benjamin and Miriam (Pratt) Hodges (William¹, Henry², Henry³, Josiah⁴, Benjamin⁵, Benjamin⁶), was born April 11, 1789. He was an agriculturist from childhood on the homestead of his father, was educated at the common schools of his native town, and during all the long years of his quiet, uneventful life seldom left his native town or his ancestral acres. He married, Nov. 8, 1811, first, Hannah, daughter of Josiah and Susan (Morse) Talbot, of Sharon. They had six children,—Benjamin F. (married Julia Dassance, and resides in Chelmsford; their children are Julia A., Mary J., Anna M., Jesse, and Francis), Emeline (married Stephen L. Boyden, of Foxborough; their children were Charles L., died in the army of the Rebellion, Hannah E., Benjamin F., of Foxborough, Amos J., resides in Philadelphia), Lucy (married Asahel Dean, of Foxborough; has two children, Marcus P. and Lucy A.), Lewis (died young), Marcus P. (who lives on the old homestead), and Catharine F. (married Nahum Dunbar, resides in Chelsea, and has three children, Mary F., Charles G., and Anna). Mrs. Hannah Hodges died Jan. 19, 1838, in her fiftieth year. Mr. Hodges married, second, Susannah Sumner, of Foxborough. She died Sept. 1, 1877, in her eightieth year, leaving no children.

Unostentatious and unassuming, Mr. Hodges was ever a good citizen, of sterling honesty and uprightness, kind in his family relations, and very genial and social in his associations with all coming within his sphere. By persistent industry and steady economy he acquired a competence while health and vigor were vouchsafed him, and did not withhold the enjoyment of the fruit of his labor until old age came on. He joined the Congregational Church in Sharon, and afterwards became a member of the Congregational Church in Foxborough, the meetings of which he attended during the many years of his life. Always temperate, he took care of his health, and was a well-preserved man, retaining his faculties in a remarkable degree to an unusually advanced age. He was much interested in and enjoyed especially the annual gatherings of the Hodges family at the old homestead. Here for twenty-two successive years from fifty to eighty descendants of Josiah Hodges met in social reunion, usually accompanied by a picnic on the lawn west of the "old house." Of this merry circle none were happier than Benjamin Hodges. The last gathering occurred the year previous to his death, which took place Dec. 9, 1882, in his ninety-third year.

We are indebted to Mrs. Mary H. Sherman for the ancestral history and material for this sketch.

JOE SHERMAN.

Joe Sherman, son of John and Polly (Skinner) Sherman, a lineal descendant of Philip Sherman, the first American ancestor and eighth in line, was born in Foxborough, May 15, 1805. The following ancestral history was furnished by Mrs. Mary H. Sherman, of Foxborough: "The earliest records I find of the Sherman family are the names David, Nathan, El-nathan, and Joseph. David had sons,—Jacob, John, Nehemiah, and Elkanah. John had children, Job, John, Lucy, Charity, and Elizabeth. Job, the son of John and Ruth (Allen) Sherman, was born in Rochester, Mass., in 1746, married Elizabeth, daughter of Experience and Hannah (Nichols) Holmes, and died in Foxborough in 1837, aged ninety years and four months, surviving his wife twenty years. He lived several years in Middleborough, and in the spring of 1781 came to the south part of Foxborough, where he bought a tract of land, for which he paid in Continental money. He built a log cabin, and, with only a dog for company, made his improvements and cultivated the land during the first season. He had no fences, his faithful dog protecting his crops from the foraging herds, then permitted to roam at will through the forests. In the autumn he moved his family of wife and six children into the log cabin, which was their home until he built a frame house in 1784. They experienced all the trials incident to a pioneer life. In the winter of 1789 snows fell so deep that for three weeks they were cut off from all communication with the outside world, and their first visitor was a Mr. Freeman, who came on snowshoes from the house where Francis Carpenter lived in 1870. This house of Mr. Sherman's is now occupied by his grandson, Obadiah Sherman. Job Sherman was a member of the Society of Friends, and probably the first meeting of that society in the county was held in his house, April 15, 1795. The children of Job and Elizabeth Sherman were Susanna, Obadiah, Job, John, Stephen, George, Experience H., and Elizabeth. They received only a common-school education, yet three of them, Obadiah, Stephen, and John, were qualified for teachers. Obadiah is still remembered by several as a teacher of considerable note for many successive winters. Five of the sons located, lived, and died on or near the old homestead. The two daughters never left the old home, lived to a good old age, and died unmarried. John, the third son of Job and Elizabeth Holmes Sherman, born Dec. 2, 1775, married Polly, daughter of Solomon Skinner, of Mansfield. They both died in 1842, leaving eight children,—Mary, John, Laura, Job, Albert G., Eliza, Solomon, and James H.; none are living except Job. Albert G. and James H. died in California; Albert G. left a son, William Russell. Eliza married Jerry A. Olney, lived in Putnam, Conn., died July 15, 1883, leaving five children,—Louisa B., Albert S., Ellen M., Adelaide E. and Adeline A. (twins). John Sherman, son of Job, was a man of sterling worth; in proof of which we give the following extract from a town report and letter from the town clerk: "John Sherman was the seventh generation from Philip Sherman. He early exhibited a great love for reading and study, and notwithstanding his limited means for obtaining an education, acquired extensive information. He thus became a wise counselor and a useful citizen. He served as selectman in Foxborough fourteen years in succession, and was looked upon by all as one of the first advisers in town affairs. He was three years representative in the General Court, and was frequently chosen school committee-man, and served on other important committees in town. He died July 12, 1842, aged sixty-six years. 'To the family of the late John Sherman, Esq.; Respected Friends; In compliance with a vote of the town of Foxboro, I communicate to you a copy of resolutions adopted in town-meeting July 18, 1842, by the inhabitants of Foxboro in town-meeting assembled. Resolved, that we regard as especially impressive that Divine Providence which has recently and suddenly removed an estimable citizen, and, as it were, a father, from our town. Resolved, that the public services and private virtues of John Sherman, Esq., lately deceased, are held by us in respectful remembrance, and that we present to his bereaved family the assurance of our affectionate condolence.' With like sentiments and regard, I am yours sincerely, Warren Bird, Town Clerk."

JOB SHERMAN obtained his education at the district schools of Foxborough, where he has always resided. He served an apprenticeship of four years with Gen. Shepherd Leach in his iron-foundries at Foxborough, Chelmsford, and Walpole. His remuneration was one hundred dollars each year and board, also an allowance of one-half pint of rum or molasses each day. He refused both. He was employed in iron-foundries for several years after his apprenticeship. In 1830 he married Jane W. Ellis, who died in December, 1831, leaving a daughter (Jane E.), who died in her fourteenth year. Mr. Sherman married again, 1841, Mary, daughter of Sewall and Sally (Billings) Hodges, of Sharon (now East Foxborough). They have had four children,—Herbert E., Frank I., John H. (deceased), and Albert H. (deceased). Herbert E. married Adeline A., daughter of Jerry A. and Eliza (Sherman) Olney, of Putnam, Conn., in 1875; they now reside in Providence, R. I., and have two children,—Stella L. and Janet H. Frank I. married Clara M., daughter of W. A. Crowley, of Mansfield, and resides on the "home-place;" they have two children,—Jessie and Arthur L. Both Herbert and Frank have had good school advantages, and are well-skilled civil engineers.

After his work in foundries Mr. Sherman returned to Foxborough, and has ever since been a busy and successful farmer. He and his brother Solomon owned the homestead together. Each built a new house, and until Solomon's death carried on the business in company. Solomon married Ruth A., daughter of Sewall Hodges, died in 1870, and left three sons,—Ellery C. and Elbridge G. (twins), and Louis A., who died in 1878.

Job Sherman has well sustained the reputation of his ancestors. His life has been an uneventful and quiet one. He never has traveled one hundred miles from home. Honest, industrious, and with good judgment, he has served his day and generation well, and is now a cheerful and contented old man. He, as well as his wife, is a strong advocate of total abstinence from spirituous liquors. He is a Republican in politics. He has been honored with the confidence and esteem of his fellow-townsmen, and has served several years as selectman, assessor, school committee-man, and in other positions of trust and responsibility.

ALFRED HODGES.

Alfred Hodges was born Feb. 16, 1809. He received his education at the public schools of his native town and at the Friends' School in Providence, R. I. He chose merchandising as a pursuit, and was a man much respected in his community. He possessed in a high degree the confidence of his fellow-townsmen, and was frequently called upon to fill positions of trust in the town. He represented the town of Foxborough in the Legislature, and held various other offices. He married, Oct. 19, 1838, Jerusha Comey, third daughter of Oliver and Keziah Leonard Comey. They had one son, who died Oct. 7, 1841, aged about two years, and two daughters, who are now living. He died April 3, 1875.

THE town of Walpole was one of the subdivisions of the old mother-town of Dedham, and for nearly one hundred years the history of this town is the history of Dedham.²

In 1635 the General Court of the colonies made a grant to twelve persons of land lying in Dedham for the purpose of founding a settlement. Nearly all of the early settlers came to Dedham from Watertown and Roxbury, and the settlement was founded the year after (1636), and called Contentment. When these men came to Dedham to form their settlement, they joined in the following covenant :

"1, We whose names are hereunto subscribed, doe, in the fear and reuerence of our Allmightie God, mutually; and seuerally p'mise amongst our selues and each to other p'fesse and practice one trueth according to that most p'fect rule, the foundation whereof is euerlasting love.

"2, That we shall by all means laboure to keepe of from us such as ar contrarye minded, and receaue onely such unto us as be such as may be p'bably of one harte with us as that we either knowe or may well and truely be informed, to walke in a peaceable conversation with all meekness of spirit for the edification of each other in the knowledge and faith of the Lord Jesus: and the mutuall encouragm't unto all temporall comforts in all things: seeking the good of each other out of all which may be deriued true peace.

"3, That if at any time difference shall arise betwene p'ties of our own said towne that then such p'tie and p'ties shall pr'sently referre all such difference unto some one, 2 or 3 others of our said societie to be fully accorded and determined without any further delay if it possibly may bee :

"4, That every man that now or at any time here after shall haue lotts in our own said towne shall paye his share in all such rates of money, and charges as shall be imposed upon him rateably in p'portion with other men as also become freely subject vnto all such orders and constitutions as shall be necessariely had or made, now or at any time here after from this day forward, as well for loveing and comfortable societie, in our own said towne as also for the p'sperous and thruiuing condicion of our said fellowship especially respecting the feare of God in which we desire to beginne and continue what so euer we shall by his loving fauoure take in hand.

"5, And for the better manefestation of our true resolution here in, euery man so receaued; to subscribe here vnto his name thereby obligeing both himself and his successors after him for euer as we have done."

When these men came into Dedham they adopted a liberal and honest policy towards the Indians. Although they had a grant of this land, yet they were careful to extinguish the title of the Indians, and as late as forty-nine years after the establishment of the settlement certain descendants of the former Indian proprietors claimed rights, and they were purchased and deeds given, and those deeds are still in preservation.

When these people came here to found this town the upland was mainly covered with timber. The meadows were open and could be mowed. It was from the meadows that they derived their principal stock of hay for their cattle. The woods were filled with animals, and as late as the incorporation of this town a bounty was paid for the destruction of wolves, wild-cats, and rattlesnakes.

Various circumstances tend to show that the settlement extended at a very early period up to within the limits of the present town of Walpole. I have found in examining the old records and the old annals the great cedar swamp spoken of, and spoken of at a very early time. It is conceded by all the Dedham historians that that cedar swamp is the cedar swamp between the plain and South Walpole. The lumber which could be procured there was a necessity to the settlers, and was early sought for. As early as 1646, ten years after the people first established the town, Ralph Day was allowed twenty shillings for beating the drum at the meeting-house, to be paid in cedar boards. On the 4th of May, 1658, an agreement was made between the town and Eleazer Lusher and Joshua Fisher to erect a saw-mill on the Neponset River near the cedar swamp. In 1674 it passed into the possession of Thomas Clapp, and a highway was soon after laid out from the town to the cedar swamp near the saw-mill. It is said this mill stood where the mill of Caleb Ellis afterwards did, but after an examination of the records, I am pretty thoroughly convinced it stood within the limits of the present town of Walpole.

The moving cause of the settlement of the town was the support of preaching and of religious worship, and as the settlement extended south and away from Dedham, the people living upon this territory could not be accommodated by the churches in Dedham, and efforts were made for the erection of a parish or precinct in this region.

Incorporation of Town.—In 1721 a petition was presented to the General Court of the colonies, praying that the south part of Dedham, which doubtless included what is now Walpole, might be incorporated as a parish for the purpose of supporting religious worship. This petition was opposed and defeated, but four years afterwards it was renewed, and Walpole was incorporated. I have not been able to find at the State-House the original petition for the incorporation of the town, although I found this petition of 1721; but I have here the act of the Legislature of the Province of Massachusetts Bay incorporating the town :

"Whereas the South part of the town of Dedham, within the county of Suffolk, is competently filled with inhabitants, who labor under great difficulties by their remoteness from the place of public worship, etc., and have thereupon made their application to the said town of Dedham, and likewise addressed this court, that they may be set off a distinct and separate town, and be vested with all the powers and privileges of a town; and the inhabitants of Dedham having consented to their being set off accordingly, and a committee of this court having viewed the said town of Dedham, and reported a proper divisional line between the two parts thereof,—

"Be it therefore enacted by the Lieutenant-Governor, Council and Representatives in General Court assembled, and by the authority of the same, That the southerly part of the said town of Dedham be and hereby is set off and constituted a sep[a] [e]-rate township by the name of Walpole; the bounds of the said township to be as follows,"—I will omit the boundaries,—

"Provided, that the inhabitants of the said town of Walpole do, within the space of eighteen months from the publication of this act, erect and finish a suitable house for the publick worship of God, and, as soon as may be, procure and settle a learned, orthodox minister of good conversation, and make provision for his comfortable and honorable support; and likewise provide a schoolmaster to instruct their youth in writing and reading; and that thereupon they be discharged from any further payments for the maintenance of the ministry and school in the town of Dedham."

Thus, when the political structure of Walpole was built, the church was the foundation, and the school was the cap-stone. Although the act recited that Dedham had consented to the separation, I judge from the records that they did not do it very graciously.

Here is what the Dedham annalist says about it. This is all the record:

"1724. Voted to give Jarvis Pike twenty shillings for keeping the boys in order on the pulpit stairs. Walpole set off from Dedham."

That is how the town of Dedham gave away her daughter. But she has grown for all that. She took her name from the great English statesman, Sir Robert Walpole, and she took the place with the other municipalities of this old province of Massachusetts Bay, and from that time to this she has kept step with them, and I know of nothing connected with her history for which any Walpole citizen ought to blush or hang his head with shame. From that time, 1724, we find by the records that they held their meetings, they selected their representatives, they supported their ministers, they paid for their schools, and during the different wars which followed they did their part as should well become them.

In the Crown Point expedition in the French and Indian war a company went from this town, commanded by Capt. William Bacon. In the same expedition a company went from Dedham, commanded by Capt. Eliphalet Fales, and there appears upon his roll the names of a great many Walpole men. I have seen the old rolls, worn and stained after the lapse of a hundred and twenty-five years, which contain the names of the men who went from within the limits of this town to serve their country against their enemies in Canada and elsewhere.

Slavery.—Slavery once existed in Walpole. The records of the church show that at least one slave was owned and kept here. One of the famous men one hundred and twenty-five years ago was Deacon Ezekiel Robbins, who kept the Brass Ball Tavern. When he died he left no children, and by his will, after providing for his wife, he bequeathed nearly all his property to the first church, and in his will was this clause:

"And further my will is, that if my negro servant, named Jack, shall live to be chargeable by reason of old age or infirmity, or both, and my aforesaid wife shall not sell him, as she is hereby empowered to do, then my will is that the aforesaid church in Walpole shall take tender care of him and suitably provide for him all the remainder of his life, and afford a decent burial after his death."

The records of the church show that they received the legacy with the condition. This will was admitted to probate in 1772, and Mrs. Robbins died shortly after. You will find upon the church record year after year a charge of so much paid for the support of "Jack." One year you will find a charge of six dollars for advertising him when he ran away, and one year you find a vote instructing the committee to inquire into the legality of his marriage with a certain woman with whom he lived. In 1810, when the death of "Jack" occurred, there is a statement of the expenditure of one hundred and sixty-three dollars and thirty-three cents for his funeral. It is evident that Jack had a big funeral, and that it was celebrated with becoming honor. Perhaps some of you may remember the old colored woman who lived this side of the plain, and how she used to travel about from place to place. She was the woman with whom Jack lived, and concerning whom a church committee was instructed to inquire whether they were legally married or not.

War of the Revolution.—The first question which any patriotic citizen of Walpole will be likely to ask is, What was the course of this good town in those trying days? "And," says Mr. Fales, "I am glad to say to you, ladies and gentlemen, that I have examined the records with especial reference to these events, and I say to you that I closed the examination with pride that the town of my nativity stood up so manfully and bravely in resistance to British oppression." In 1773 they passed some ringing resolutions. They were a series of resolutions reported by a committee consisting of Aquilla Robbins, Enoch Ellis, Seth Bullard, George Payson, and Samuel Cheney. The resolutions were ringing with patriotism and independence, and were adopted by the town and incorporated upon the records.

Sept. 26, 1774, the town voted to join with other towns in sending a representative to the Provincial Congress, and chose Nathaniel Guild representative. Dec. 19, 1774, the fourteen articles of association of the American Congress that met at Philadelphia the 5th of September were adopted, and by vote entered upon the town's book, and there you will find them recorded. Then they voted to purchase two field-pieces, and chose Benjamin Kingsbury, captain, Ebenezer Clapp, and Ensign Theodore Mann a committee to purchase them. Then they chose a Committee to join with other towns as a Committee of Correspondence and Safety, and in 1778 this little town voted to raise by taxation five thousand pounds to help carry on the war.

But that is not all that Walpole did in the Revolution. I want you to go back with me to the 19th of April, 1775, to two little towns in Middlesex County. You have heard of the lights in the Old North Church, and the rapid ride of Paul Revere through Medford and Lexington to Concord. You have heard how the minute-men rallied and were slain upon Lexington Green. You have heard how the British Regulators marched into Concord, and to enable them to carry out their work of destruction, they posted four companies of light infantry at North Bridge to guard the approach to the town, and you have heard how the minute-men from Acton and Concord and Lincoln met upon the hill, and were formed in battalion by Adjutant Hosmer, the Acton men led by Capt. Isaac Davis, the young gunsmith who that morning bade his wife and little children good-by, with the words, "Hannah, take good care of the children," and was borne back that night to his home lifeless and cold. You have read that when the question of attacking this British guard was discussed, Capt. Davis said, "I haven't a man that is afraid to go," and so they marched up the river-bank by the right flank with trailed arms, and were met by a rattling volley from the British infantry, and Capt. Davis and Hosmer fell dead, and Major Buttrick cried, "Fire, fellow-soldiers; for God's sake, FIRE!"

And then was fired "the shot heard round the world."

"You know the rest. In the books you have read,
How the British Regulators fired and fled,—
How the farmers gave them ball for ball,
From behind each fence and farm-yard wall,
Chasing the Red Coats down the lane,
Then crossing the fields to emerge again
Under the trees at the turn of the road,
And only pausing to fire and load."

Now, you will ask me what Walpole did then. I will tell you. Time and distance prevented the Walpole men from taking part in the battle, but she sent one hundred and fifty-seven men to respond to the alarm, with a population of less than eight hundred, —almost one-fifth of the entire population gathered and marched to Concord. Go back with me in memory and see the messenger come riding in and saying, "The British are going to destroy the stores at Concord!" The alarm was given, and the men gathered from the centre of the town, from the mill, from the shop, the south end, from the plain, from the other parts of the town, and took the road over to Medfield, Dover, and Sherborn, on towards Concord; two companies, with twenty-five additional men in a Medfield company, responded to the alarm. Ladies and gentlemen, the least we can do for these men is to remember them and speak their names, and when I found the old, brown, worn, moth-eaten rolls, these rolls of honor, I had them copied, and I want to read the names of these men, because I see before me the descendants of so many of them. I tell you the best patent of nobility that an American boy or man can have is the fact that his grandfather fought in the Revolution.

"WALPOLE, December ye 4th, 1775.

"A muster roll of the company in the colony's service which marched from S. Walpole on the alarm last April ye 19: 1775, under the command of Capt. Jeremiah Smith in coll. John Smith's Regiment.

"Jeremiah Smith, Philip Robbins, John Boyden, Oliver Clap, Benjamin Hartshorn, Ebenezer Fales, Abel Allen, Jeremiah Fales, Elijah Plympton, Ichabod Clap, Aaron Fales, Timothy Man, Joseph Ellis, Jonathan Boyden, Jeremiah Blake, Asa Page, Joshua Allen, Samuel Copp, Joseph Tucker, Amos Morse, Aaron Blake, Joseph Fales, Eliphalet Fales, Edward Cleavland, Joshua Boyden, Timothy Cudworth, George Cleavland, Matthias Puffer, Samuel Allen, Charles Page, Moses Fales, Benjamin Man, Joseph Carrill, Jr., Nathinel Guild, Jr., Fisher Hartshorn, Ebenezer Page, Joseph Page, Thomas Nason, Elijah Clap, Asa Plympton, Jonathan Carrill, Christopher Smith, Timothy Hartshorn, John Dexter, Jonathan Kindall, John Cleavland, Thomas Page, Eliphalet Clap, Moses Fales, Jr., John Frizel, Eliab Lyon, David Boyden, Jeremiah Dexter, Theodore Man, Asa Fisher, Abiather Fales, Jonathan Boyden, Jr., Abner Gould, Ebenezer Clap, Jr., Eleazer Clap, Aaron Ferington, Philip Bardiens, Jr., Joseph Man, Jonathan Dexter."

"A muster roll of a militia company in Walpole in coll. John Smith's Regiment: Seth Bullard, Captain, Eliph't Ellis, Lieutenant, Enoch Ellis, Ensign, Samuel Smith, Thomas Pettee, Henry Partridge, Eben. Gay, Nathaniel Nason, Eben. Hartshorn, Aaron Clark Fales, Jotham Morse, Eleazor Partridge, Ezekiel Boyden, Benoni Morse, John Ellis, Moses Ellis, Jacob Kingsbury, Seth Kingsbury, John Boyden, Richard Hartshorn, Henry Smith, Jr., Solomon Kingsbury, Asa Ellis, Jacob Gould, Calvin Gay, Jabez Boyden, John Hartshorn, Bexale Turner, Ziba Baker, Ebenezer Day, Samuel Thompson, James Clap, Jacob Clap, Elisha Hall, Eliphalet Ellis, Joseph Boyden, Samuel Guild, Joseph Guild, Ebenezer Farrington, William Pettee, Josiah Whittemore, Obadiah Morse, Nathaniel Gay, Benjamin Kingsbury, Ebenezer Fales, John Gregory, John Lewis, Abner Turner, Nicholas Harris, Joseph Kingsbury, Samuel Boyden, Ebenezer Farrington, Jr., Thomas Howard, Josiah Hall, Seth Hart, Elihu Lawrence, Moses Chamberlain, Asa Kingsbury, Isiah Lyon, Amos Ramsdale, Samuel Rhodes, Joshua Hews, John Day, John Boyden, Samuel Cheney, George Payson, Seth Payson."

Then, in addition to these full companies, one containing sixty-seven men, three more than the maximum, and the other containing sixty-four men, I find twenty-five names upon the roll of a Medfield company who were commanded by Capt. Sabin Maun, all Walpole men :

"Joshua Clap, Lieutenant, William Bacon, Ensign, Benjamin Carroll, Benjamin Potter, Jeremiah Boyden, Jeremiah Smith, Ichabod Reed, Samuel Hartshorn, Elias Mann, James Fales, Willaber Nason, Amos Turner, Seth Clap, Samuel Fuller, Joshua Clap, 3d, David Purrington, James Smith, David Morse, Peter Lyon, Abel Baker, Abiel Pettee, Stephen Fuller, Joseph Day, John Lawrence, Stephen Dexter."

One hundred and fifty-seven men! And it must be that they included every able-bodied man, with a fair share of the boys and cripples. Later on in the war a company from Walpole, under command of Capt. Aaron Guild, helped build the intrenchments upon Dorchester Heights, which movement resulted in the evacuation of Boston by the British. Another company marched from Walpole under Capt. Fisher in what was known as the Warwick expedition. Besides these, there were men that served in the Continental army. You have all heard the story of Holland Wood, the old artilleryman, who was with Washington when he crossed the Delaware, and you have heard the story of his strength, when, at the battle of Monmouth, his gun fell from its position, and with his own unaided strength he raised it and put it upon its carriage, and when it was so hot it burnt through the sleeve of his coat. I assure you our good old town stood up in the front ranks in those days, and I do not believe the breed has all run out yet.

After the close of the war the town went on as did other towns, the people cultivating their farms, building their dams, erecting their mills, filling their school-houses, until the war of 1812 came on. We all of us know of the old historic companies of our fathers, the Walpole Light Infantry, formed in 1802 under command of Capt. Samuel Fales, and when it was called upon by the government, under the command of Capt. Warren Clap, they marched to Boston and performed all the duties that were required of them.

After the war came peace once more, and then we went on with our career of prosperity as a town until the dark days of the Rebellion; but these events are so fresh in the minds of you all that I need not discuss them at length here. I know, and you know, that at the first call Walpole sent her men to fight the battles of liberty and union, and the events of that war made our country and government a stronger and better government and country than ever it was before.

CHAPTER LX.

WALPOLE—(Continued).

Ecclesiastical History—First Congregational Society—Orthodox Congregational Church—Congregational Church, East Walpole—Methodist Episcopal Church—Methodist Episcopal Church, South Walpole.

The First Congregational Society in Walpole.¹

—The history of this society dates from the incorporation of the town, in 1724, though religious services were undoubtedly held in the settlement before that date.

The earliest record bears date March 30, 1725. It was voted then by the people of the town to build a meeting-house. Subsequently measures were taken for the "support of preaching" and the securing of a minister to live with the people.

Many meetings were held over the perplexing question of the proper size of the house, but at last it was decided to build one thirty-eight feet long and thirty-two feet wide, smaller than was at first proposed.

Pending the erection of the house religious meetings were held in the homes of the people, as were the regular town-meetings.

In 1726 work was actually begun on the building, but for many years it remained unfinished. Therefore there is no account of a dedication. There is no record of a formal "raising." There were, originally, but twelve pews, but this number was greatly increased as the congregation grew, and as the people tired of the rough benches. The congregation steadily increased until, in 1743, the seats on the floor and in the gallery being all occupied, the town voted to build "a second tier of galleries."

The first minister called by the town was Rev. Joseph Belcher, who wrote his acceptance May 17, 1728. He was to receive fifty pounds as salary and one hundred pounds settlement; fifty pounds of the settlement to be paid the year he was ordained, the remaining fifty the year following. For some reason, not recorded, the town voted, May 5, 1729, to dismiss Mr. Belcher.

June 8, 1729, Rev. Phillips Payson preached for the first time in Walpole. Jan. 30, 1730, he accepts a call of the town, voted Oct. 20, 1729. The letters of Mr. Belcher and Mr. Payson are in strong contrast. The one is fervent, enthusiastic, abounding in pious phrases, the other is brief, business-like. The one condition stated in Mr. Payson's letter is, that the town shall furnish him all the firewood he may need, that it shall be four paces in length, and that it shall be brought to the house.

Mr. Payson was ordained and installed minister of the town Sept. 16, 1730. The town, when making preparation for this great event, voted that Ebenezer Fales should entertain the ministers taking part in the ordination service, and that he should be paid "five shillings a man." The ministry of Mr. Payson covers a period of nearly forty-eight years. It is not stated who presided at the organization of the church. July 2, 1730, the following persons were embodied: James Bardens, Ebenezer Fales, Eleazer Partridge, Samuel Kingsbury, Peter Fales, Thomas Clapp, Joseph Carryl, Moses Chamberlain, Ebenezer Robbins, Joseph Smith. Samuel Kingsbury was the first deacon of the church, having been elected Oct. 8, 1730. Ebenezer Fales, elected Dec. 10, 1731, was the second deacon. The whole number of members admitted to the church by Mr. Payson was two hundred and seventy-two.

In the early years of his ministry Mr. Payson was greatly troubled by the unchristian behavior of some of the members of the church. There are many records of "discipline." There was one man in particular who was the minister's thorn in the flesh. He seemed to have a genius for mischief, but the church was faithful to the commandment and forgave him many times. As the years pass, however, cases of discipline grow rarer, the pastor's good influence doubtless being one of the causes.

Very little matter of general interest is recorded for many years. At every annual town-meeting the two important items of the minister's salary and his firewood are discussed and voted upon. As the minister grew towards his prime and the society enlarged, it was easy to pass a vote for the original salary, and even to increase it. As the minister's physical and mental powers waned, it was deemed necessary to reduce the salary somewhat. But, on the whole, a good understanding existed between minister and people through this long pastorate, and as young and old man, Mr. Payson enjoyed the respect of his people, while most of the years were passed in quiet and peaceful labor. The thoughtfulness of his people is shown in a vote of 1772.

"Voted to build a seat in the pulpit for the benefit of Mr. Payson, if it is desired." The minister was then old and becoming infirm. Mr. Payson lived to see the colonies fully committed to an armed conflict with Great Britain. In the meeting-house were held the important meetings of that war-time. Here was first read and administered, without doubt, the oath of allegiance, a strong, patriotic expression. Here the people ratified the fourteen articles of the "Association of the Grand American Congress." Here they elected their representatives, voted money and provisions for the support of the army, and talked eloquently of their wrongs.

How strange to find the first meeting-house and first pastor drawing to their decay together! Mr. Payson died Jan. 22, 1778, and in 1781 the meeting-house was condemned, the town voting to build a new one on the same spot.

The new building was raised in 1783. In June of that year it was voted to appoint a committee "to get ministers to pray with us at the raising." Adam Blackman was the head carpenter. The building was sixty feet long and forty feet wide. When it was finished no one knows; for, as in the first case, meeting-house bills came up, the regular subject of discussion in town-meeting, for several years. All the material of the old building that could be so used was worked into the new. This building was furnished with a belfry, in which was placed, in 1791, a bell. The entrance was through two porches, one on the west side, the other on the east.

With the new meeting-house came a new minister, Rev. George Morey, who was pastor forty-six years. He was called by the town March 10, 1783, and ordained November 19th of the same year. During his pastorate Mr. Morey admitted to the church one hundred and fifty-two persons. He died July 26, 1829. His pastorate was not marked by any great event or change, so far as his own charge was concerned. He lived, as Mr. Payson, to see his countrymen engaged in war with Great Britain, and realized how profoundly a small community like his own could be moved, for Walpole was loyal always.

After his death, according to his directions, all his manuscripts were destroyed. We are not able, therefore, to determine the quality of his preaching or his literary ability; but it is said he used certain mysterious signs and abbreviations that would have made the task of deciphering his writings to-day hopeless.

His Calvinism was of a mild type. Indeed, the theology of Walpole had never been very harsh. It was doubtless owing to the influence of his preaching that, with the advent of his successor, the great majority of his people espoused the Unitarian side in the controversy over the doctrine of the Trinity. He has left one impressive monument in the row of noble elms planted by his hands near the site of the old homestead, on the Medfield road.

Several amusing stories are still told of "Parson" Morey. As he was busy out of doors one day, one of his church members came up and said, "Parson Morey, my mind is greatly troubled over this matter of original sin; can you tell me something to relieve me?" And the parson said, "You better go home and think of your own sins, for you have enough of them to think about."

Just before the time for starting for meeting on a Sunday the horse was brought to the door, and the parson, standing at the window, watched to see the bell swing in the belfry on the hill, and before the sound actually reached his ears he had started for the door. The horse had become so accustomed to his promptness, and had so associated it with the sound of the meeting-house bell, that one morning, when the parson was delayed, he trotted decorously off to meeting, and took his place in the familiar shed near the meeting-house.

Once Mr. Morey preached an eloquent and powerful sermon against card-playing. Next Sabbath, in adjusting the pulpit-cushion, he dislodged a pack of cards, which fell upon the heads and into the laps of the venerable deacons, who sat just beneath. Imagine the astonishment of the preacher, the stupefaction of the deacons, the horror of the older ones in the congregation, the mirth of the younger!

On the 15th of November, 1826, Mr. John P. B. Storer was ordained and installed junior pastor of the church and society in Walpole. For several years it had been evident to the people that their old pastor had become too infirm for the duties of his position, though he would not admit it, but endeavored, heroically, to meet his people's wants.

The resolutions passed in a meeting of the town are highly creditable to the people, and recognize fully the ability and fidelity of their pastor, and express their great gratitude for his long service. The sum of one thousand dollars was voted Mr. Morey, and it was decided that he should keep the title of pastor as long as he lived.

There was a notable gathering at the ordination of Mr. Storer. We find the following names in the list of those attending the council: Drs. Nichols, of Portland; Porter, of Roxbury; Harris, of Dorchester; Richmond, of Dorchester; Pierce, of Brookline; Lowell, of Boston; Saunders, of Medfield; Edes, of Providence; Rev. Messrs. Ware, Pierpont; Gannett, of Boston; and Dewey, of New Bedford. Mr. Storer was understood to be a Unitarian, and the presence of certain ministers at his ordination would, of itself, indicate it. But several members of the church in Walpole, still holding firmly to the doctrine of the Trinity, and considering it their duty to still profess it, finding little sympathy among the other members of the church, addressed a letter to the Congregational Church in Walpole, praying that they might be dismissed from membership in order to form a second church.

A meeting of the church was immediately held, but the subject was referred to the next regular meeting, that all the members might be present and the matter be fully voted upon.

Before action could be taken by the church the petitioning members organized what is now known as the Second Church, or Orthodox Congregational Church. At the regular meeting of the old church, action on the petition was indefinitely postponed. The original members of the Second Church, therefore, were always members of the First. During the ministry of Mr. Storer church and society prospered greatly, one hundred and twenty-one members being received into the church. Being of a social nature, well educated, and, as a preacher, magnetic, Mr. Storer became very popular. His removal to Syracuse, N. Y., to take charge of an important church there, in 1839, was considered a calamity. Some of the fine trees on Common Street attest the interest he felt in the town which he had made his home. His short ministry was, however, a ministry of power, and he is still remembered with respect and affection.

Under date June 18, 1837, Mr. Storer makes his last record: "Voted, That the church accept the invitation to join with the Second Parish in Roxbury in the ordination of Mr. Theodore Parker as their Pastor."

Before Mr. Storer left Walpole it was determined to move the meeting-house to a new site. The porches and all projecting portions that would interfere with its march were cut away, and it was lifted from its foundations and swung around, rear end first, being guided by a pole stuck in the ground midway the old and new sites.

In its second place it has rested to this day, not outwardly the same, for a spire has been run up, a new front built, and a vestry put underneath.

With the rededication of this meeting-house, which they called a new one, there was the installation of a new minister. Rev. John M. Merrick received a call from the church and society August, 1839. December 11th of that year was memorable, it being the date of his installation and of the rededication. The meeting-house was crowded. The sermon was by Rev. George Ripley, of Boston. Mr. Merrick was pastor twenty-six years, resigning his charge in 1865. He died in Charlestown, N. H., March 20, 1871, pastor of the Unitarian church and society. The recorder says of his sufferings in his last days, "He bore all with patience and a Christlike resignation." During his ministry in Walpole forty members were admitted to the church. His son, Prof. John M. Merriek, connected with the College of Pharmacy in Boston, rapidly rising to eminence as a scientist and writer on various subjects, died suddenly in Walpole in 1879. Mr. Merriek presided at the council called to examine his successor, Rev. W. B. Smith, and at the installation made the address to the people.

Mr. Smith was installed Oct. 5, 1865, Dr. Hedge, of Brookline, preaching the sermon. During his ministry all things prospered, and he gained the affection and confidence of his people. During his absence in Europe, in 1874, considerable change was made in the interior of the meeting-house. The galleries were removed, the pulpit was lowered, and a recess made at the rear of the pulpit. Prof. Edward J. Young, of Cambridge, preached the sermon at the reopening. When all were looking for the return of the pastor from Europe, his letter resigning his pastorate came, taking the people by surprise, and bringing sorrow to very many. From the disease from which he was then suffering, and which occasioned his resignation, Mr. Smith has not recovered. He removed to Grafton, where he now lives. During his ministry of eight years Mr. Smith admitted to church membership thirty-nine persons. Pending the selection of a successor to Mr. Smith, Professor Young, of Cambridge, preached for the society.

March 22, 1877, Rev. F. P. Hamblett was installed pastor, Rev. J. F. Lovering preaching the sermon. During his ministry of five years four persons were admitted to church membership. Mr. Hamblett was greatly liked as a preacher. Impulsive and enthusiastic, he did not spare himself, but being burdened by sickness, he found himself unable to perform all the duties or meet all the demands of his position, and in 1882 he resigned, removing to his old home in New Hampshire, where he hoped to recover his lost health, and where he still lives. He left many interested friends in Walpole.

In November, 1882, Rev. J. H. Weeks, the present pastor, preached for the first time in Walpole. He took charge of the pulpit January, 1883, but did not begin the actual work of the pastorate until April of that year. The society is now in good condition, and hopeful as to the future, having in its membership and congregation leading citizens of the town, the representatives of the original families who settled the town. A movement towards the erection of a chapel for Sunday-school uses has been started. The church and society have several funds at their disposal, left them by will. The church membership has been increased this last year, and a new interest in that direction has already manifested itself.

Orthodox Congregational Church.¹—No one can write the history of a church. A church is a living soul, not a machine. It has an inner life whose record is alone in heaven. We can measure the length and the breadth and the depth and the power of a river, but a church,—its full history, its influence, its power, only eternity will reveal. We may tell some incidents connected with its growth, we may outline a sketch of its external life, and this is all.

The history of the Orthodox Congregational Church of Walpole, Mass., covers less than sixty years. It was organized at the house of Mrs. Catharine Allen, Nov. 13, 1826, the following ministers and delegates composing the council: Rev. Ebenezer Burgess and Nathaniel Guild, of Dedham; Rev. Warren Pierce and Deacon Ebenezer Forrest, of Foxborough; Rev. Moses Thatcher and Artemas Woodward, of North Wrentham; Rev. Jonathan Curtis and Philip Curtis, of Sharon.

Rev. Ebenezer Burgess was chosen moderator, and Rev. Jonathan Curtis, scribe of the council. Twenty-nine persons appeared before the council stating that they desired to be formed into a church of Christ for their own edification and improvement in divine knowledge, for the better maintaining of gospel ordinances and public worship among themselves, as well as for the general promotion of vital religion and the extension of the Redeemer's kingdom. After long and careful examination the council voted unanimously to organize the petitioners into a church according to their request. The following twenty-nine persons then assented to and signed the "Confession of Faith" and entered into "Covenant" with God and with each other, and thus became the original members of the Orthodox Congregational Church of Walpole: Henry Plimpton, Aaron Guild, Joshua Allen, Jonathan Wild, Rhoda Bird, Keziah Thompson, Lucy Nason, Phebe Robbins, Nabby Robbins, Keziah Kingsbury, Susanna Plimpton, Mercy Billings, Anna Ellis, Lucy Morse, Cynthia Guild, Priscilla Lewis, Catharine Everett, Sarah Smith, Catharine Allen, Mary Nason, Jerusha Clapp, Miriam Smith, Susanna Lewis, Milley Baker, Joanna Hill, Patty Bowker, Unity Allen, John P. Allen, Susanna Smith.

The church thus formed worshiped for about a year in the upper part of the building still standing on the corner of Main and East Streets, and adjoining the site of the present house of worship. Until they were prepared to call a pastor, they were ministered unto by pastors in and around Boston, among whom were Rev. Dr. Lyman Beecher and Rev. Dr. Green, of Boston. Of the original members only one is now living, but the descendants of many of them are still represented in the church and society.

The society which is connected with the church—called the Orthodox Congregational Society—dates back to Oct. 4, 1826, with an original membership of seventy-four persons. Henry Plimpton, John Blackburn, Oliver Lincoln, Levi Clap, Nathan Ware were the first committee of the society; and John Blackburn, Henry Plimpton, Everett Stetson the trustees of the society. The first clerk was George P. Ellis, who held the office but one year, and was succeeded by John Morse, who served nearly nine years. During its history this society has had but four clerks; the present incumbent, Samuel Allen, having served thirty-five years.

The first treasurer of the society was Josiah Hill, who held the office thirteen years. He was succeeded by Asa Hartshorn, who served twenty years; while the present treasurer, the third the society has had, Metzgar W. Allen, has held the office fifteen years.

At once, upon the organization of the church and society, steps were taken looking to the erection of a meeting-house; and by the earnest labors and many sacrifices of the members, and by the good providence of God in increasing their means and their membership and blessing their endeavors, a house of worship was completed, and in September of the following year, 1827, was dedicated to the worship of the Triune God. It was a happy day for the little company of disciples. Many were the thanksgivings to God, and many were the prayers that God would bless His people in their new relations, and would ever manifest His special presence in this sanctuary. The sermon was preached by Rev. John Codman, D.D., of Dorchester.

The total expense of the building, without the vestry or galleries, which were added several years afterward, was less than three thousand dollars.

On the 25th of April, 1867, after having been thoroughly remodeled at an expense of seventeen thousand dollars, the house was rededicated to the worship of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, Rev. Edward G. Thurber, the pastor, preaching the sermon.

The first pastor of the church was Rev. Asabel Bigelow, of Boyleston, Mass., a graduate of Harvard College and Andover Seminary. He was installed March 12, 1828, and dismissed Jan. 1, 1849. The council of installation was a large one, consisting of thirty-seven members, and included Rev. Lyman Beecher, D.D., and Rev. John Codman, D.D.

The number belonging to the church at the beginning of Mr. Bigelow's ministry was forty-eight. During his pastorate of twenty-one years, which was the longest that the church has ever had, one hundred and sixty were added to the membership. Mr. Bigelow was pre-eminently a Bible preacher, and so plain and clear were his teachings that even the children could understand. He was a man of deep piety and earnest prayer. A diligent student, he was much in his study, "searching daily the Scriptures whether those things were so." After a long and faithful service here he removed to Hancock, N. H., where he labored twenty years more, and then passed to his reward at the age of eighty years.

The second pastor of the church was Rev. George H. Newhall, of Athol, Mass. He graduated at Amherst College in 1845, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1850, and was installed Sept. 10, 1850. A young man, coming to his first pastorate, he brought all the freshness and ardor of youth, and by his earnest Christian life, his genial spirit, and love of men for their sake, he soon became greatly beloved. But his ministry was cut short by his early death. Aug. 24, 1853, he died, at the age of twenty-seven, and was buried here in the midst of his people. Though for less than three years he ministered, yet his influence still abides with the church, and his memory is precious.

He was succeeded by Rev. Edwin H. Nevin, of Cleveland, Ohio, who was installed Nov. 15, 1854. Within three years he was called to the pastorate of Plymouth Church, Chelsea, Mass., and April 7, 1857, was dismissed by council to accept this call. He is at present residing in Philadelphia, Pa.

After two years of brief supplies of the pulpit, Rev. Joseph W. Healey, of Andover, Mass., was called to the pastorate and installed Sept. 14, 1859. In the summer of 1862, Mr. Healey, being invited to minister in the Hanover Street Congregational Church, of Milwaukee, Wis., was dismissed by council from this church. Thirty-nine were added to the church during his ministry.

The fifth pastor of the church was Rev. Edward G. Thurber, of Monroe, Mich. His collegiate course was taken at the University of Michigan, and his theological at Union and Andover Seminaries. This was Mr. Thurber's first pastorate. Here he was ordained to the ministry of the gospel Oct. 29, 1862. After serving a year he was installed as pastor Oct. 14, 1863. During Mr. Thurber's ministry of nearly eight years—the second longest the church has had—the meeting-house was thoroughly remodeled and rededicated.

Eighty-eight were added to the membership in the eight years, and of these nearly one-half, forty, were added in one year. During Mr. Thurber's pastorate, also, the first complete manual of the church was published. May 3, 1870, he was dismissed, and entered at once upon the pastorate of the Park Presbyterian Church, Syracuse, N. Y., where he still remains.

Very soon after this Rev. Heman R. Timlow, of East Cambridge, Mass., was called, and Sept. 28, 1870, was installed. Dismissed by council July 26, 1872, to enter upon editorial work, he resided for some time at Montclair, N. J. Since, however, he has resumed pastoral labor, and is minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church at Burnt Hills, N. Y.

He was succeeded by Rev. Bela N. Seymour, who supplied the pulpit about one year and then was called to the Congregational Church of New Ipswich, N. H. He is now settled in Connecticut.

Rev. Henry L. Kendall, of Barrington, R. I., a graduate of Brown University and Andover Theological Seminary, became the eighth pastor of the church. He was ordained Jan. 27, 1875. Early in 1876 an urgent call came to him from the First Congregational Church of Charlestown, Mass., which he accepted. Mr. Kendall was a man of unusual talents as a minister of the gospel. A clear thinker, an earnest preacher, and of a nature that attracted men to himself, he was "thoroughly furnished" for his work. But at the early age of thirty-four he was called to his reward.

Sept. 27, 1876, Rev. Calvin G. Hill, of Hamilton, Mass., was installed as the ninth pastor of the church. Mr. Hill graduated at Amherst College and Bangor Theological Seminary. His pastorate—being the third longest the church has had—continued until Aug. 1, 1881, when he was dismissed by council, and soon after became pastor of the First Congregational Church of Milton, Mass. The tenth and present pastor, Rev. Francis J. Marsh, of Leominster, Mass., graduating at Amherst College and Andover Theological Seminary, began his ministry here Jan. 15, 1882.

By this review it will be seen that the church has had a pastor over them for forty-nine out of the fifty-eight years since its organization. The average term of the ministry of these pastors has been five years nearly; but this average is large because of the length of the first pastorate, that of Rev. Mr. Bigelow, which was twenty-one years. During all its history the church has had four hundred and seventy-four members, and its present membership is one hundred and eighty-one.

Its Sunday-school has been coexistent with itself, the anniversary of each being observed annually, November 13th. Among the first superintendents we find the names of Deacon Everett Stetson, Daniel Allen, Jr., Jeremiah Allen, and Willard Lewis. Mr. Myron H. Piper is the present superintendent, and the membership of the school is two hundred and fifty.

The church has also several missionary societies connected with it, and thus in various ways is reaching out its hand to do the work of the Master.

Congregational Church, East Walpole.¹—April 28, 1877, a meeting was called at the house of Mrs. Selany Smith for prayer, and to consult about observing the Lord's Supper, and it was voted by the Christian people that Rev. C. B. Smith be requested to present at an adjourned meeting a statement of belief and covenant for the purpose of a permanent organization.

May 5th, the brothers and sisters met at the same place, and after kind discussion it was voted to organize by adopting the statements recorded as the substance of our religious faith and covenant, and Brother William Rhodes and Mr. Joseph Cheney to provide the elements used at the Lord's table, and to serve as deacons of the church; also voted to observe the sacraments once in two months from the first Sunday in May, 1877.

May 6th, eighteen persons united in observing the Lord's Supper, one being baptized.

July 1, 1877, the sacraments were again observed, Mrs. Ellen N. Brown being baptized, and was added to the church. Services were held in Bird's Hall, its free use being given by the Hon. F. W. Bird. Meetings had been held in Bird's Hall occasionally before this for some two or three years by different preachers and laymen from out of town, but nothing permanent.

About this time Rev. C. B. Smith came among us, and has still remained.

Everything went on quietly in a union way until September 3d, when at a regular meeting of the church it was voted to choose a committee for the purpose of considering the propriety of calling a council to recognize the church and recommend it to the fellowship of other churches, if thought advisable to do so, and to determine the time of inviting such churches to meet in council as they should think advisable.

The pastor, Deacon William Rhodes, and Brothers S. G. Fuller and J. A. Brown were chosen said committee.

Oct. 18, 1880, in response to letters missive, an ecclesiastical council assembled in Bird's Hall, in

East Walpole, to consider the purpose of recognizing the church as an orthodox Congregational Church. Council organized by choosing Rev. C. G. Hill as moderator, and Rev. Weston, scribe.

The following churches were represented: Norwood, Walpole Centre, Sharon, Dedham, and Revere.

Council voted to recognize and recommend us to the fellowship of orthodox Congregational Churches.

The public services were held at 7 P.M. Reading of the Scriptures by F. O. Winslow, of Norwood. Prayer on consecration by Rev. C. G. Hill. Right hand of fellowship by Rev. Ellis Mendell. Address to church by J. P. Bixby, of Revere.

Dec. 6, 1880, the Lord's Supper was observed, and after it Mr. J. A. Brown was chosen clerk.

April 20, 1881, the church was admitted to full membership in the Massachusetts Suffolk South Conference, which held their meeting at Boston Highlands, Deacon Rhodes and the pastor being present in behalf of the church.

June 6, 1882, at a meeting held at Deacon William Rhodes', it was voted to erect a church building, and the following trustees were chosen: Deacon William Rhodes, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel G. Fuller, and Simon Gould, who was chosen treasurer of the committee. Mrs. Susan Thompson and Mrs. Elizabeth Fuller were chosen to solicit money for same.

Oct. 14, 1882, Deacon Rhodes and wife gave the land for the church. It was erected by Frank Smith, of Franklin, and dedicated May 18, 1883, with the following service: Valedictory by F. O. Winslow; invocation by Rev. F. J. Marsh; reading Scripture by George Hill; singing by congregation; history of church by Rev. C. B. Smith; music; sermon by Rev. A. H. Plumb, D.D., of Boston; prayer of dedication by Rev. J. Coit; benediction by pastor.

The cost of the church was a trifle over two thousand dollars, the sum being all paid at the dedication. Their present membership is nineteen, and the usual congregation about fifty.

The Methodist Episcopal Church at Walpole Centre was formed in 1874, with a membership of twelve. The first minister was Rev. Mr. Noon, followed by Rev. J. H. Vincent, one year; Rev. H. V. Webster, one year; Rev. E. Comstock, one year; Rev. E. C. Farwell, one year; Rev. F. O. Holman, two years; Rev. M. D. Hornbeck, one year; Rev. A. A. Kidder, one year. Rev. M. D. Sill is the present pastor. The present membership is about fifty. The society purchased an eligible lot adjoining the town house one year ago, and propose to erect a chapel thereon the present year if sufficient funds can be secured. The sum paid for the lot was one thousand dollars. N. W. Fisher is secretary and treasurer.

Methodist Episcopal Church, South Walpole.¹—Methodism was introduced into South Walpole by Rev. Benjamin Haines in 1818. The meetings were held in a private dwelling, the residence of Mr. Eliphalet Smith. The next year a Methodist class was formed by Rev. Isaac Jennison, who then resided in Mansfield. In 1822 a church was organized with its officers, among whom was Josiah Hall, who served in that capacity faithfully and with great honor thirty-five years. In 1830 the first church edifice was erected under the pastoral charge of Rev. Francis Dane. It was built on the site of the present parsonage, donated to the society by Silas Smith. The house, when completed, was dedicated that year to the worship of God by Rev. Lewis Bates. The second church edifice was erected in 1846, under the pastorate of Rev. D. L. Winslow, and was dedicated to the worship of God by Rev. Charles Adams, D.D., at the cost of three thousand seven hundred dollars. The following board of trustees were then appointed: Josiah Hall, Silas Smith, Caleb S. Ellis, R. Clapp, J. Boyden, A. Ellis, and M. Smith.

In 1834 the church was favored with a very extensive revival, and many were added to the church, the fruit of which still remains. Among the converts were two young men of great promise, who afterwards entered the ministry and became members of the New England Conference. Their names are Rev. Luman Boyden and Rev. Willard Smith. This revival was under the labors of Rev. William R. Stone. More than forty pastors have served the church during its history of sixty years. The present pastor is Rev. O. W. Adams. The membership is about seventy. The trustees are H. L. Boyden, E. P. Boyden, J. D. Hunt, C. S. Ellis, George Scott, E. C. Boyden, W. Shephard.

WALPOLE—(Continued).

The Press—The Walpole Standard—The Walpole Enterprise—The Norfolk County Tribune—The Walpole Star—Manufacturing Interests—Civil History—The Town Hall—Military History—Number of Men Furnished—Amount of Money Expended—Roll of Honor—Memorial Tablets.

THE first paper bearing a Walpole head was the Walpole Standard, which was printed in Franklin and was started early in October, 1870, by James M.

Stewart, of the Franklin Register. This paper appeared every Friday and lived to see the eighth volume. The Walpole Enterprise was started Saturday, March 1, 1878, by E. H. Hosmer, of Walpole, who, after about six months, sold the paper to T. S. Pratt, of Mansfield. Charles M. Thompson, of Walpole, was its next editor, and he remained until June, 1881, when Charles J. McPherson succeeded him, and after three months bought the paper out, and the Norfolk County Tribune was started in its place. The Tribune lived about a year. On June 17, 1882, The Walpole Star appeared, being published by Charles J. McPherson, and met with a greater success than any of its predecessors. It is still flourishing, and gives promise of long life. Its size, as also the Standard and Enterprise, is an eight-column folio, while the Tribune was a nine-column folio.

Town Hall.—The present town hall was dedicated Sept. 28, 1881, an historical address being delivered on the occasion by Henry E. Fales, Esq. It is a substantial and commodious brick structure, with a town clock in the tower. It is beautifully located, and reflects much credit upon the building committee and the citizens of the town of Walpole.

Military History.—The first vote in reference to the Rebellion is under date of April 30th, when it was voted that the treasurer borrow not exceeding $5000 to pay soldiers belonging to Walpole and to aid their families.

The town furnished about one hundred and twenty-six men for the war, one of whom was a commissioned officer. The whole amount of money expended for war purposes, exclusive of State aid, was $14,564.47. The whole amount paid for aiding soldiers' families and expended by the State was $10,203.54.

The selectmen during the Rebellion were as follows: In 1861–63, Nathaniel Bird, Calvin Hartshorn, M. B. Boyden; in 1864, James G. Scott, J. H. Leland, Horace Draper; in 1865, J. G. Scott, J. H. Leland, and J. P. Tisdale.

The town clerk in 1861–64 was Palmer Morey (Mr. Morey died in August, 1864, and Samuel Allen was appointed for the balance of the year); in 1865, George P. Morey. The treasurer in 1861–63 was Samuel Gilbert; in 1864–65, Samuel Allen.

Manufacturing Interests.¹—Neponset River rises in Foxborough and enters Walpole at the extreme south corner, takes a northerly course to the centre, then changes to an easterly course, and enters Norwood just below Holingsworth & Vose's paper-mill, formerly known as Hon. F. W. Bird's lower mill.

On this stream are ten separate and distinct water privileges, with a combined fall of one hundred and fifty-one feet. A description of each privilege separately will be given as correctly as records and personal information will permit, beginning at the south and following the river to the last one in town.

The first fourteen-feet fall is known as Elbridge Smith privilege. In 1814 it was the property of Timothy Gay, of Dedham, with a grist-mill located there, it being near the Boston and Providence turnpike, where a toll-gate was; the miller, besides grinding grain, also tended toll-gate. A few years after it became the property of Daniel & Elbridge Smith, who built a factory for manufacturing cotton goods. Several gentlemen occupied it only each for a short time. Sumner, of Canton, made rubber lining; Bradford Lewis made cotton from clippings. There is no record to be found of any other transaction. The property is now owned by George Fisher, of West Dedham.

The second privilege, twenty-one feet fall, is known as the Henry S. Clark privilege. A deed dated Suffolk County, 1720, signed by Theodore Mann Clothier to his son, Timothy Mann, later called colonel, who at a still later date deeded to his son, Timothy Mann, shows clearly the business there for many years. In 1812 there were two privileges, one five hundred or six hundred feet below the other. Col. Timothy Mann Clothier occupied the lower. James Richardson & Co. manufactured nails, etc., at the upper mill. About that date Col. Timothy Mann manufactured cassimeres, satinets, etc., in his two mills. When he retired the Boston and Walpole Manufacturing Company carried on the same business, of which the Hon. Truman Clarke was agent. The upper mill was burned while they were in business. It was rebuilt by Eli Bonney, Leavitt Kingsbury, and David Ruggles, who never used it. In 1820, Hall J. Howe and James Richardson formed a copartnership, and commenced manufacturing broadcloths and cassimeres. About 1825 the Hon. Truman Clarke and wife, daughter of Timothy Mann, came in possession of the property, and commenced a successful career in the manufacturing of woollen goods, broadcloths, and cassimeres. The lower mill was burned about this time and never rebuilt. The high reputation of his goods and his character as an honest business man secured for him a widespread acquaintance, and soon placed him in affluent circumstances. He was honored by an election to a seat in the Massachusetts Senate, and filled offices of responsibility in town. He retired from business, leased his factory to Mr. Whitehouse & Co., who continued but a short time the same business.

In 1836, John Mann began the manufacturing of boots and shoes. 1837, April 1, he formed a co-partnership with Hon. Truman Clarke, known as the firm of Clarke & Mann, South Walpole. They bought of the Boston and Providence Coach Company their stable, converted a part of it into a boot- and shoe-shop, and the remainder to a dwelling. The connection continued twelve years with success, at which time Mr. Mann bought the interest in the business of Mr. Clarke, and continued the same until the extensive fire of Boston curtailed his means. He affirmed that the business had increased from fifty thousand to one hundred and fifty thousand dollars a year. His reputation for making a first-class calf boot was not excelled. In 1851, Henry S. Clarke, son of Truman Clarke, formed a copartnership with Naaman Welmarth, styled Clarke & Welmarth, who leased Truman Clarke's factory, and made stocking yarn. In 1862, N. B. Welmarth retired. Henry S. Clarke continued until his death, in 1881. His widow and three children remain. The eldest, W. H. Clarke, nearly twenty-one years of age, now runs the mill.

Boot and shoe business was not connected with the Clarke privilege.

The third water privilege, twelve-feet fall, is called the Old Rucaduc. Previous to 1812 it formed a part of the farm belonging to William Bacon, who, with Horace Smith and Eliphalet Smith, were the first owners. In 1812 an old resident reports that William Bacon, Eliphalet Smith, Maj. Smith, and Horace Clap, in company, owned and ran a saw-mill, shingle-mill, and carding-machine. Mr. Bacon wanted an aqueduct to irrigate his land. Mr. Smith called it a rucaduc, which gave the privilege that name. At a still later date, which we cannot name, no record can be found, Daniel Smith and Elbridge Smith bought the privilege, and erected a cotton-factory (the old one having decayed and fallen down), and manufactured cotton-thread several years. D. & E. Smith conveyed this property to Jenks, who manufactured cotton-thread and silk-covered bonnet-wire. Jenks conveyed it to William H. Cary, who used it for the manufacturing of cotton-thread. W. H. Cary conveyed it to James Ogden, who used it for a shoddy-mill. In 1876 we find it in his possession. In 1877, James Ogden conveyed this privilege to the Alden Emery Company, who came from Ashland. Feb. 23, 1881, by an act of Legislature, the name was changed to Walpole Emery-Mill. Extensive additions have been made to the mill. A railroad track connects it with the Old Colony Railroad, adding convenience, etc. Mr. John Way is the present superintendent.

Warren Boyden at one time was engaged in the manufacturing ladies' boots, and also in making shirt-bosoms.

Mason Pierce, engaged in his early years in manufacturing shoes, South Walpole, for over thirty years past has been a Boston expressman.

The fourth water-power privilege, a seven-feet fall, is called the Blackburn privilege. Previous to 1806, Aaron Blake obtained a right to flow the meadows about one mile above the centre of Walpole; built a dam and saw-mill there. In 1806, Samuel Nason and Jason Boyden ran the saw-mill, and also had a grist-mill on another dam a short distance below, with a fall of twelve feet. June 11, 1811, John Blackburn, a manufacturer from Medway, purchased the two privileges, and soon after erected a building for the manufacturing machinery. In the upper part of that machine-shop the renowned George Blackburn, in company with his father, John Blackburn, commenced his career in manufacturing cotton yarn. They continued until the building was burned down. George Blackburn afterwards became the owner of several factories,—one in Mansfield, one in Ashland, and another in Fitchburg, where the noted cotton sail duck ten and seven-twelfths feet wide was made. His father for several years after was engaged in the business of farming. 1846, John Henry Blackburn, son of John Blackburn, in company with Ollis Clap, bought the foundry of Deacon Everett Stetson, situated on the bank of Stetson mill-pond, and removed the personal property to its present situation on the Blackburn privilege, and there engaged in casting all kinds of light work,—stoves, machinery, fire-frames, etc. The copartnership continued one year. Mr. Blackburn carried on the same business seven years, at which time (about 1840) Lewis and Erastus Robbins took the business and carried it on one year and a half. J. H. Blackburn gave up manufacturing and commenced farming. He had previously introduced a grist-mill and a shingle-mill, which are now in running order and in his possession. In a part of this building William Hart and Stephen Sanford engaged for two or three years in the manufacture of cotton warps for satinets. Five hundred feet below this dam is an old building which goes by the name of the Old Mill, built by John Blackburn, which at one time was used by Hart & Sanford in manufacturing bathing. Asa Whitman manufactured lamp-wicks there. Ephraim Shepard occupied it, sawing wood-work for carriages.

The fifth water-power privilege, eighteen and a half feet fall, is known as Union Factory. Here, in 1812, according to the memory of our oldest residents now living, who inform us that Samuel Fales, a manufacturer of snuff, was located. Thaddeus Clap and Samuel Fuller had a tan-yard. Eliphalet Clap owned a forge, and manufactured wrought iron and nails. Daniel Ellis was a clothier. In 1813, Oliver Clap, Warren Clap, Daniel Ellis, Daniel Payson, and Edward G. Cundal, styled Oliver Clap & Co., bought the land (on which the factory was built) of Ebenezer Clap, also the right to convey the water through his land, giving to said E. Clap an obligation, binding each jointly and severally forever to build the fence around the land and protect against injury by washing, or gulying, or injuring the land in any way. The Walpole Union Manufactory (cotton and woolen), Oliver Clap, president; Warren Clap, treasurer; Oliver Eldridge, proprietors' clerk. It was a fine edifice, sixty by forty feet, four stories and a half, besides the basement, with a bell-tower on the southerly end surmounted with a musical bell, which pealed forth its daily notes for over sixty-seven years, except during periodical depressions, which all factory interests have at times been obliged to pass through. Not one in Walpole but what have been obliged to stand idle at some time.

It was a stock company and superintended by agents. David Fairbank is reported as the first, Maj. Alfred Allen is reported as the second, and Asa Whitman as the third. After a series of years, his connection having been severed with Union Factory, Asa Whitman became the owner of the twenty-four shares in Diamond Factory, and April 11, 1842, deeded that property to his son. (See history of Diamond Factory.) In September, 1844, Warren Clap, Benjamin Banks, E. W. Clap, and the Manufacturers' Insurance Company deeded each one-eighth part of Union Factory to Amory Warren, who deeded to W. R. Butterworth, who manufactured cotton cloth for a considerable length of time. In 1847, Mr. Cook, from Providence, after putting the factory in complete order, manufactured cashmirettes, using a part of Hon. Truman Clark's factory in finishing them. Dec. 15, 1848, Charles F. Tilinghist deeded the property to Smith Gray, James S. Shepard, and William H. Cary. May, 1852, Messrs. Gray, Shepard, and Cary conveyed by deed the Union Factory and privilege to Charles Manning, Henry R. Glover, and Jerome B. Cram, styled Manning, Glover & Co., who continued the manufacturing of curled hair mattresses, cotton batting and wicking until July, 1872. The copartnership was then dissolved, and the property came into the possession of Jerome B. Cram. He owned two-thirds, Henry R. Glover one-third. Mr. Cram continued manufacturing curled hair and mattresses until 1880, when he sold his interest to Smith Gerish.

Messrs. Gerish & Glover have leased this property to Stephen Pember, since which time (September, 1881) it was burned down, and a flat-roof, one-story building erected thereon. Mr. Pemberton hired a small factory on the banks of Union Dam, owned by Mr. J. B. Cram, in 1881, and in a few days that was burned to the ground, since which Mr. Cram has rebuilt, and is now manufacturing ticking.

The sixth water-power privilege, Walpole Centre, Willard Lewis, nine feet waterfall.

In 1812, Daniel Clap, clothier, was located here (how long he had been there the historian is unable to say), and continued several years afterwards. In 1821, Harlow Lawrence, who had been an employé in the Union Factory, purchased this privilege, and built a fine building two and a half stories, sixty by forty feet, with a bell-tower surmounted with a bell, and fitted it with machinery for the manufacturing of cotton thread, and continued successfully until he died. After his death it stood idle for a while.

George Guiler continued the manufacturing of thread about ten years in the interest of the heirs.

A Mr. Blackington leased and continued the same business for a term of years.

Previous to 1863, William Lewis had been manufacturing list carpets quite extensively.

Feb. 21, 1863, Deacon Willard Lewis purchased of the heirs of Harlow Lawrence this factory, water-power, and privilege, and commenced to manufacture government lint for the army, and also list carpeting, carpet lining, cotton batting, cotton calking, and cotton percolator, used for straining rosin at the South.

Mr. William Hart built a machine-shop near the old Lawrence Factory. He was an accomplished mechanic, employed at one time quite a large number of hands, and continued his business until quite an aged man. His machine-shop was after a while connected with the Lawrence Factory, previous to the purchase of Willard Lewis. That factory has been burned down since his purchase, and a two and a half story brick building stands on the old site. Messrs. Willard Lewis & Son now continue manufacturing.

The Stetson water-power, twelve feet fall, is owned by Edward P. Stetson. In 1795, Ebenezer Harts-horn was the owner, and had a grist-mill, acting in the capacity of a miller and a farmer. In 1796, Joshua Stetson bought the privilege, and commenced the manufacturing of farming tools. His mechanical skill and upright manner of doing business soon brought him to the notice of the trading community, who soon gave him the credit of manufacturing the best hoe in the country. The fame of the Stetson Hoe spread far and wide. He continued the business until 1827, at which time he retired with a competence. His son, Everett Stetson, continued the business his father left to him until 1830.

Capt. Joshua Stetson died Feb. 14, 1863. Joshua Stetson, Jr., was proprietor of a cotton-factory on this privilege from 1830 to 1867. He had the reputation of making the best ticking in the market. A copartnership, Stetson & Bullard, 1844 (see Diamond Factory report). Deacon Everett Stetson, in 1846, sold to J. H. Blackburn and Ollis Clap a foundry of which he had previously been the proprietor. They removed the personal property to the Blackburn privilege. He had also been the owner of a card-clothing factory, situated near his dwelling-house, at which time (1855) he bought the entire Stetson privilege, and removed his factory to its present position near the dam, and continued the same until 1867, when he was succeeded by his son, Edward P. Stetson, who still continues the business. Here are running machines the inventor of which, Eleazer Smith, who lived and died here, and was buried within sight of this factory, the world ought to honor,—Eleazer Smith, who invented a machine for pricking the leather, cutting, crooking, and setting card-teeth, all in one operation, also a machine for cutting and heading nails, etc. The present proprietor of this card-clothing factory has made extensive additions and improvements, which in appearance and convenience does him credit. His business is extensive.

Mr. Ira Gill, the oldest living manufacturer in town, began the manufacturing of fur-napped hats in 1823, changed later to fur-felts. He has occupied buildings on this privilege since 1855. He was the successor of Rand & Hooper, hatters. They were the successors of a Mr. Roberts, a hatter.

The eighth water-power privilege, with two dams combined, formerly known as Daniel Ellis and Deacon Henry Plimpton, power eighteen and a half feet, is now known as Linden Spring and Axle-Works. In 1810, John Stanley, Thomas Stanley, and William Appleton carried on the manufacturing of tacks and snuff. Previous to that time it was a part of the farm belonging to Roland Willett, and deeded to them Jan. 25, 1810 (the lower privilege). 1816. Deacon Henry Plimpton came into possession of the upper privilege, and manufactured hoes. 1818. Daniel Ellis became the owner of the lower privilege, and Daniel Ellis & Son continued the business of a clothier and manufacturing satinets. Daniel Ellis died in 1835; his son continued the business till 1837, when George Blackburn took possession and continued three or four years. A Mr. Freeman then took the factory and manufactured negro cloth one year. Calvin Turner manufactured satinets there one year. Park Sterns and Blackburn deeded, Aug. 29, 1844, the lower privilege to Deacon Henry Plimpton, who manufactured satinets and hosiery yarn a short time, then, in connection with his upper privilege, continued the manufactory of hoes, steel springs, etc. 1835, O. W. Allen & Co., Henry Plimpton, O. W. Allen, and Jeremiah Allen manufactured twine on the lower privilege. Everett Stetson manufactured wadding there. In 1848, C. G. & H. M. Plimpton (Calvin G. Plimpton), sons of Deacon Henry Plimpton, formed a copartnership, and continued the forge, steel spring, axle, and numerous other kinds of tools and implements used in farming and machinery, filling quite extensive orders from California until 1865, at which time they sold the property to the Linden Spring and Axle Company, of which Hubbard W. Tilton was a large owner and agent.

Stephen Pember hired a part of this privilege a few years since, and used it for a shoddy-mill until it burned down.

The ninth water-power privilege is a fifteen-feet fall, of which Hon. F. W. Bird is proprietor. In the year 1817 or 1818, Eliphalet Rhoads carried on a grist-mill here. Dean Sales & Co. manufactured cotton cloth, known as Neponset Manufacturing Company. They, in 1835, sold to Silas Smith and others, who formed a copartnership known as the Neponset Paper-Mill Company, and manufactured printing paper. Dec. 20, 1836, the Neponset Paper-Mill Company sold the property to Jabez Coney, Jr., of Dedham. He continued the business until Nov. 8, 1838, at which time the Hon. Francis W. Bird purchased the entire property of him. For a few months Mr. Bird ran the mill on news-printing paper, after which he made coarse paper for hardware, sugar, and other various uses, and has continued increasing the variety of paper of that class until the business has increased five or sixfold. F. W. Bird & Son are now owners of the mill.

Tenth privilege, Bird's lower mill, twelve feet water-fall, paper-mill, was built by George Bird, father of F. W. Bird, in 1817-18. Run by Bird & Son, George and Josiah N. Bird, afterwards by Josiah N. Bird, who sold it to F. W. Bird, April 1, 1833. They made the same kinds of paper as the upper mill. Hon. F. W. Bird, a part of the time with partners, owned it until March, 1882, when he sold it to Hollingsworth & Vose. Of late years the mill has been confined to first-class manilla paper.

Hon. F. W. Bird & Son now occupy a new brick mill, erected on the site of the old one, a few years ago burned down, equipped with the most improved machinery, and running night and day in order to fill orders. Mr. Bird's business career has been long and noted, meriting the respect of the community at large, public-spirited in the full sense of the word, a free giver to many charitable purposes, often filling offices of responsibility in his own town, Massachusetts Legislature, and Senate.

The eleventh water-power privilege, a fifteen-foot fall, is the Diamond Factory, situated on Spring Brook, which rises from Moose Hill and the springs at its base in Sharon, taking a northwesterly direction and emptying into the Neponset River at the centre of Walpole, near the factories of Bradford Lewis & Son. This factory is situated about three-quarters of a mile above. Aug. 20, 1814, Jonathan Wilde and wife deeded this privilege to Samuel Hartshorn and Daniel Kingsbury, with dam, fifteen-foot water-fall, and a factory to be built thereon by said Jonathan Wilde. A company of farmers, mechanics, capitalists, and traders formed a copartnership and owned this factory and privilege. As no record of it can be found, and no one that I have been able to find knows who they all were, will give the names of those who I have heard were stockholders. Josiah Hill, Daniel Kingsbury, Nathaniel Guild, Herman Guild, James Guild, Ebenezer Hartshorn, Samuel Allen, Robert Robertson, one of the proprietors, Daniel Kingsbury, agent, and manufactured cotton cloth several years. Hartshorn & Kingsbury manufactured cotton cloth in 1868. Hemp twine was made there.

Feb. 27, 1829, by an act of the General Court of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, Diamond Manufacturing Company was incorporated; number of shares, twenty-four. Twelve shares signed over to Smith Gray by Daniel Carpenter, of Foxborough, identified him as interested there. March 14, 1842, Asa Whitman, who had been a manufacturer of cotton cloth for a term of years, signed by deed this property to his son, Henry C. Whitman, who, Aug. 1, 1844, signed his interest to Smith Gray, who, Oct. 1, 1844, leased to Stetson & Bullard—Joshua Stetson, Jr., and William Bullard—for five years this Diamond Manufacturing Company's property. In 1858, Simeon Clap was the owner of this factory. He had been a manufacturer of straw bonnets from 1842 until 1850; a manufacturer of lamp-wicking and twine until he purchased this privilege, after which he manufactured stocking-yarn, twine thread, and Java canvas. Mr. Clap died in 1881, since which time this property has been conveyed to Bradford Lewis & Son, and is used for burring wool.

The Royal Smith Machine-Shop is situated one-quarter of a mile above Diamond Factory, on Spring Brook. Oct. 3, 1840, Royal Smith erected a machine-shop, and carried on the manufacturing of cotton and woolen machinery about six years. It was, after lying idle a term of time, used for the purpose of cleansing waste. About the year 1860 it took fire and burned down. About four years ago (1880), Nathan Clark bought the privilege and built a saw-mill, rebuilt the dam, and within the past year has built an additional building in which he has a planing-mill, gig-saw, and a shingle-mill. His son, Alton N. Clark, is the owner and proprietor.

In old times, eighty years or more, there were two furniture manufacturers in Walpole,—Josiah Hill and Horace Guild. Josiah Hill, on East Street near where now stands Catholic Church; Horace Guild, on Walpole plain.

Bradford Lewis & Son, manufacturers and dealers in cotton waste for cleaning machinery. In 1872, Bradford Lewis built a factory on Neponset River, where Spring Brook empties into that river, in which he has continued the manufacture of cotton waste for cleaning machinery to the present time.

In 1881 he erected a paper-mill near by his other factory, in which he has made bookbinders' board, and still continues the same.

Mr. Lewis had, previous to building these two buildings, been engaged at intervals of time in manufacturing. In 1864 at South Walpole, in 1868 with his brother, and also at G. P. Morey's mill privilege, principally in the same business above mentioned.

Deacon Jeremiah Allen seems to have been the first, or at least one of the first, manufacturers of twine here. In 1832 he began the business in the Allen neighborhood, near his residence. In 1866 he formed a copartnership with Samuel Allen, Jr. They built another factory, running parallel, near the old one, and continued the business until the death-of Jeremiah Allen.

Samuel Allen, Jr., then purchased the interest belonging to him, and has continued the same, lately associating with himself his son, now Samuel Allen & Son. They manufacture several hundred kinds, in different lengths, size, color, etc., confining the manufactory to one building, leasing the other to Aaron E. Clap, who is engaged in manufacturing jewelers' cotton and absorption cotton. Samuel Gilbert, who had been for many years a manufacturer in Walpole, died Dec. 26, 1883, aged eighty-three years and four months. He learned the hoe manufacture of Joshua Stetson, and, after his day's work was done, used to engage in the manufacture of straw bonnets.

More than fifty years ago he built a shop, and employed quite a number of girls there, and a large number about town, manufacturing straw bonnets. He was associated, in company with Horace Plimpton, for several years, after which he continued, until quite late in life, manufacturing for D. D. Curtis, Medfield, who pays him a handsome tribute of respect: "For twelve years or more he has manufactured for me without a fault. He was honest and true. He died honored and respected." Horace Plimpton was engaged in the manufacture of hoop-skirts from 1859 until 1869. Prince & Woodward succeeded them a short time. John Blackburn succeeded him a short season. J. B. Hannahs & Barney manufactured hoop-skirts a short time. J. B. Hannahs, in 1841, commenced manufacturing carriages for a season. Billings Ellis commenced the manufacture of carriages, wagons, and sleighs in 1849, and has continued the same business to the present day. Ephraim Shepard began the manufacture of carriages in 1822, and continued it quite extensively, at one time for thirty years or more. Mr. Nathaniel Bird came to Walpole in 1801, engaged in the manufacture of chaises and coaches until 1821, at which time his factory, and himself and brother, were burned together.

April 11, 1825, Squire M. Fales was proprietor of a foundry in the west part of Walpole. Gen. Leach, of Easton, purchased the works, and changed into a blast-furnace, melted the ore, and manufactured machinery of most descriptions then in use. He continued the business until 1845, at which time he sold the property to Thomas and George Campbell for the manufacture of paper. A portion of West Walpole containing that has since been set off to Norfolk. John Bowker was for many years engaged in the manufacture of straw goods. Simeon Clap, in 1842, was engaged in the manufacture of straw goods.

Morey privilege, sixteen-feet fall, is situated on Mill Brook, about half a mile westerly of the town house. Mill Brook takes its rise in Dover, runs southerly through the east corner of Medfield, and empties into Neponset River, near Bradford Lewis & Son's mills. The land occupied by this privilege lying on the south side of this brook was formerly a part of Parson Morey's farm, that part lying on the north side was the property of William Robbins in 1860. In the year 1840, Lewis W. and Erastus Robbins built the dam, erected a machine-shop and manufactured axles, etc., until 1853. Erastus Robbins died, and his brother purchased the personal property of the company and carried on the business until 1855.

In 1854 this privilege became the property of the Hon. George Morey, of Boston. In 1863 it was transferred to Palmer Morey, and in 1868 it was transferred to George P. Morey, its present owner. Lewis W. Robbins and John P. Holmes leased the machine-shop and continued the axle and machinery manufacture until 1858.

A saw-mill and shingle manufactory had been established for quite a length of time, which, together with the machine-shop and privilege, was let to Bradford Lewis, 1868, and used for manufacturing cotton waste, who ran the saw- and shingle-mill a few years. In 1873, E. Frank Lewis hired the whole privilege, ran the saw- and shingle-mill until 1876, at which time they were sold.

In 1873, Mr. Lewis commenced the business of wool-scouring, which has increased, and now, with a full supply of water, is enabled to scour two hundred thousand pounds per week. He has also extensive ice-houses.

Walpole Dye and Chemical Works, Henry D. Dupee, proprietor, is situated at the junction of the New York and New England and Old Colony Railroads, and was incorporated in March, 1872. Seven buildings, inclosed in an area of about three acres; manufacture colors and mordants used in print-works.

Bleaching establishment, R. S. Gray, proprietor. About fifty years ago, Smith Gray commenced the bleaching and coloring business on the now known Deacon Willard Lewis privilege, afterwards discovering the beautiful clear spring water in abundance, where now the present proprietor, Robert S. Gray, is doing business.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

EVERETT STETSON.

The ancestor of the Stetson family in America was Robert Stetson, who came from the county of Kent, England, and settled in Scituate in the year 1634. He was one of the most noted and valuable men in Plymouth Colony, and held many offices of trust and responsibility. Everett Stetson, seventh in descent from Robert, was the son of Capt. Joshua and Nabby (Everett) Stetson. His father was extensively engaged in the manufacture of agricultural implements. Stetson's hoes were famed far and wide. He was an active, energetic business man, and a captain in the militia, by which title he was universally known. He had two sons, Joshua and Everett, the younger of which is the subject of this sketch. Everett Stetson was born in Walpole July 31, 1803, and died in the same town Nov. 9, 1870. He married, Oct. 6, 1825, Mary P. Adams, of Medway. Their children were Aaron E., who died in September, 1875, and Edward P., who still resides in Walpole.

Mr. Stetson received a common-school and academic education. He learned his father's trade, and was engaged in that business from 1827 until 1830. He then entered the foundry business, in which he continued till 1845, when, finding that it could not be carried on successfully without removal to a larger centre, he started the manufacture of machine card clothing for cotton and woolen machinery. This was not an easy undertaking, and for success required perseverance, energy, and untiring industry, which characteristics Mr. Stetson possessed in a large degree. This business he established on a firm basis, and after carrying it on for more than twenty years (from 1845 to 1867) he retired with a competency, leaving his son Edward P. as his successor. Everett Stetson was an influential member of the Congregational Church at Walpole for many years. He held the office of deacon from 1828 to 1870, and was also a superintendent of the Sabbath-school. By his death Walpole lost a good citizen and the church a true Christian helper. While unostentatious in his giving, he did not withhold a helping hand from worthy charities or public benefactions, but gave liberally. He was a man of strict integrity and many virtues, and one whose life well merited the confidence and esteem which he received.

EBENEZER STONE, M.D.

Dr. Ebenezer Stone was born at Sherborn, Mass., Oct. 10, 1797. He was of old New England Puritan ancestry, being of the seventh generation in lineal descent from Gregory Stone, who emigrated to New England from Nayland, Suffolk Co., England, about 1635, and became one of the earliest settlers of Cambridge, Mass.

Gregory Stone (1) married at Nayland, July 30, 1617, Margaret Garrad. She died Aug. 4, 1626, and he married as his second wife the widow Lydia Cooper, of Dedham, Essex Co., England, who accompanied him to New England. He took the freeman's oath May 25, 1636. He was a deacon of the First Church at Cambridge, and was the last survivor of its original members. He was also a magistrate, and a representative to the General Assembly in 1638. He died at Cambridge, Nov. 30, 1672, aged eighty-two years.

The eldest son of Gregory Stone (1), by his first wife, Margaret Garrad, was John Stone (2), born at Nayland, England, and baptized there, according to the parish records, July 31, 1618. He came to New England with his father, and in 1638, while still under age, settled at Sudbury, Mass., but after his father's death he inherited the homestead at Cambridge, and resided there during the remainder of his life. He was a deacon of the church at Sudbury, and ruling elder of the church at Cambridge, and representative to the General Assembly in 1682 and 1683. He married in 1639, Anne Howe, daughter of Elder Edward Howe, of Watertown, Mass., and died at Cambridge, May 5, 1683.

The fourth and youngest son of John (2) and Anne (Howe) Stone, was Nathaniel Stone (3), born at Sudbury, May 11, 1660. He married, April 25, 1684, Sarah Waite, daughter of Capt. John Waite, of Malden, Mass., and died at Framingham, Mass., October, 1732.

The second son of Nathaniel (3) and Sarah (Waite) Stone, was Ebenezer Stone (4). He was born at Framingham, Mass., April 16, 1688; married May 10, 1721, Prudence Pratt, daughter of Joseph Pratt, of Framingham, and died at Framingham in 1739.

Silas Stone (5), the fourth son of Ebenezer (4) and Prudence (Pratt) Stone, was born at Framingham, April 29, 1728. He married, Jan. 25, 1750, Elizabeth Russell, daughter of Deacon Jonathan Russell, of Sherborn, Mass. About 1763 he removed to Dublin, N. H., being one of the first settlers of that town, and he died there in 1777.

Silas Stone (6), the fourth son of Silas (5) and Elizabeth (Russell) Stone, was born at Natick, Mass., April 5, 1755. He accompanied his father to Dublin, N. H., but after his father's death he returned to Massachusetts and settled in Sherborn, where, Jan. 9, 1781, he married Jeanette Twitchell, daughter of Deacon Jonathan Twitchell, of Sherborn. He died at Sherborn, July 12, 1820.

Dr. Ebenezer Stone (7), the subject of this sketch, was the sixth son of Silas and Jeanette (Twitchell) Stone. He inherited from his father an unusual love for books, and he early decided to complete his education by a collegiate course and to follow a professional career. Having pursued his preparatory studies under Rev. Joseph Wheaton, of Holliston, and Charles Train, of Framingham, he entered Brown University, and was graduated A. B. in 1820, and two years later took the second degree of A. M. After graduating from college he began the study of medicine with Dr. John Kittridge, of Framingham. He completed his medical studies at the Harvard Medical School, where he took the degree of M. D. in 1824. Soon after he settled at Walpole, Mass., where the remainder of his life was passed and where he pursued the practice of his profession nearly up to the time of his death. He married at Walpole, Nov. 23, 1831, Elizabeth Holbrook Hawes, daughter of John Holbrook and Achsah (Barber) Hawes. She was born at Roxbury, Mass., May 10, 1809, and died at Walpole, Aug. 18, 1860. Of this marriage were born six children, four sons and two daughters, all of whom, except one daughter, survived their father. Dr. Stone died Aug. 13, 1869, in the seventy-second year of his age. During the later years of his life he was assisted in his practice by his son, Dr. S. E. Stone, who had also followed the profession of medicine and who succeeded to his father's practice. The son still fills at Walpole the place so long held by his father.

The life of a country physician offers few events to add interest to a sketch of the nature of this one. The record of Dr. Stone's life is simply one of arduous duties well and faithfully performed. Outside his professional labors, his chief interest was in the cause of education, and he gave much time and attention to the schools of the town, where his sound learning and scholarly tastes made his advice and assistance of great value. His character is well described in the following extract from a notice of him published at the time of his death:

"He was remarkable for calm, deliberate consideration of questions of importance, and the value of his judgment upon contingencies of serious result. In consequence of certain peculiarities of habit and manner he did not escape without wounds, but he never failed to win respect for fidelity to his own convictions. Contemplating the inevitable changes of nature and aware of his own diseased physical condition, he looked forward to the approaching close of life with utmost serenity,—as a journey onward to another home, and a reunion with the kindred and friends who were gone before. He continued the faithful service of his life 'without haste and without rest,' until, after a few days of physical suffering, and in the confidence of Christian faith and hope, he laid down his work on earth and entered on the work and the joys of immortality."

FRANCIS WILLIAM BIRD.

Francis William Bird was born at Dedham, Mass., Oct. 22, 1809. He was son of George and Martha (Newell) Bird, and is the last survivor of eight children. His father was engaged in paper-making as early as 1807, at Mill Village, Dedham, and followed that calling till 1835. His death occurred in 1854. When Francis was nine years of age his father removed to East Walpole. Francis in his early years attended school about six months of the year, and spent the rest of the time at work in his father's mill. He was then sent to Day's Academy, at Wrentham, and in 1827 entered Brown University, graduating in 1831. By reason of ill health for about one year he was compelled to desist from all mental labor. Then, with health partially restored, he decided to enter business. On April 1, 1833, he commenced business in a mill hired of and formerly run by his brother, Josiah N. Bird, at East Walpole. This mill he bought in 1834. In 1838 he bought the mill of the Neponset Paper Company, next above him on the same stream, and soon after formed a copartnership with his father and brother-in-law under the firm-name of George Bird & Sons. In 1842, George Bird & Sons failed, and Mr. Bird passed through bankruptcy. After F. W. Bird had been cleared of his legal liabilities he again went to work at the same place and in the same business, and in a few years was able to pay all the old debts in full. He is now at the head of the firm of F. W. Bird & Son, his partner being his son, Charles Sumner Bird.

Mr. Bird has been long and prominently connected with Massachusetts politics. He was first elected as member of the Legislature of 1847. He has since been a member of that body, in 1848, 1867, 1869, 1877, and 1878. He was a member of the Executive Council in 1852, 1863-65; a member of the Constitutional Convention in 1853, a State senator in 1871, and the Democratic candidate for the Governorship in 1872.

Mr. Bird married, in 1834, Rebecca Hill Cooke, daughter of Benoni Cooke, of Providence. Of this union one daughter was born. Mrs. Bird died in 1835, and the child in 1836. In 1843 he married Abby Frances Newell, daughter of Joseph R. Newell, of Boston. Six children have been born to them, all of whom survive except the oldest son, who died in 1874.

One who has known Mr. Bird well in different relations for more than thirty years adds the following remarks upon his character and life:

"He has been a very prominent figure in the politics of Massachusetts from 1846 to the present time (1884). In 1846-48 he was active in the anti-slavery section of the Whig party, sometimes called "Conscience Whigs," then led by Charles F. Adams, Charles Sumner, Stephen C. Phillips, Henry Wilson, John G. Palfrey, and Charles Allen, and, though much younger than most of these gentlemen, was called into their conferences and enjoyed their confidence. He joined the Free-Soil movement in 1848. From that time until the abolition of slavery in the United States and the reconstruction of the South on the basis of equal rights, he was one of the most efficient organizers of the political movement against slavery known as Free-Soil and later Republican, and exercised a marked influence on its policy and nominations. He uniformly attended its conventions, particularly the State Conventions; and his open rooms during the previous evening, where he met delegates in a friendly way and conferred as to pending questions and candidacies, were for a long period a centre of great interest. Altogether no man in his day has done so much to bring together in a social way those who were united by the idem sentire de republica. As Governor Andrew said of him, he 'deserved gratitude for what he had done to promote good-fellowship.' Though a doctrinaire in his theories, Mr. Bird has in his political course kept practical results in view, and he efficiently promoted, in 1850, the union between the Free-Soilers and Democrats which made Mr. Sumner senator and Mr. Boutwell Governor. He has, however, always opposed ambiguous and timid courses, even in seasons when popular currents were running strongly against direct and courageous action. He stood firmly in 1853-56 against the Know-Nothing, or Native American party, when his anti-slavery associates in large numbers joined in or dallied with it; and in periods of pressure, when many were wavering and disposed to make concessions, he always supported a radical and uncompromising policy against slavery. In all the conflicts of Massachusetts politics for twenty-five years, in all the efforts to place the State on the highest plane of moral and political antagonism to slavery, no man's counsels and co-operation were more valued. At critical periods involving public interests or their own political careers, two public men may be named who turned to him with a confidence which they gave to few others,—Charles Sumner and John A. Andrew. He refused in 1872 to support President Grant for a re-election, disapproving certain features of his administration, and condemning particularly his unjust treatment of Mr. Sumner. He has since acted generally with the Democrats, though refusing to sustain their nominations when deeming them unworthy of support.

"Mr. Bird has taken a constant interest in the affairs of his State. He has guarded with vigilance the public treasury, and has been assiduous in promoting what he deemed the best plans for utilizing the public property. He has often started, organized, and led the opposition to schemes for wasting the funds of the State in ruinous investments in railroads, notably in the Hoosac Tunnel, and, after the first two loans, in the Boston, Hartford, and Erie.

"As a controversialist, both in politics and in matters relating to public property and interests, he has hardly had a peer in the history of the State. His writings and reports in pamphlets and newspapers have been marked by a faithful study of the facts, a clear and forcible treatment of the subject, and when it seemed necessary, a trenchant discussion of individual action and conduct.

"It is very rare that any man has had so wide a circle of friends, varying, indeed, opposite in their tastes and opinions. On three different occasions they have borne testimony to his worth and services,—on his fiftieth birthday, at the Revere House, in Boston, when Mr. Andrew, in behalf of himself and other intimate friends, presented him with a memorial of affection; on the twenty-fifth anniversary of his marriage, when, from the neighborhood and distant places, early and later friends went to East Walpole to give their congratulations; and on the commemoration of his seventieth birthday, when he was met at the Revere House by about two hundred friends, from all walks in life, divided in pursuits and associations, and was congratulated at the dinner in speeches from gentlemen well known in the public life of the State.

"Without large means, Mr. Bird has observed great simplicity in his ways of life. He has suffered from ill health for a long period, but his vital force has enabled him largely to counteract physical disability. He will be remembered for his originality, freshness, and sincerity, his tender sympathies in bereavement, his loyalty in friendship, and his generous help to the unfortunate. Those whose knowledge of men has been various, find his strong personality vividly stamped on their minds, not as one of a familiar type, but separate and distinct by itself, adding a new experience of human character."

MILTON.

Pioneer History—The First Settlements—Stoughton, Glover, and Hutchinson—Grant of the Territory to Dorchester—Release of Indian Title—Cutshamoquin—Location of First Settlements—King Philip's War—Prominent Early Settlers—Biographical Sketches of Prominent Citizens—Robert Vose, Robert Tucker, Benjamin Wadsworth, Joseph Belcher, Oxenbridge Thatcher, John Swift, Peter Thatcher, Dr. Miller, Samuel Miller, Governor Belcher, William Foye, Col. Gooch, Governor Hutchinson, James Smith, Oxenbridge Thatcher, Jr., Samuel Swift, Nathaniel Tucker, Seth Adams, William Foye, Jr., Joseph Gooch, Benjamin Pratt, Col. Joseph Vose, Job Sumner, John Miller, Benj. Wadsworth, W. S. Hutchinson, Josiah Badoock, Samuel Henshaw, Edward H. Robbins, Rufus Badoock, Thomas Thatcher, Jesse Tucker, J. S. Boies, Nathaniel J. Robbins, John M. Forbes, Solomon Vose, Roger Vose, Charles P. Sumner, etc.

FOR six years after the arrival in Massachusetts Bay of Governor Winthrop, with the charter, in 1630, and the great accompanying emigration connected with this movement, all the territory comprised within the present borders of Milton remained a part of the undivided lands of the colony, and during this period three gentlemen, who were doubtless members or stockholders of the company before they left England,—Israel Stoughton, John Glover, and William Hutchinson,—selected a part of the land dividends to which they were entitled within our limits. They were probably attracted by certain natural advantages which belonged to the locality,—the water-falls in the river, the convenience for ship-building offered by the tide-waters, an abundant supply of ship-timber, and, above all, the fertility of much of the land. Stoughton and Glover were prominent men in the Dorchester plantation, and the pioneers of civilization upon this soil.

Mr. Stoughton selected one hundred and sixty acres of land connected with the lower falls, including nearly the whole of Milton Hill, and the front on the river to the bend, where the ship-yard of Mr. Briggs was located. Nearly all this property continued in him and his heirs for more than twenty years, when it was sold to John Gill, in 1656. He was an active, public-spirited man, of the true Cromwellian type, engaged in every movement for the benefit of the colony, resisting the conspiracies of the Indians, founding the college, and during the twelve years of his residence in Dorchester, the whole time occupying an important place as deputy or councilor in the government, or commanding the forces in the Indian wars in Connecticut and Rhode Island. In 1644 he left his family and embarked for England, where he died the following year, the colonel of a Parliamentary regiment engaged in the great revolution of that day.

Mr. Glover selected a lot directly south of Milton Hill, of one hundred and eighty acres, on the flat fronting on the northwest by the brook, and southeast on the centre line of the town, where he laid out a farm, and after the annexation of this territory to Dorchester, built a house near where the brook reaches the road by Mr. Davis'. This farm was occupied many years by his agent or tenant, Nicholas Wood, until it was sold in 1654 by the heirs to Robert Vose. Mr. Glover, besides employing himself much in commerce, was often representative for Dorchester, and many years assistant or councilor. Capt. Johnson describes him as a plain, sincere, godly man, strong for the truth, and of good abilities. His name is frequently mentioned as attending the meetings of the company in London before the emigration. He left several sons, and his posterity is numerous in New England now.

Mr. William Hutchinson belonged to the Lincolnshire company, who came with Rev. Mr. Cotton and settled at Boston. Mount Wollaston, or Braintree, was early ceded to the town of Boston, with a view of supplying the inhabitants of the peninsula with such lands as they might desire. Mr. Hutchinson laid out a large tract, doubtless supposing it to be within the Braintree line, but when a survey was made in laying out the towns of Braintree and Dorchester, a large part of Hutchinson's lot was found to fall within the line of the latter town; in fact, included the whole east corner of the town of Milton, besides a large tract within the Braintree line. The title, however, was confirmed to him, including all the land east of Gulliver's brook to the present Quincy line, and was sold in 1656 by his son, Capt. Edward Hutchinson, to Anthony Gulliver, Stephen Kinsley, and Henry Crane.

Mr. Hutchinson's career in Massachusetts was very soon terminated through the proceedings instituted by the colony and clergy against his wife, Ann Hutchinson, upon the charge of heresy, of which she and some of her adherents were convicted, by a synod held at Cambridge, and banished from the colony.

Edward, the son of William Hutchinson, soon returned to Boston, and spent a long life as a most active and useful citizen in Massachusetts, and was finally killed in the service of the colony at Brookfield, in Philip's war, 1676, in command of a cavalry corps. His posterity made a figure for four generations, in almost every post, civil and military, in the colony. Governor Hutchinson, his great-grandson, was long connected with the town.

In 1636 the town of Dorchester obtained a grant of nearly the whole territory now comprising the town of Milton, which was the first of a liberal series of grants made by the colony to that important town. This movement was the signal for the commencement of the actual occupation and settlement of Milton, and the twenty-five years which passed, during the connection with Dorchester until the independent establishment of the town, sufficed to collect about thirty families, with which the town's separate career began. It was usual, in occupying new territory at that time, to obtain a release of the Indian title from their chiefs; and accordingly, in October, 1636, the Neponset Sagamore Cutshamoquin, for twenty-eight fathoms of wampum conveys, for the use of the Dorchester plantation, all the land south of Neponset to the Blue Hills, to Richard Collicot (town corporations not then created), reserving certain lands which he had heretofore given to Callicot for himself. Mr. Collicot's name appears among the early inhabitants of Dorchester, and he is mentioned as a licensed fur-dealer, which occupation seems to have brought him early into intimate relations with the native Indians. He obtained a lot of one hundred and twenty acres at Unquety (doubtless the Pratt farm), and built there a house, perhaps the first dwelling in the town. He seems to have been a most active and useful man,—selectman and deputy for the town of Dorchester, officer of the artillery company, member of the Synod at Cambridge; at one time trading with the settlements in Maine, now aiding Governor Endicott in the Narragansett war, then assisting the apostle Eliot in collecting the Indians for religious service at the falls,—an energetic, ubiquitous man, whose permanent residence it is difficult to fix, but his connection with our settlement is traced during fifty years. He was trustee of our meeting-house fund in 1664. He died at Boston, 1686.

John Holman procured a grant of one hundred and ten acres adjoining Collicot (the Rowe farm), and settled there very early, and the property remained in his family nearly a century. The Stoughton and Hutchinson lots occupied all the northeast front of the town, excepting the space between Gulliver's Brook and a line crossing the road near the Swift house, which space was divided into three lots, fronting on the marshes,—the first or north lot, of one hundred and twenty acres, occupied by William Daniels, who built his house near the Foye mansion;¹ the second, of sixty acres, laid out by Nehemiah Bourne, a London ship-carpenter living at Boston, who never occupied it, but returned to England with Stoughton, and became a major in his regiment; the third lot, of fourteen acres, fronting on Gulliver's Creek, laid out for Bray Wilkins, a Dorchester man, who was licensed in 1638 to keep a ferry across Neponset, to facilitate the intercourse between Boston and Mount Wollaston before the roads were made.

The Massachusetts colony was at this time much favored by Cromwell, for their early sympathy and co-operation in the revolution, while all the other colonies, adhering to the Stuarts, were punished with restrictions and embarrassments. An exemption from duties, and free trade with all the world, was permitted to Massachusetts, and this stimulated the business of ship-building. Several persons of this calling took up their residence here, in the east part of the town, such as William Salisbury, Anthony Newton, Walter Morey, and others. It is probable they were occupied in building small vessels (of thirty or forty tons) called shallops, much used about the bay in fishing and coasting trade, and they undoubtedly used the head of the tide on Gulliver's Creek, where the town still owns the landing, as such craft could easily be floated out at spring tides, and that location was more convenient to get the timber than the banks of the river. The residence of these persons was mainly in that vicinity.

At this period the principal occupants of the place were located in the eastern section of the town, and the latter part of the time they were exempted from contributing to the support of the Dorchester Church, by reason of having provided themselves with religious instruction in conjunction with some persons from Braintree. No record exists of their place of worship or who taught them. It is probable that Stephen Kinsley—who was ordained with much formality as a ruling elder at Braintree in 1653, and had moved on to the Hutchinson purchase—first officiated in that place, which was the only public service held in the town until the erection of the first meeting-house, in 1671, built on the land set apart and appropriated to that purpose by Robert Vose on a part of his farm (near Mr. Barnard's). Mr. Kinsley had been an inhabitant and representative of Braintree several years before he moved here, and he was the first representative of Milton. The petition for incorporation was drawn by him, and is among the archives of the State, signed by himself, Robert Vose, and John Gill, as a committee of the inhabitants. The principal argument used was the necessity of providing legally for public worship.

"The elders continued to be consulted in every affair of importance as long as the charter continued. The share they had in temporal affairs added to the weight they had acquired from their spiritual employments, and they were in high esteem."²

There were a few scattered farms in other parts of the town. Samuel Wadsworth, a young man, son of a Plymouth pilgrim, moved here from Duxbury, and selected a large lot running from the centre of the town, to the southeast line, a mile or more from any other inhabitant. John Fenno, of Dorchester, occupied a lot near the burying-ground. Robert Badcock occupied a large lot between the river and the brook, next to Mr. Vose. All the west portion of the town was run out into lots, about sixteen hundred and fifty, and divided among the inhabitants of Dorchester, magistrates and ministers receiving large lots, and persons of less note small strips a mile long and hardly wide enough to build a corn-barn upon. Of these, the Brush Hill lots were first occupied, but there is no sufficient evidence of the presence of inhabitants there before the incorporation.

The main landing-place on the river was originally designed by Mr. Stoughton to have been fixed where Mr. Brigg's ship-yard was located, but was changed to its present site, near the falls, on petition of John Gill, in 1658. Four hundred acres of land in the centre of the town was laid out for the benefit of the Dorchester Church, in 1659; afterwards divided with the Milton Church.

The Neponset tribe of Indians were removed from their proximity to our settlement in 1656, and placed on a large tract of land at Punkapog, granted to them by the town of Dorchester, at the urgent solicitation of Mr. Eliot, who regarded the movement as essential to their welfare.

"I will now advert," says Mr. Robbins, "to another subject which seems to belong to this period, and which by some may be considered too uncertain to merit a place in our history. A certain locality within our present borders has long been known, without any data as to the origin of the name, as Scotch Woods. The explanation I am about to offer is unsupported by any record, and is entirely conjectural with myself. In 1643, John Winthrop, Jr., came from England, and brought one thousand pounds' worth of stock and divers workmen to begin an iron-work. He had formed in England a company for this purpose. The General Court of Massachusetts encouraged the enterprise by granting a monopoly for twenty-one years, freedom from taxes and trainings of the laborers, and a very liberal grant of the colonial lands to be made when the works were completed. The town of Boston was greatly interested in the undertaking, and the location of the works at Braintree was encouraged by a grant of three thousand acres of land, still belonging to Boston, at that place. This tract is the same land which was purchased seventy years afterwards, in 1711, by Manasseh Tucker, Samuel Miller, and John Wadsworth, of Milton, and divided by the court between Braintree and Milton at that time. The fifteen hundred acres attached to our jurisdiction forms the present Scotch Woods settlement. In 1651 two of the largest stockholders of this iron company, residing in London, viz., John Beex and Robert Rich, chartered a large ship, bound to Jamaica, to touch at Boston and land there two hundred and seventy-two Scotch prisoners taken from a lot of eight thousand prisoners captured by Cromwell, Sept. 3, 1650, at the battle of Dunbar. The ship arrived at Boston in May, 1651, and landed the prisoners consigned to the agent of the iron-works, and their names are all recorded in the Boston records."

In July of the same year the Rev. John Cotton wrote a letter to Cromwell, as follows :

"The Scots whom God delivered into your hands at Dunbar, and whereof sundry were sent hither, we have been desirous to make their yoke easy. Such as were sick of the scurvy or other diseases have not wanted physic and chirurgy. They have not been sold for slaves to perpetual servitude, but for six or eight years, as we do our own, and he that bought the most of them, I believe, buildeth houses for them, for every four an house, layeth some acres of land thereto, which he giveth them as their own, requiring three days in the week to work for him (by turns), and four days for themselves, and promiseth as soon as they can repay him the money he laid out for them, he will set them at liberty."

We infer from these circumstances that Beex and Rich, for themselves or the company, thinking to get some income from their land, which without laborers was unproductive and inconvertible, embarked in this speculation, and the mode of disposing of the prisoners mentioned by Cotton was only a form necessary to satisfy the public mind in the matter, and the men were employed on this land belonging to the freighters of the ship in the way described in this letter; and thus originated the name, Scotch Woods, ever since attached to the spot. This supposition is confirmed by an act of the General Court, A.D. 1652, ordering that all Scotchmen and negroes shall train,—referring, doubtless, to their first law exempting the laborers of the iron company from this duty. These persons may have been employed in cutting wood or collecting bog-ore for the iron company.¹ The result of this operation was that after a large outlay of capital it was found that every pound of iron made cost more than two pounds imported from Europe; the company failed, the sheriff seized their effects, and their laborers were dispersed and mixed up with the general population of the country. The land was probably a conditional grant, and reverted to the town of Boston, from which corporation our townsmen bought it.

The records of the town for nearly eight years from the beginning are missing, excepting that of a few births. Two years after the organization, Robert Vose made a deed of eight acres of land (for a meeting-house and other ministerial purposes) to eighteen trustees, probably every church member or freeman in the town.² No church organization was formed here till 1678, but the principal inhabitants were members of the Dorchester and Braintree churches. Of these eighteen persons eight have descendants still among us, and these families have inhabited the town during its whole existence, viz.: Robert Vose, Samuel Wadsworth, Anthony Gulliver, Robert Badcock, Thomas Swift, George Sumner, Robert Tucker, and Henry Crane. The first tax-list on record, of fifty-nine persons, is dated 1674, and the name of only one of our present families, Teague Crebore, is added to the above list of trustees in the interval from 1664 to 1674. Many of the lots in the western part of the town were soon occupied, especially at Brush Hill.

George Sumner, whose father, William Sumner, of Dorchester, had drawn one of the large lots in that locality, occupied the same in 1662.

Robert Tucker, who had resided more than twenty years at Weymouth, came and purchased several adjoining lots. He brought a family of four sons and three daughters; his oldest son twenty-two years of age.

¹ Governor Bradstreet writes, twenty years later, that some of the Dunbar prisoners were still in bondage.

Thomas Swift, son of T. Swift, of Dorchester, married the only daughter of Mr. Vose, and is supposed to have occupied a part of the Glover farm, conveyed to him by his father-in-law.

Ten years passed from the date of the incorporation before a new meeting-house was built, the small accommodation for worship in the eastern part of the town being made to suffice. Mr. Joseph Emerson officiated as the first minister for several years, under adverse circumstances part of the time. Great difficulty existed in the currency. The whole town, and a part of the adjoining town of Braintree, with all their zeal for religious instruction, could not raise fifty-three pounds, or one hundred and seventy-five dollars, per annum, the stipulated salary. Mr. Emerson, who at first was passed about from one parishioner to another, made shift to live without embarrassment, but venturing to marry the daughter of the Rev. Edward Bulkly, of Concord, and establish a house of his own, "the country pay," as it was called, in which he received most of his dues, compelled him to open a running account with every man in the parish. Misunderstandings ensued, rendering his position disagreeable, and he accepted an invitation to settle at Mendon, and left the town in 1669.

Some other occurrences, simultaneous with this period, which affected the whole colony, as well as our town, deserve mention.

We had grown up into a vigorous community in a space of thirty-five years, not by the fostering care of the mother-country, but by her neglect and engrossing engagements elsewhere, although it must be confessed we did receive some encouragement from the partiality of Master Oliver. Now, in 1660, all this is over; the king is restored again, and some active enemies of Massachusetts in England enter sundry complaints against us, and make the charge of various violations of the charter. The king appointed four commissioners, armed with full power, to come over and examine all grievances and correct all abuses. We had coined money without authority, encroaching on the king's privilege; we had prohibited the exercise of all forms of worship except our own, especially that of the English Church, and would not allow the privileges of citizenship except to professors of a certain creed; and then we had sheltered certain regicides, who had compassed the death of the king's father, and had committed various other misdemeanors.

The arrival of these commissioners caused much anxiety, and all the skill and diplomacy of our wisest men were used to parry these charges. Finally, by giving up the matter of church membership as a qualification of voters, promising to make no more pine-tree shillings, and making a sham effort to arrest the regicides, the commissioners went home, and the colony retained for a time longer the charter. This result, so earnestly hoped for, was aided greatly by sundry ship-loads of masts and other presents to the king. The great benefit to the colony was the extension of the right of suffrage, which till then had been confined to a small part of the community; and the consent of the colony to tolerate in the future the service of the English Church, had the beneficial effect of so far liberalizing the colonial government that no further prosecutions against other sects as heretical were enforced. The extreme rigor which characterized the first years of the colony was in some degree mitigated when our town commenced its corporate existence.

Now commences a great struggle, which threatens the very existence of the colony,—Philip's Indian war. Philip, a name given by the English to the second son of Massasoit, the sachem of the Pokanoket Indians, with whom the Plymouth Pilgrims entertained such friendly relations, was now at the head of the tribe living at Mount Hope,—a restless, ambitious person, and possessed of much ability. He entertained the opinion that the English would soon control the whole country and destroy the native population, and conceived the idea that by the united action of all the native tribes they might be resisted or driven away. He cautiously enlisted the co-operation of most of the other tribes of New England in his plan. The matter was communicated to the authorities by one of Mr. Eliot's praying Indians of Natick.

All New England was aroused. The Indians had acquired great skill in the use of fire-arms, and the number of fighting men among them was supposed to be superior to those of the whites. Philip appeared with a large force near Swanzy. But the hope of detaching some of the tribes from the alliance induced the government to send Capt. Edward Hutchinson with a company of horse to Brookfield, to negotiate with the Nipmug tribe. Hutchinson had a farm at Marlborough, and was personally known to the chiefs of this tribe, and they designated him as a person they would treat with. By appointment he, with a part of his men, went to meet them in a wood or swamp, where a large body of Indians were concealed. Hutchinson and sixteen of his men were shot, mostly dead. He was carried down to Marlborough, and died a day or two after.

This settled the character of the struggle, and a war of extermination began, which lasted fourteen months, during which almost every man in New England capable of bearing arms was called into service. The Indians appeared in force in every direction,—in the Old Colony at Scituate, Plymouth, and Rehoboth; on Connecticut River at Northampton and Springfield; in Middlesex at Groton and Sudbury; also in Rhode Island, Connecticut, and Maine. Milton, being more sheltered than many other towns, became the refuge of several families from more exposed places, some of whom are still here by their descendants. Edward Adams came from Medfield, Roger Sumner and Ralph Houghton from Lancaster, and Thomas Davenport from Casco Bay.

The Neponset Indians at Punkapog did not appear to belong to the conspiracy; but, to make matters sure, the men of the tribe were all placed under the command of Quartermaster Thomas Swift, and removed first to Long Island in Boston harbor, and afterwards brought up to Milton. Maj. Gookin, in his Indian History, says that Mr. Eliot and himself met every other week, in the winter of 1676, among the Punkapog Indians, who were brought from Long Island and placed near Brush Hill, in Milton, under the care of Quartermaster Swift. They came up late from the island, yet they planted some ground procured for them by Maj. Swift, and they got some little corn. Their wives and children were there with them.

The great interest to Milton in this affair arose from the death of Capt. Wadsworth and several young men belonging to the town. Samuel Wadsworth, already mentioned as an early inhabitant, soon after his arrival married Miss Abigail Lindall, of Duxbury, and spent most of his adult life here. He was an active, intelligent person, named in the Dorchester records before the incorporation of Milton, was always occupied with the affairs of the plantation and the town, zealous in church matters and the military organization, frequently chosen selectman and representative, and also a justice to settle small causes. In the war of 1675-76 he was appointed captain of a company raised in this vicinity, partly in Milton, to serve the colony. John Sharpe, of Brookline, was his lieutenant. In April, 1676, he was ordered to move with his company to Marlborough, to relieve Capt. Brocklebank, of Rowley, supposed to be in peril at that place. Wadsworth and his company arrived safe and unmolested. On the 21st of April news came to him that the Indians were burning the houses at Sudbury, the adjoining town. Wadsworth started with his company of eighty men to meet the foe. Seeing a few Indians, he pursued them into a swamp, when suddenly, from all directions, emerged a cloud of savages, greatly outnumbering his force. He secured a retreat to a neighboring hill, which he successfully defended four hours, with the loss of five men only. His ammunition was expended. The Indians set fire to the wood, when an attempt was made by the troops to force their way through the savage horde, and Wadsworth, Sharpe, Brocklebank, and sixty-five men met their death. Fifteen only escaped to tell the tale. The names of his Milton companions are not preserved. Capt. Wadsworth left five sons, all of whom were respectable men. His youngest son, Benjamin, became president of Harvard College, and erected a monument to his father, at Sudbury, which was renewed, in 1852, by the State.

The war ended in August, 1676, with the death of Philip by the hand of one of his own men. The Indians had previously met defeat in every direction. Some of the leaders were executed at Boston; many prisoners were sent to the West India Islands and sold as slaves, and those who escaped fled to tribes in the West. No formidable attack from the natives ever disturbed the colony again, except as allies of our French neighbors in Canada or instigated by them.

The year 1682 closed the career of two of the oldest inhabitants, Robert Vose and Robert Tucker,¹ both over eighty years. Mr. Vose is not mentioned in the Dorchester records until about the time of his purchase of the Glover farm in 1654; he was then past middle life, and his three children already of adult age. We have no means of knowing his antecedents. His whole career here exhibits him as a public-spirited man, who had brought up his children with care, and who spared no efforts to establish our community upon the surest foundation. Mr. Tucker had been residing in Weymouth, and all his large family were doubtless born in that place. He came to Milton about the time of the incorporation, and purchased several of the lots laid out and drawn by the inhabitants of Dorchester at Brush Hill. He was selected by Mr. Vose as one of the trustees of the church lot, was selectman and representative, also recorder of the town. He was held in much esteem by his neighbors. He left a large family of four sons and four daughters, and his character and education during a long period exercised an important influence here. His handwriting indicates a gentleman familiar with the pen.

¹ Robert Tucker was at Weymouth about the time that town was incorporated, in 1635, and is believed to have accompanied a certain association which came to New England about that time with the Rev. Mr. Hull, from the town of Weymouth, in Dorsetshire, giving that name to Wessagusset. This conjecture is strengthened by the fact that several prominent families of the name of Tucker are inhabitants of that county. John Tucker, a resident of Weymouth, represented the borough of Weymouth and Melcom Regis in Parliament, twenty years in succession, previous to our Revolution.

In 1680 the town was provided with a respectable house of public worship and a regularly organized church.

In 1690 two sons of the town received their degrees at Harvard, viz., Benjamin Wadsworth and Joseph Belcher.

Benjamin Wadsworth, youngest son of Capt. Samuel Wadsworth, was born at Milton in 1669, graduated at Harvard in 1690, studied for the ministry, settled at the First Church in Boston in 1696, and, after a pastoral service of thirty years, was elected to preside over his Alma Mater at Cambridge,—a place which he filled with great acceptance twelve years, till his death, in 1737. His character is portrayed in a sermon by Rev. Thomas Foxcroft, and also more at length by Rev. William Emerson. Dr. Chauncy speaks of him as “a man of good learning, most pious, humble, and prudent, and an excellent, plain, pathetic preacher.” His death occurred at Cambridge. He left a widow, but no children.¹

Joseph Belcher, son of Joseph and Rebecca (Gill) Belcher, was born at Milton in 1668. He inherited a large property from his grandfather, John Gill, when he was fifteen years of age, was educated for the ministry, ordained and settled at Dedham in 1693, where he officiated thirty years with much satisfaction, and died in 1723. His family of two sons and three daughters returned to Milton, and for a time occupied their paternal estate at Milton Hill (the Hutchinson property). The eldest son, Joseph, graduated at college in 1717, lived here in 1734, and was selectman of the town. Their property at Milton Hill was sold about 1740 to Thomas Hutchinson, and the residue of the Stoughton purchase, being the village property, was sold to Jeremiah Smith in 1741. The family left the town at that time.

Cotton Mather preached Mr. Belcher's funeral sermon. He calls him “a tree of righteousness, who had all the fruits of the Holy Spirit growing upon them. Among the articles of his piety was conspicuous, well-governed speech, and the management of the tongue, with which he prevented what the ancients considered as making half the sins of our lives, a gentlemanly temper and carriage, with a sweetness of disposition which was a varnish upon these virtues, and added more lustre unto them.” As a preacher he was greatly admired and followed.

Oxenbridge Thatcher, the eldest son of Rev. Peter Thatcher, was born at Milton in 1681, educated for college by his father, entered at Harvard before the age of fourteen, and graduated in 1698. He is said to have studied for the ministry, and, after preaching a few times, changed his calling, and engaged in trade at Boston, where he lived some twenty-five years, and was occasionally representative of that town. After his father's death he returned to Milton, and occupied his place on Thatcher's plain some forty years. He represented Milton occasionally, and died here in 1772, at the advanced age of ninety-one years. He is better known as the father of an eminent son, Oxenbridge Thatcher, the distinguished lawyer and patriot, who died at Boston in 1767, at the early age of forty-five years.

John Swift was the oldest son of Deacon Thomas Swift. He was born here in 1679, graduated at Harvard in 1697, and was settled as minister at Framingham, where he died, after a long service, in 1745.

Mr. Peter Thatcher, the second son of our minister, was born in 1688, graduated at Harvard College in 1706, and, after studying the clerical profession, was ordained and settled in Middleborough in 1709, and continued there thirty-five years, until his death, in 1744. Rev. Thomas Prince, of the Old South Church, published his life, as an example of zeal and success as a revival preacher.

Dr. Ebenezer Miller was the second son of Samuel Miller. He was born at Milton Hall in 1703, was prepared for college by Mr. Thatcher, and graduated at Harvard in 1722. He commenced the study of divinity at once, and soon manifested a bias for the Episcopal form of worship. A few gentlemen at Braintree, with similar tendencies, proposed to establish a church there, having assurances of aid from England for the furtherance of this project. For this purpose Mr. Miller was encouraged to proceed to England and procure Episcopal ordination (no Episcopal organization existing here). He was ordained by the Bishop of London as deacon and priest, received the degrees of Master of Arts from the University of Oxford in 1727 and Doctor of Theology in 1747, and was appointed missionary to Braintree by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts.

¹ John Wadsworth, son of Deacon John and Elizabeth Wadsworth, of Milton, born in 1703, graduated at Harvard College in 1723, studied for the ministry, and was ordained at Canterbury, Conn., Sept. 3, 1729. He married Abigail Sproat, of Middleborough, separated from his parish, and returned to Milton in 1742, which was his principal residence until his death, in 1766. He officiated in several other places professionally.

He returned, and forthwith entered upon his duties, and continued there until his death, thirty-six years afterwards. Many persons of that persuasion in the neighboring towns attended his ministrations. It is believed he was the first native of the Puritan colony authorized to preach under the Episcopal form.

The Miller family are supposed to have emigrated early from Dorchester to Rehoboth, and during the Indian war, in 1676, to have left the latter place.

Mr. Samuel Miller first appeared in Milton about 1688, possibly led hither by the attractions of Miss Rebecca Belcher, with a nice jointure of sixty acres of land on Milton Hill, all of which became his on his marriage in 1690. He built his house on the lot at that time (the house stood where Mr. Dudley's residence now is, and was taken down some fifty years ago), and there his numerous family were born. He was afterwards, in 1711, one of the Scotch Woods purchasers, and his eldest son, Col. Samuel Miller, built his house there at an early day, and the property continued in the family until the Revolution, when, in 1776, Stephen Miller, of the third generation, a much respected inhabitant of our town, joined the royalist party and emigrated to the province of New Brunswick, where he lived more than forty years, and died in 1817, aged ninety-one. He left numerous descendants, who are still among the most respectable inhabitants of that province. His house was the one now owned by Dr. Palmer.

Allusion has already been made to the acquisition of the Blue Hill lands, in 1711, by the purchase, from the town of Boston, of three thousand acres formerly granted to the iron company, and which reverted to that town from breach of condition. The grantees were Manasseh Tucker, Samuel Miller, and John Wadsworth, all of Milton. The court refused to annex the whole purchase to Milton, but decreed that it should be divided as to jurisdiction between the towns of Braintree and Milton, fifteen hundred acres to each.

In addition to the foregoing, a large tract of land (doubtless a part of the new grant made to Dorchester in 1637), containing, perhaps, one thousand acres, bounded on the southeast by the Blue Hill River, and northwest by the old Milton line, was passed into our limits by consent of the town of Dorchester. This latter piece contains Houghton's pond, and all the lands within our borders above the stone monument near the late Thomas Hunt's house.

By these acquisitions, in 1712-13, the area of the town was extended about two thousand five hundred acres, nearly one-third of its present surface. The Blue Hill purchasers sold a portion of their lands before a division took place, reserving, however, a large part of the best of it for their own posterity. Deacon Manasseh, the youngest son of Robert Tucker, was about fifty-seven years of age at the time of the purchase, and continued to reside at the old homestead at Brush Hill till his death, in 1743, aged eighty-nine years; but his eldest son, Capt. Samuel, then about twenty-six years old, laid out a farm, and moved very soon to the new purchase. The same was done by young Samuel Miller, as already related, and one of Deacon Wadsworth's sons occupied the lot next adjoining the old Wadsworth property. The remainder was soon sold to other persons, and has ever since formed an important section of the town.

We have now, 1730, reached a new era in our history,—the ordination of another minister, the building of a new meeting-house, and a considerable accession to our taxable property by the settlement among us of sundry persons of wealth and importance from the neighboring town of Boston.

The Rev. John Taylor, after preaching several months, was invited to settle here, and was ordained on the 13th of November, 1728. Mr. Foxcroft, of the Old South Church, Boston, preached the ordination sermon, which is in print.

Mr. Taylor was born in Boston in 1704, and was the son of Mr. John Taylor, who came to Boston from Wales in the latter part of the seventeenth century. Mr. Taylor, the elder, married Ann Winslow, the daughter of Edward Winslow, of the Pilgrim family. (She survived her son, and died in Milton in 1773, at the advanced age of ninety-five years.) Shortly after the birth of the Rev. Mr. Taylor, his parents removed to the island of Jamaica, where they had four more children, viz.: Col. William Taylor, whose descendants are still with us, and three daughters. Mr. Taylor, the father, died in Jamaica, and his widow, with her young family, returned to her native country. She educated her son John at Harvard College, where he graduated in 1721, in the class with Dr. Charles Chauncy, with whom he kept up an intimate friendship until his death. Two years after his settlement here he married Elizabeth, the daughter of Rev. Nathaniel Rogers, of Portsmouth, N. H. They had three sons and one daughter. Mrs. Taylor died in 1735, at the early age of twenty-seven years, and some years afterwards Mr. Taylor married the sister of his first wife, Miss Dorothy Rogers, who survived her husband. Mr. Taylor left three sons and one daughter, Mrs. Ann Gilman, of Exeter.

Mr. Taylor died here in 1750, at the age of forty-six years.

The births of his children, as recorded in the Milton records, are,—John, born in 1731; Nathaniel, born in 1734; William, born in 1735; and Ann, his only daughter, born in 1732, married Nicholas Gilman, of Exeter, State treasurer of New Hampshire, parents of Governor John Taylor Gilman, Nicholas Gilman, of the United States Senate from 1805 to 1814, and Nathaniel Gilman, of the Senate of New Hampshire.

The new inhabitants referred to at this time were the Governor of the province, Jonathan Belcher; the provincial treasurer, Mr. Foye; Col. Joseph Gooch, James Smith, Thomas Hutchinson, and others. I presume this movement was caused in a great degree by the uncertain condition of the Massachusetts currency, which rendered real estate investments desirable for capitalists. The Indian wars, and more particularly the wars with our French neighbors, who possessed the present British provinces of Nova Scotia and Canada,—wars precipitated upon the New England colonies by the complications of European politics rather than any direct cause of quarrel between the contending parties,—had involved the province in great indebtedness, which was followed by the usual expedients of paper promises. The precious metals had entirely vanished, and the whole currency consisted of provincial bills, for which no redemption was provided. Within ten years, ending with 1728, their value had fallen one-half, and a prospect of further depreciation was in full view. None of these parties continue among us by their posterity at the present day, but their improvements are still visible, and their presence here added value to property, gave additional importance to our community, and they require a slight notice on this occasion.

Jonathan Belcher, the son of Andrew Belcher, a rich merchant of Boston, was born there in 1681. He was educated with care, and graduated at Harvard College in 1699. An exemplary youth, and the chief hope of his father, after leaving college he traveled abroad, and spent six years in visiting various parts of Europe, and during this time made the acquaintance of a young Hanoverian prince, who afterwards became king of England as George II., a circumstance which influenced Belcher's subsequent fortunes.¹ He came home, and busied himself in his father's mercantile operations. In 1706 he married the daughter of William Partridge, Lieutenant-Governor of the provinces of Massachusetts and New Hampshire, who then resided at Piscataqua, now Portsmouth. The newspapers contained a long description of the wedding. His father died in 1717, having been many years member of the Council, and Jonathan is immediately chosen to fill his place, inherits his fortune, and invests largely in lands in Western Massachusetts and Connecticut. About the year 1727 he purchased a considerable landed property here of Thomas Holman and Samuel Kinsley (the present Rowe estate). Soon after this he was sent to England, as agent of the province, to adjust several important matters. In his absence occurred the death of Governor Burnet, at Boston; and Belcher, being in London, obtained the appointment of Governor of Massachusetts, and arrived at Boston with his commission in 1730.² His administration continued eleven years, and needs no comment, as it is a part of the provincial history. He soon began his improvements here, built his house, and laid out his grounds, much under the supervision of Col. Samuel Swift, second son of Deacon Thomas Swift. His style of living differed very much from the ordinary mode of life here. His official position and fortune justified the maintenance of a large retinue of servants and equipages, and entertaining much company from abroad.³ His public duties prevented him from spending much time here, and the management of his property devolved mainly upon his son Andrew.

Governor Belcher was removed from his office in 1741, principally by the influence of a powerful party, known as the Land Bank projectors, whose schemes he opposed. He was afterwards appointed Governor of New Jersey, where he died, in 1756, after a service of ten or twelve years. He was the founder and promoter of Princeton University in that State, and President Burr preached his funeral sermon, wherein his virtues are highly exalted, and his valuable services in relation to the institution fully stated. His son Andrew continued in occupation of the family

² Governor Belcher seems to have had no dislike to a little parade, although he is usually described as a very humble Christian gentleman. He came from England in the "Blandford" frigate, his expected arrival having previously been announced, and great preparations made at Boston for his reception. Dr. Isaac Watts, the poet, an intimate friend of Belcher, wrote an ode of some ten verses on the occasion, which was printed in the News-Letter. I recollect two lines of them, which I saw in a newspaper many years ago.

³ In May, 1740, Governor Belcher's servant ran away, and was thus advertised:

"The Governour's Negro Juba having absented himself, it is desired whoever may find him would convey him home. He had on when he went away a Gold laced Hat, a Cinnamon coloured Coat, with large flat brass Buttons, and cuffed with red Cloth, a dark coloured Waste-coat edged with a worsted Lace, leather Breeches, yarn Stockings, a pair of trimmed Pumps, with a very large pair of flowered Brass Buckles."

property in Milton many years, and often represented the town in the Legislature; he died here in 1771.¹ In 1776 the Belcher house was burned. It was then occupied by the two Mrs. Belchers,—the Governor's widow, an elderly lady, and Andrew's widow, much younger,—both without children. They took refuge during the winter with their friend, Mrs. Forbes, then living at Brush Hill. Madam B. died soon after, and the younger lady returned to England. The estate then passed into the hands of John Rowe, Esq., a large capitalist of Boston.

Mr. William Foye bought his property here of the Daniels family, in 1728. He was a native of Boston, son of a Huguenot Frenchman, was about fifty years of age when he came here, and had before employed himself in commerce. About this time he was elected treasurer of the province, and filled that station during part of Governor Belcher's term. He died here about 1759, at an advanced age, leaving a widow and daughter, both of whom lived to a great age; also a son William, noticed among the college graduates. The daughter, Miss Elizabeth Foye, died here in 1807, in her ninetieth year. Dr. Samuel Gardiner, who practiced physic here before the Revolution, married Mr. Foye's granddaughter, Miss Mary Cooper.

Col. Joseph Gooch came to Milton, from Braintree, about the year 1740. He bought land of the Miller family, built the Churchill house on Milton Hill, and lived here some thirty years. The best account of him I have seen is in the diary of President John Adams (no friend of Gooch, certainly), being part of a letter written to Jonathan Mason. "Joseph Gooch," he writes, "a native, I believe, of Boston, had a considerable property, and was reputed to be very rich. He had been educated at the Temple, in England, and returned to Boston to practice law, but had very little success. He had been a man of pleasure, and bore the indelible marks of it on his face to the grave. He was extremely ambitious, and the Rev. Mr. Niles, of Braintree, who was well acquainted with him, told me he was the most passionate man he ever knew. Not succeeding much at the bar in Boston, he had recourse to religion to assist him; he joined the Old South Church, to avail himself of the influence of the sisterhood and set up for representative of the town of Boston, but failed; and disappointed of his hopes in law and politics, he renounced the city, came up to Braintree, hired a house, turned churchman, and set himself to intriguing for promotion, both in military and civil departments. He interceded with the favorites of Governor Shirley, in this place, to procure him the commission of colonel in the regiment of militia, and an election for representative of the town in the General Court. He promised to build a steeple to their church at his own expense. Assiduous importunity was employed with the Governor to procure him the command of the regiment, but this could not be obtained without cashiering the colonel then in possession. Col. John Quincy had been in public life from his early youth, had been nearly twenty years Speaker of the House, and many years member of the Council, and was as much esteemed and respected as any man in the Province. He was not only an experienced and venerated statesman, but a man of letters, taste, and sense. Governor Shirley was prevailed on, with great difficulty, to perform the operation of dismissing so faithful a servant of the public, and adopting one of so equivocal a character, and he said, some years afterwards, that nothing he had ever done in his administration had given him so much pain as removing so venerable a magistrate and officer as Col. Quincy. But the church party had insisted upon it so peremptorily that he could not avoid it,—probably he dreaded their remonstrances to the Archbishop of Canterbury. These facts were current at the time Gooch was appointed colonel and Quincy dismissed.

Thomas Hutchinson, the last provincial Governor of Massachusetts, was long an inhabitant of Milton, and, until the political storm which preceded the Revolution began, was held in great esteem by all his neighbors and friends here. He was the son of Col. Thomas Hutchinson, a rich merchant of Boston, of great liberality and public spirit, and many years of the Council. Thomas (2d) was born in 1711, was carefully educated, and graduated at Harvard in 1727. At first he employed himself in mercantile business, but soon wearied of this pursuit, and betook himself to the study of law and politics. He was first chosen a member of the House of Representatives in the year 1737, and selectman of Boston in 1738. About this time, 1739, his father died, leaving him an ample property. He had married Miss Margaret Sandford, of Newport, the year before. In 1740 he was employed to go to England upon public business relating to our currency. He continued to represent the town of Boston in the House nine years, during three of which he filled the Speaker's chair. He was distinguished for eloquence and industry in the House, and soon acquired extensive influence. He was chosen into the Council in 1750, and became judge of probate for Suffolk County. In 1760 he was appointed chief justice of the colony and Lieutenant-Governor. Governor Bernard left the colony in 1769, and the duties of Governor then devolved upon Mr. Hutchinson. He received the commission of Governor the following year, and held this office until 1774, when he embarked for England, leaving his native land forever.

He purchased, in 1743, of Joseph Belcher's heirs, one hundred acres of land on Milton Hill, and built the house now occupied by the Russell family, and resided there a large part of the time for thirty years. He was very fond of rural pursuits, especially gardening, and, being active in his habits, was often seen helping his gardener in removing plants and grafting trees, and his social habits led him into friendly relations with most of the inhabitants. After the mob invaded his house in Boston, in 1765, he spent most of his time here.

The greatest service Governor Hutchinson rendered to the public was in writing the "History of Massachusetts," which is the most reliable source of information on that subject existing, and will perpetuate his name long after his political errors have been forgotten. He had many active enemies among the leaders of the Revolution, who were never weary of representing his errors, and not seldom in amplifying them. He certainly staked everything on the losing side, was exiled from his native land, and his large property was confiscated. He died at Brompton, near London, before the war ended, aged sixty-nine years, and his numerous posterity are still living in England. His life was exemplary, and his private character unimpeachable.

Among his personal effects, confiscated and taken from his house on Milton Hill, which were conveyed to Col. Taylor's barn and sold publicly, were found a large mass of his private letters and papers, which were sold by the finder to the State of Massachusetts for fifty pounds, and now are bound in several large folio volumes at the State-House (said to been discovered by the purchaser of some feather beds, in which they were concealed).

Governor Hutchinson was accused of grasping and monopolizing public offices; but his nomination as chief justice was made at the solicitation of most of the prominent lawyers of the province, and his judicial career was highly successful, as he had, it was said, a remarkable power in clearly stating cases to the juries; and he actually refused, for some time, the commission of Governor, on account of the approaching troubles, and finally yielded to the solicitations of the ministry, who kept the place vacant, waiting his decision. I have a letter written by him from England, three years after he left here, wherein he says, "I have advantages here beyond most of the Americans, but I prefer natale solum to all other, and yet hope I may settle peaceably again at Unquety Hill. I hope to live to see not only my Milton neighbors, but the people of the province in general, convinced that I have ever sincerely aimed at their true interest, etc."

James Smith bought, in 1734, of the heirs of Samuel Trescott, George Sumner, and others, several tracts of land at Brush Hill, adjoining the Dorchester Church lands, and built his house (the same now occupied by J. M. Robbins), and made many expensive improvements. Smith was a large capitalist of Boston, at that time about forty-six years of age, and had made great additions to his fortune by the business of refining sugar. His sugar-house stood next below Brattle Street Church, in Boston, and was the building occupied by Dalrymple's regiment in 1769 and 1770, known in history as Smith's or Murray's barracks, whence Capt. Preston's company proceeded to State Street at the massacre of March 5th. He lived at Brush Hill most of the time for thirty-five years. He had no children. His wife, who survived him, was Miss Elizabeth Murray, a Scotch lady of the Philpauigh family in Selkirkshire. He died in 1769. Drake, in his "History of Boston," has the following notice: "On the 3d of August, Mr. James Smith died at his seat at Brush Hill, Milton, at the age of eighty-one; had been many years a sugar refiner in Boston, and his remains were brought into town and buried from the house of James Murray, Esq., in Queen Street." In the Boston Gazette of Feb. 4, 1769, is the following: "Last Thursday was married at Brush Hill (seat of James Smith, Esq.), in Milton, Rev. Jno. Forbes, of St. Augustine, to Miss Dolly Murray, daughter of Hon. James Murray, Esq., of Boston." Mr. Murray was the brother of Mrs. Smith, and resided some thirty years in Carolina as a planter, and was a member of the Council of that province. In 1765, having lost his wife and several children, he moved to Boston with his two surviving daughters, afterwards Mrs. Forbes and Mrs. E. H. Robbins. Murray became executor to Smith's will. Mr. Smith gave his whole property to his widow, who married Mr. Ralph Inman, of Cambridge, in 1771, on which occasion she gave her Milton property to her two nieces.

Oxenbridge Thatcher, Jr., who has already been alluded to, in speaking of his father, merits further notice. Born at Milton in 1720, he graduated at Harvard College in 1738, and studied law with Jeremiah Gridley, attorney-general of the province; established himself at Boston, and rose to distinction in his profession very soon. He was gentle in his manners, but very eloquent. He soon enlisted in politics, and was one of the early movers in the Revolutionary struggle, although his life ended before his views were realized. Mr. Adams, in describing the great case of Writs of Assistance, against the application of which Otis and Thatcher were engaged in 1761, says, "Then and there was the first scene of the first act of opposition to the arbitrary claims of Great Britain. Then and there the child Independence was born." Thatcher died of consumption, in 1765, at the early age of forty-five years.

Samuel Swift, second son of Col. Samuel Swift, of Milton, was born here in 1715; graduated at Cambridge in 1735, and many years practiced law in Boston. President Adams speaks of him often in his diary. He says, in 1766, "Spent the evening at Sam. Adams' very socially with brother Swift." Again, in 1812, in a letter to William Wirt, who was writing the life of Patrick Henry, he says, "Among the illustrious men who were agents in the Revolution must be remembered the name of Samuel Swift." He died at Boston, in 1775, I believe unmarried.

Nathaniel Tucker, youngest son of Capt. Samuel Tucker, of Scotch Woods, was born there in 1725, and graduated at Harvard in 1744. He studied for the ministry, and settled in New Jersey, where he married, and very early died, in 1748. He had a posthumous son, Nathaniel, born in 1748, who, with his mother, came to Massachusetts not long after. The widow became the wife of Samuel Davenport, of this town, and the son married a Miss Dalton, of Boston, and was the father of Richard D. and Nathaniel Tucker. He died here in 1776.

Seth Adams, the son of Edward Adams, Jr., was born here in 1713; graduated at Harvard in 1733, and died at his father's house in 1736, aged twenty-three years.

William Foye, Jr., son of Treasurer Foye, born at Boston in 1716, was graduated at Harvard in 1735, went to Nova Scotia before his father's death, where his relative, Jonathan Belcher, afterwards chief justice, was settled. He became colonel of militia, and provost-marshal of Halifax, which office he held twenty-two years. He died there in 1771.

Joseph Gooch, the only son of Col. Gooch, was born in 1728, and graduated in 1747. After his father's death, Dr. Pierce says, he moved to Vermont, where he devoted his life to agricultural pursuits, and died there in 1811, aged eighty-three.

Benjamin Pratt was born of humble parents, and after attaining adult age, by an accident lost his leg, which circumstance occasioned an entire change in his career. He applied himself to study, entered college at an advanced standing, and graduated in 1737. Robert Auchmuty, the eminent judge and admiralty lawyer, befriended him, instructed him in his profession, and gave him his daughter in marriage. He soon rose to eminence, and took the first rank in his profession. He figured in law and politics about twenty years in Massachusetts. John Adams, in describing the court before whom was argued the case of "Writs of Assistance," by Otis and Thatcher, thus describes Pratt: "In a corner of the room must be placed wit, sense, imagination, genius, pathos, reason, prudence, eloquence, learning, science, and immense reading, hung by the shoulders on two crutches, covered with a cloth great-coat, in the person of Mr. Pratt." He was nominated chief justice of New York, where his consummate ability secured him the esteem of all parties. He died there in 1763, aged fifty-four. In 1755 he purchased one hundred and fifty acres of land at Milton Hill, and erected the house recently taken down by Mr. Brooks. His short and busy life left little time to enjoy his Milton property. His only child, Isabella, married Samuel Welles, of Boston, whose family held the property some seventy years.

The latter half of the eighteenth century was a very eventful era of Massachusetts history, and the occurrences of that time essentially affected this town. It embraced the Seven Years' war, known with us as the old French war, ending in the treaty of Paris in 1763. Then followed the long agitation preceding the Revolution, which ended by the occurrence at Lexington, the Fort Sumter of the Revolution. Then the long and bloody struggle, which ended at the treaty of Versailles in 1783, acknowledging the national independence, followed by the period of exhaustion of five years, which preceded the adoption of the Constitution, when we finally took rank in the great family of civilized nations. During this period of thirty years the town added nothing to its material wealth and very little to its population, the whole increase not exceeding one hundred persons. There were also other causes for the stationary condition of the town. The province, which had from the beginning held large tracts of unoccupied lands in the western counties of Worcester, Hampshire, and Berkshire, made large grants to soldiers and to the heirs of those fallen in the Indian and French wars, and also large sales to speculators. These regions were filled up by men from the eastern towns. The aggregate population of the province showed a respectable increase, but not the eastern section. A frightful draft was made upon our population by the wars with the French. Massachusetts was regarded by England as a sort of Switzerland, where men were raised to fight the battles of others. Levies of five or six thousand soldiers upon a small population of two hundred thousand occurred every few years. Every one of the old families of this town will find some of their members among the victims of these struggles. When Governor Bernard called for a levy of six thousand men to accompany Lord Howe to Ticonderoga in 1758, a country representative is reported to have made this short speech: "Whenever an Englishman has his toe trodden on in France, Massachusetts must send half a dozen regiments to Canada to avenge the insult. I am heartily sick of this thing." On the same occasion a committee of the House reported: "The whole world knows the benefits derived to Great Britain from the loyalty of the Colonies, and from the efforts of this Province in particular, which, for more than a century past, has been wading in blood and laden with the expenses of repelling the common enemy, without which efforts Great Britain at this day would have no Colonies to defend." No coercion was requisite. More men offered on this occasion than were called for, Maj. Stephen Miller and others of this town among the number. The expedition was so popular that the province of Massachusetts erected a very costly marble monument in Westminster Abbey to Lord Howe, killed on the occasion. Massachusetts had also sent troops to the Spanish Main with Admiral Vernon, in 1741, to capture the city of Carthage, and also with the Earl of Albemarle to Cuba, to capture the city of Havana, in 1762.

The French war ends, and the whole domination of France is swept from this continent. The British colonies have now a little time to attend to their own concerns. Some few persons thought that the vigor exhibited by the colonies in the recent struggle showed that the child had attained adult age, and might set up for himself. It was not altogether the small stamp tax upon deeds and bills of exchange, nor three pence a pound duty on tea, that occasioned the discontent. There were deeper causes than these at work, although they furnished our orators with fine materials for agitation. A long list of grievances was embodied in the famous Suffolk Resolutions, adopted in a county convention holden at Milton, in the house of Daniel Vose, Sept. 9, 1774, said to have been drawn up by Dr. Joseph Warren.

The affair of Lexington, in April, 1775, put an end to oratory, arguments, and resolutions. Action is the word, and men and money are called for. Men enough are forthcoming, and the provincial treasurer can furnish paper promises without stint. Joseph Vose was chosen colonel of this district militia regiment in November, 1774. On the 27th of May, 1775, after the affair at Lexington, Col. Vose collects, in Milton and Dorchester, a posse of fifty or sixty men, rushes down the harbor and burns the light-house, destroying all the hay at Nantasket and on the islands, much to the annoyance of Gen. Gage, who, besides twelve regiments of soldiers, had some thousands of horses to feed in the town, entirely surrounded by provincial troops.

Col. Vose was soon appointed lieutenant-colonel in the Twenty-fifth (Grearson's) Regiment, employed in the siege of Boston till the evacuation of the town in March, 1776. He was then ordered to Canada, under Gen. Thomas, where the year was passed. In the spring of 1777 his regiment joined Washington's army in New Jersey. Col. Vose returned home sick, in charge of the surgeon's mate, and after some weeks, having entirely recovered, returned to the army, and was promoted to colonel of the regiment.

Col. Vose served faithfully all the war, was present at the siege of Yorktown and the surrender of Cornwallis, October, 1781, and in the corps of Lafayette, who writes to Washington in commendation of Col. Vose's services on this occasion. After the peace he returned home, exchanged the sword for the plowshare, and spent the long evening of his life upon his native farm.

Col. Vose had three brothers in the army. His younger brother, Elijah, attained the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and served during the war with credit. Moses and Bill were also employed in responsible stations. These gentlemen were all known to the elder members of the present community.

The military spirit of Col. Vose has been revived in the two succeeding generations of his family. Col. Josiah H. Vose, his youngest son, entered the United States army before the war of 1812, and after a creditable military career of thirty-four years, died in command of his regiment at New Orleans, in 1845, at the age of sixty-one years. Edwin Vose Sumner, son of Elisha and Nancy (Vose) Sumner, grandson of Col. Joseph Vose, was a major-general during the late rebellion; was born in 1796, spent his early youth in Milton, entered the army in 1819. He rendered brilliant service as a cavalry officer in Mexico, and was sent by government, in 1853-54, to visit all parts of Europe to collect military knowledge.

Job Sumner, son of Seth Sumner, of Brush Hill, was an undergraduate of Harvard College in 1775. When the operations of the university were disturbed by the presence of Washington's army at Cambridge, he laid aside his books and procured a lieutenant's commission in Col. Bond's regiment, and remained in the army through the war. He had attained the rank of major at the peace, and continued in the military service of the general government until his death, in 1794, which took place on board a packet-ship from Charleston to New York, where he was buried with much ceremony by the Freemasons, of which fraternity he was a prominent member, and also of the Cincinnati Society. A fine marble monument to his memory may be seen in Trinity churchyard, Broadway, New York. He was grandfather of the late Senator Sumner.

The whole number of persons in the town subject to military duty was less than two hundred, but the full quota of men was furnished during the whole war, and sometimes more.

Seventeen young men belonging to the town graduated at Harvard College during the last fifty years of the eighteenth century. They all became respectable men, and some of them distinguished.

John Miller, son of Samuel Miller, Jr., and Rebecca (Minot) Miller, of Milton; born at Milton in 1733; graduated at Harvard College in 1752; ordained minister of Brunswick, Me., 1762. He died on a visit to Boston, Jan. 25, 1789, traveling for his health.

Benjamin Wadsworth, son of Deacon Benjamin Wadsworth, of Milton, was born in 1750. He graduated at Harvard College in 1769, settled at Danvers in 1772, died in 1826, aged seventy-six; was in the ministry fifty-four years. His only daughter married Hon. John Ruggles, of Milton.

William Sandford Hutchinson, son of Governor T. Hutchinson, was born at Milton, June 30, 1752. He graduated at Harvard College in 1770, and died at Brompton, in England, Feb. 26, 1780, aged twenty-seven and a half years.

Josiah Badcock, son of Nathan Badcock, was born at Milton in 1752; graduated at Harvard in 1772; settled at Andover, N. H.; ordination in 1783; sermon by Rev. B. Wadsworth. Died in 1831. He retired from the desk twenty years before his death, and lived quietly on his farm.

Samuel Henshaw, son of Samuel, Jr., and Waitstill Henshaw, was born at Milton in 1754; graduated at Harvard College, 1773; married Sarah, daughter of Nathaniel Swift, 1777. His wife died in 1781, and he subsequently married a daughter of the Rev. John Hunt, of the Old South Church. Mr. Henshaw studied for the ministry at first, but relinquished that calling, and removed to Northampton about the close of the Revolution, and filled the office of judge of probate for Hampshire County many years, until his death, in 1809. He was a member, from Milton, of the convention which formed the Constitution of Massachusetts in 1779 and 1780.

Edward Hutchinson Robbins, eldest son of Rev. Nathaniel Robbins, was born at Milton, Feb. 19, 1758, where he passed his childhood. He was benefited by the instructions of Dr. Jeremy Belknap, who taught school at Milton two years after leaving college. He was partially fitted for college by Dr. Lemuel Hayward, who also kept a grammar school some time at Milton. He entered college in 1771, in his fourteenth year, and finished his collegiate course respectably in 1775, occupying a room with his townsman, Thomas Thatcher, afterwards minister of Dedham, with whom he continued an intimacy until the death of the latter in 1813. The last year of his college life was somewhat interrupted by the affairs at Lexington and Charlestown. After leaving college he kept school at Dorchester for a year. In 1776 he entered the office of John Sprague, Esq., of Lancaster, and commenced the study of the law. He remained a year at Lancaster, and in 1777 removed to Bridgewater, and continued his studies with Oakes Angier, then a distinguished practitioner. In 1779 he was admitted to the bar, and commenced practice at Milton. He was the same year elected to represent his native town in the convention which formed the Constitution of Massachusetts. He was the youngest member of this body, which contained nearly all the prominent men of the State, many of whom were his friends through much of his after-life. He continued the practice of law at Milton till 1785, during four years of which time he represented the town in the Legislature. He enjoyed the confidence of the community, and his professional business increased so much that he removed his office to Boston, where all the courts of law for this section were then held. In November, 1785, he married Miss Elizabeth Murray, who had been a resident of Milton for some years previously, and purchased the Gooc estate at Milton Hill, where he resided nearly twenty years, till he removed to Brush Hill in 1805, which became his residence for the remainder of his life. His habits were active, and he began to weary of the confinement of professional life, and soon employed himself much with other pursuits. He was among the early purchasers of the commonwealth's lands in Maine, and was much occupied in settling and improving the lands, a subject of great interest to him all his life. In 1792 he was again chosen to represent the town of Milton in the Legislature, and continued to be re-elected ten years in succession, in nine of which he occupied the Speaker's chair. How well he performed the duties and sustained the honor of that station is too well known to need any mention. His extraordinary exercise of memory and promptness in recollecting the persons and character of the members in the duties of appointment, his knowledge of parliamentary rules, and the local interests of the commonwealth, became proverbial, and were a great facility to the public business. During this period much of his time was employed in other public duties. He was one of the commissioners for building the State-House, also the State prison. In 1796 he was elected by the House to the United States Senate, but the county of Essex urged the necessity of a practical merchant for the place, and the Senate made choice of Mr. Goodhue, a merchant of Salem, whereupon Mr. Robbins at once withdrew his name. In 1802 he was induced to accept the nomination of Lieutenant-Governor with Governor Strong, with whom he had been much acquainted before. He was elected, and continued to fill the duties of this office till 1807, when the Democratic party came into power. He was frequently employed in the service of the State in responsible places, such as member of the Board of War in 1812, commissioner for treating with the Eastern Indians, and for the management of Eastern lands, and filled the place of judge of probate for Norfolk County some seventeen or eighteen years. He never sought public office, and never occupied any place of profit, but was often selected for places requiring judgment and integrity by the appointing power. He inherited a competent property, and faithfully executed many responsible trusts, but left no wealth behind. He belonged to the Federal school in politics, but was no zealous partisan; firm in opinion, prudent in action, endowed with strong love of the human race, never weary of serving others, and rather negligent of his own interests. Greatly esteemed by a very wide circle of friends, his opinion was much sought for and valued, and was always at the command of every one. His fine colloquial powers and social disposition rendered his society very attractive. He was the zealous friend of religion and education, long a member of the Milton Church and of various associations for the diffusion of gospel truths. To his personal efforts was mainly due the establishment of the academy in his native town. In his domestic relations the cheerful kindness of his nature was especially conspicuous. His death, which occurred Dec. 29, 1829, at the age of seventy-two, was greatly lamented by his friends and neighbors.

Rufus Badcock, son of George and Ruth Badcock, born at Milton in 1755; graduated at Harvard College in 1775. His death occurred in a Southern State, where he was employed in teaching, in 1793.

Thomas Thatcher, son of Oxenbridge Thatcher, was born at Milton in 1757, and graduated at Cambridge in 1775. He was settled at West Dedham, and died in 1813, aged fifty-six. He was an eccentric man, of studious habits, unmarried, lived a retired life within his own parish, and was somewhat occupied in teaching. He was a member of the State convention to discuss the United States Constitution. He and his colleague, Fisher Ames, represented Dedham. This instrument, now regarded as the sheet-anchor of our liberties, balanced in a state of uncertainty in the convention many weeks, and finally, in a House of three hundred and fifty-five, was adopted by the small majority of nineteen votes only.

Jesse Tucker, son of Jeremiah Tucker and his wife Mary (Wadsworth) Tucker, was born at Milton in 1758; graduated at Harvard College, 1778, and studied medicine with his kinsman, Dr. John Warren. He served with Capt. Manly as a surgeon in a public armed ship, was attacked by fever on the cruise, and put on shore at Newfoundland, where he died in December, 1779.

Jeremiah S. Boies, son of Capt. James Boies, of Milton, born in 1762; graduated at Harvard College, 1783; was occupied in his father's business of paper-making; married Miss Hannah Clark in 1785. His father died in 1798, aged ninety-six, and bequeathed a handsome estate to his son. Mr. Boies became one of the earliest cotton manufacturers of Massachusetts, having originated the company at Dorchester, which successfully conducted this business for more than forty years. Mr. Boies died at Boston in 1851, aged eighty-nine years.

Nathaniel Johnson Robbins, second son of Rev. Nathaniel Robbins, was born at Milton in 1766, and graduated at Harvard College in 1784. He occupied his short life in commercial pursuits, traveling much abroad, and died at Milton in 1799, aged thirty-three, from the effects of a liver disease contracted in the British West Indies. He was an agreeable, social person, and left a lasting impression upon the memory of many of his contemporaries, some of whom survived him forty or fifty years.

John Murray Forbes was the son of Rev. John Forbes, a Scotch clergyman, who was stationed at St. Augustine while the colony of Florida was in possession of the British government. Mr. Forbes, the father, was married at Milton in 1769, to Miss Dorothy Murray, the daughter of James Murray, Esq. J. Murray Forbes was born at St. Augustine, and came to Milton with his mother in 1773; was fitted for college by Dr. Samuel Kendall, of Weston; graduated in 1787 in the class with John Q. Adams and James Lloyd; studied law with John Sprague, of Lancaster, and Pliny Merriek, of Brookfield, and began his professional career at Northfield in 1791. Afterwards he moved to Boston, and, associated with C. P. Phelps, practiced law in 1794-95. He was employed to go to France on business in 1796, and spent most of his life abroad; received the appointment of consul to Hamburg, 1801; chargé d'affaires at Copenhagen, 1810; minister to Buenos Ayres, 1820, and remained there till his death, in 1831. He died unmarried. He was a gentleman of fine qualities, and his protracted residence in foreign countries was held a great privation by numerous friends at home.

Solomon Vose, son of Col. Joseph Vose, was born at Milton in 1768, and graduated at Harvard College in 1787; studied law with Hon. Levi Lincoln, of Worcester, and commenced practice at Northfield, Franklin Co., which town he frequently represented in the State Legislature, and in 1805 he removed to Augusta, Me., where he died, much respected, in 1809.

Roger Vose, son of Robert Vose, of Milton, born in 1763, and graduated at Harvard College; studied law, and settled at Walpole, N. H., where he was in practice many years. He served two terms as member of Congress from that district. His death occurred in 1841, when seventy-eight years of age.

Charles Pinckney Sumner, son of Job Sumner, was born at Milton in 1776; graduated at Harvard in 1796; studied law, and practiced his profession in Boston many years. He served fifteen or twenty years as sheriff of the county of Suffolk, and died in 1839, aged sixty-three. He delivered an eulogy upon the death of Washington, at Milton, Feb. 22, 1800, which was published by the town.

Her records are filled with the noble sentiments of her citizens, ever fired with the most patriotic ardor; ever ready to show their faith by their works, and to let their light shine before men. They were pioneers in the cause of freedom. Other communities might hesitate, the men of Milton never!

Turning to history's page, we find that upon Oct. 25, 1760, began the reign of George the Third.

"He was narrow-minded, self-willed, jealous of his royal prerogative, and envious of others' greatness, resenting all difference from his wishes on any public measure as a personal offense against the King."

June 9, 1756, war was declared against England by Louis XV. This war, called in European history the Seven Years' war, and known on this continent as the French and Indian war, ended Feb. 10, 1763.

March 10, 1764, Grenville, then Secretary of State, proposed to pay a portion of the expenses of the war then closed by taxation of the American colonies.

March 22, 1765, the Stamp Act was passed, imposing duties on all newspapers, every law paper, all ships' papers, property transfers, college diplomas, and marriage licenses.

October 24th of that year (1765) our forefathers assembled, and the following record of their doings on that day, we think, needs no further explanation:

"At a Town Meeting legally warned and held at Milton on thursday the 24th day of October 1765. 1st William Tucker Esq was chosen Moderator. 2ndly, the question was put whether the Town would instruct their present Representative respecting the Stamp Act, and it past in the affirmative. Voted: to choose a Committee to draw up instructions, Accordingly, Doct Sam^l Gardner Dea Benjamin Wadsworth, and Lieut Jazaniah Tucker, were chosen, who withdrew and after a short time returned with the following Instructions, which the Town Unanimously Accepted, and voted that they be recorded in the Towns book, and an Attested Copy thereof be by the Town Clerk delivered to Stephen Miller Esq. our present Representative."

"Instructions by the Freeholders and other Inhabitants of the Town of Milton, to Stephen Miller Esq. their present Representative."

"Sir: Being sensibly affected with the calamitous circumstances to which this Country must be soon reduced by the execution of the Stamp Act unless by some means relieved: we think proper in the present distressed conjunction of affairs to give you the following Instructions,

"1st That you promote and readily join in representing our Grievances to the King and Parliament in a suitable manner, and if Redress may be easily obtained it will be most acceptable to us; yet as the distress threatened must (if not prevented,) bring Slavery and Ruin, we expect you to promote and

WAR OF THE REVOLUTION.

BY H. B. MARTIN.

FEW are the towns in which can be gleaned more interesting history in regard to matters relating to the Revolutionary period than in the town of Milton.

join in any measures which may Relieve us, be the expense or consequences what it will. for if we had no dispute as to the justice of a tax where we are not Represented, the sum that even the Distributors of the Stamps would have for their trouble, according to the best calculation that has been made, would be insupportable for us to pay in addition to our Annual Expenses and the great Debts that we have contracted in the last War.—Now if we had been Represented in Parliament or could have even been heard by our Agent, we can't suppose that such an Immoderate Tax would have been laid on us, if it had been just to lay any: but if British Subjects in America are liable to be taxed otherwise than by their own Representatives, and may not be allowed Trial by their own Peers, which by this Act we understand is the case, they are as Distant from the Liberty of Englishmen as are the Slaves in Turkey.

"2dly. That you discountenance as far as lies in your power, the late horrible outrages that have been committed in the town of Boston, and that you use your utmost endeavors that the Offenders may be found out and brought to justice, and that restitution may be made by them and their Accomplices, if they have Estates sufficient, to the persons who have suffered by them. and we could wish that persons who desire to conceal such Offenders were obliged to make satisfaction in their stead, and if there are not Laws already Sufficient for Restraining such Disorderly persons we desire that you use your endeavors that Laws be made Sufficient for that purpose, so that all his Majesties Subjects in this Province, may have their Lives and properties secured, if they may be thought worth securing after the Stamp Act takes place.

"3dly. We expect that you Enquire by what Authority or whose advice it was that the Public money was appropriated for Raising Soldiers, without the consent and in absence of the General Court."

As has already been stated, March 22, 1765, the Stamp Act was passed; the courts were closed; in the town of Boston outrages and riots were instigated; sworn officials were subjected to great indignities, insulted in every way possible (some tarred and feathered, and hung in effigy); the mob sacked and destroyed private houses and pillaged them.

But the people of Milton were a law-abiding people, and, although they felt as deeply and keenly the wrongs and insults of Britain, they discountenanced all such disgraceful acts as these.

And so when in town-meeting assembled, on Oct. 22, 1766, their doings on that day amply testify to the high tone of the Milton of that period, and is a reminder to the people of to-day that a true man is ever considerate of others' welfare,—and if we had no other record, the one simple case here cited would stamp the men of Milton of 1766 as nature's noblemen, a title of far more worth than any ever bestowed by George III.

The record is as follows:

"At a Town Meeting legally warned and held at Milton, on Wednesday October 22nd 1766.

"1st Dea Benjamin Wadsworth was chosen Moderator.

"2^{dly}. The question was put whether the Town would give their Representative any Instructions, and it past in the Affirmative.

"3^{dly}. Voted to give him the following Instructions.

"Milton Oct 22nd 1766., At a meeting of the Freeholders, and other Inhabitants of the Town of Milton, qualified as the law directs: Voted: Whereas the Inhabitants of this Town have taken under consideration the clause in the warrant, respecting the sufferers in the Month of August 1765, in the Town of Boston.

"With the utmost Abhorrence of any such Unjustifiable Proceedings by persons unknown, committed on the property of divers of our fellow subjects, a loss too much for any Individuals to bear in Civil Society, and it not being in their power to prevent;—In Dutyfull respect to his Majesties Request, in Humanity and Generosity towards those Gentlemen who have suffered, that on the Application of such Sufferers to the General Assembly in a parliamentary way, the Representative of this town be directed in his best discretion to use his Influence that such Losses be made up and paid out of the Public Treasury, and that those persons who were Aiding and Assisting in Destroying the Property of Individuals in the Town of Boston, in the year 1765, Contrary to Law and Equity, should be brought to Justice, and Suffer accordingly."

August, 1768, the merchants and traders of Boston entered into an agreement not to import goods from Great Britain after Jan. 1, 1770, and made a further agreement, Oct. 17, 1769, that no goods should be sent from here till the revenue acts be repealed.

Consequently exports from England fell off to such an extent that English merchants were seriously injured. Lord North, perceiving this, proposed the removal of duties from all articles except tea.

Oct. 4, 1769, a town-meeting was held in Boston, when was promulgated that noted document prepared by Samuel Adams, entitled an "Appeal to the World," wherein he says, "We should yet be glad that the ancient and happy union between Great Britain and this country might be restored, but our rights are invaded, and until the Revenue Acts are All repealed, the cause of our just complaints cannot be removed."

March 12, 1770, in town-meeting assembled, the citizens of Milton, ever ready to uphold and sustain every measure for their country's welfare,

"Voted: that the Thanks of this Town be given to the Merchants and Gentlemen of the Town of Boston, who have exerted themselves in so Spirited a manner for the Preservation of the Liberties of America:—That this Town will Exert their Utmost Endeavor to Support those Gentlemen while exercising their feeble efforts, (so called by their Enemies) to Preserve the Liberties of this Province; That this Town will never Purchase of; or have any Communication with, those persons that Import goods contrary to the Agreement of Merchants of the Town of Boston, until they have given full Satisfaction to those merchants and gentlemen that they have treated with so much Indignity; That this Town will prevent, (to the utmost of their power) the use of India Tea, Discountenancing its use in any one (except where it may be thought necessary for Health,) until the Revenue Acts, so much and so justly complained of shall be Repealed."

1772. Parliament having enacted laws of such a sumptuary and arbitrary character, so repugnant to the people of the province, and contrary not only to the charter, but to the fundamental principles of common law, among which was one making the salaries of the Governor and the judges to depend upon a royal stipend, the inhabitants of the town of Boston held a town-meeting in the fall of that year (1772), and after passing resolves respecting the grievances under which they suffered, the patriot leader, Sam. Adams, stood up and made that celebrated motion which it was said "gave visible shape to the American revolution."

The record says,—

"It was then moved by Mr. Samuel Adams that a Committee of Correspondence be appointed to state the rights of the Colonists, and of this province in particular, as men and Christians, and as subjects; and to communicate and publish the same to the several towns, and to the world, as the sense of this town, with the infringements and violations thereof that have been made."

The motion passed by a nearly unanimous vote; a committee was appointed; the work to be done was divided between them; Adams was appointed to prepare a statement of the rights of the colonists; Warren, of the several violations of those rights; and Church was to draft a letter to the other towns.

Nov. 20, 1772, the committee, at a legal meeting in Faneuil Hall, presented their report. "The statement of rights, and of grievances, and the letter to the towns, were masterly presentations of the cause."

Committees of Correspondence were everywhere established. How the town of Milton upheld Samuel Adams and his noble confreres of the town of Boston the following records amply testify:

"At a meeting of the freeholders and other inhabitants of the town of Milton, on Monday, the 4th day of January, 1773: 1st, the town made choice of Capt. Lemuel Bent for their moderator; 2dly, voted, to adjourn the meeting to Friday, the 8th instant.

"At a town-meeting in Milton, upon adjournment on Friday, the 8th day of January, 1773, voted, to choose a committee of five men to draw up instructions to give their representative; accordingly, Mr. John Adams, Col. William Taylor, Dr. Samuel Gardner, Capt. David Rawson, and Mr. Daniel Vose were chosen for said purpose.

"Voted, to adjourn said meeting to Thursday, the 14th instant, to hear the report of said committee.

"At a town-meeting in Milton, upon adjournment from Friday, the 8th day of January, 1773, to Thursday, the 14th instant, the committee chosen on the 8th instant to draw up instructions to their representative report as follows, viz.:

"To Mr. JOSIAH HOW, REPRESENTATIVE FOR THE TOWN OF MILTON.

"Sir: We have heard read the Letter of Correspondence from the Town of Boston, with their proceedings, and find many Grievances there justly complained of; too many to be enumerated here; but recommend that Pamphlet to your perusal.

"Whoever seriously considers the conduct of Administration, both at home and here, can hardly Entertain a Doubt, that a plan is formed to subvert this Constitution: First, the British Parliament making an act to raise a Revenue without the consent of the people by themselves or their Representatives, is a Grievance of the first magnitude.

"Again: the great difference made between the trial of Subjects here and at home, in the 'Act for securing his Majesties dock yards, and other Naval stores,' is a very great Grievance.

"Again: the Crowns making the Governor, Independent of the people, has a natural tendency to Destroy that Harmony, which should always subsist between the three branches of the Legislature in a free state.

"Again: the making the Judges of the Superior Court, Dependent on the Crown, and independent of the people whose lives and fortunes are so much in their power, is a great grievance, naturally tending to subvert justice between the King and Subject.

"Sir: We Recommend to you that the Judges of the Superior Court have Salaries adequate to their merit and station, and that they be made as Independent as possible of the Crown and the people; and furthermore we recommend and Enjoin you, to use your Interest and Influence in the House of Representatives as far as is consistent with the Rights of this people, to Petition his Majesty, &c. to remove all Grievances we labor under, and in the mean time in all our Difficulties and distresses, we depend upon your steadiness, prudence and Firmness: and that you give not up one jot or tittle of our Rights, but dispute every Inch of ground with the Enemies of our Liberties and Freedom.

"MILTON Jan 14th 1773.

"By order of the Committee, JOHN ADAMS, Chairman."

"The question was put whether the town will accept this report as instructions to their representative, and it passed in the affirmative.

"Voted: That the Selectmen be a Committee to answer the Letter of Correspondence from the Committee of the Town of Boston.

"Voted: That the proceedings of the foregoing meetings be recorded in the Town Book.

"Recorded PR AMARIAH BLAKE, Town Clerk."

We now come to the year 1774; every peaceable method known or thought of had been tried to induce Great Britain to give the colonies their just rights; their love for the mother-country was still warm in their breasts; they hated the thought of separation; the glory of Britain was their glory, but they could not, would not, be her abject slaves. Still in their hearts lingered a remembrance of the Britain of the olden time, and a hope that justice might yet be done. And so the people of Milton once more met, resolved once again to try and obtain relief for the wrongs under which they suffered; once more in a lawful way to state their grievances and to seek redress; peaceably if possible, but with a determination redress to have, cost what it might.

And here is the record of their doings; a record which needs not the encomium of any man, for it is a record the masterly drawing of which it may truthfully be said that it may have been equaled, but never was excelled.

The reader will bear in mind that this Declaration of Independence promulgated by the men of Milton was drawn up in July, 1774, two years before that celebrated Declaration of the American Congress at Philadelphia, and two months previous to the passage of the famous "Suffolk Resolves," clearly showing, as was before stated, that in freedom's cause the men of Milton were pioneers.

"At a town-meeting legally warned and held in Milton on the 27th day of June, 1774.

"Mr. Ebenezer Tucker was chosen moderator.

"Voted: To choose a Committee of five persons to consider and determine upon some proper measures for this Town to come into respecting the situation of public affairs, and that said Committee be enjoined to set forthwith, and report as soon as may be.

"Voted: That said Committee be chosen by a written Vote: accordingly Capt David Rawson, Mr Ralph Houghton, Amariah Blake, Mr Oliver Vose, and Dea Joseph Clap were chosen as said Committee.

"Voted: That Mr Samuel Henshaw Jr. and Dr Gardner, be added to the above Committee."

"A paper was read wherein the late General Court recommend to this town to raise, collect, and pay to the Hon. Thomas Cushing, of Boston, the sum of £1 18s. 10d. as their proportion of the sum of five hundred pounds, according to the last province tax, to enable the committee for this province—who are to meet the committees from the other colonies to deliberate and determine upon proper measures to be by them recommended to the colonies for the recovery and establishment of their just rights and liberties, and the restoration of union and harmony between Great Britain and the colonies—to discharge the important trust to which they are appointed.

"Voted: To raise the sum of £3-0-0 by Contribution on the expected approaching Fast day for the above purpose."

After transacting various other business relating solely to town affairs, it was "Voted: That this meeting be adjourned to the 25th day of July next."

"At a town-meeting held by adjournment from the 27th day of June, 1774, to the 25th of the next July.

"The committee appointed at the last town-meeting to consider and determine upon some proper measures for this town to come into respecting the situation of public affairs, reported as follows, viz :

"We the Inhabitants of Milton, acknowledge George the Third to be our rightful Monarch; we feelingly Declare ourselves to be his true and loyal Subjects, and next to the Horrors of Slavery, we detest the thought of being separated from our Parent State: we have been wont to glory in our connexions with our Mother Country; our Hearts have been ever warm with filial affection, and we are ready and willing on all proper occasions to spend our Blood and Treasure in defence of his Majesties Crown and Dignity:—and we are Equally ready and willing to spend our ALL, in Defending our own religious and civil Liberties when invaded by any human Power;

"We have been taught from our Mothers breasts, that our Freedom is a Jewell of Inestimable Value; that 'one day, one hour, of Virtuous Liberty, is worth a whole Eternity of Bondage;' that Free Government supposes that the conduct of affairs may be enquired into, and spoken of with Freedom; that opposition in a loyal Regular way to measures which a person thinks wrong, cannot but be allowed in a free Government, for it is in itself Just, and also keeps up the spirit of Liberty,—

"Accordingly we claim a right, especially in times of Public Trial, freely to speak against and Zealously to oppose any Measures, by whomsoever adopted, which are aimed at the Destruction of our Constitutional Liberties; which alter our good and ancient Usages, and which are designed to make us Slaves, for such measures are base and wicked, and ought to be resisted.

"The Destruction of a free Constitution of Government though men see or fancy many defects in it, (whatever they design or pretend,) ought not to be thought of without horror, for the design is in itself unjust, since it is romantic to suppose it legal: it cannot be prosecuted without the most wicked means, nor accomplished but with the present ruin of Liberty, religious as well as civil, and whoever will thoroughly consider in what degree mankind are really influenced by reason, and in what degree by custom, may be convinced that the state of human affairs does not even admit an equivalent for the mischief of setting things afloat, and the dangers of parting with those Securities of Liberty which arise from regulation of long prescription and ancient usage.

"But in defiance of the Laws of God and society: in direct Violation of Sacred Compact, the British Parliament have assumed a power to alter and destroy our free Constitution of Civil Government, and to introduce any species of oppression whatever.

"Now that such pretended Omnipotency ought to be opposed, when assumed by any set of men, unless they have infinite Wisdom to direct, and infinite Goodness to stimulate them to a righteous conduct is a dictate of common-sense, and whether these are predicable of the present British Parliament let God's intelligent creation judge!—And being clearly of opinion that to withstand such Assumed Power, and to oppose in a regular way the Oppressive measures which are carrying into execution by such Power, is a Duty we owe to God, to ourselves, and to unborn millions;—

"We therefore RESOLVE, that we will unite with our Brethren, 'The Sons of Freedom in America,' in any proper measures that may be adopted to defeat the late cruel and oppressive Acts of the British Parliament respecting America, and this Distressed Province in particular: to extirpate the idea of Tyrannizing which is so fondly fostered in the bosoms of those in power, and to secure to ourselves and to Posterity our invaluable Rights and Privileges.

"A Non-Consumption Agreement, we think the most rational, as it is the most Peaceful, but as Committees from the several Colonies on this Continent are soon to meet and 'to deliberate and determine upon some wise and proper measures for the recovery and Establishment' of American Liberties; and as we doubt not but the Wisdom of America will fix upon such righteous measures as will Eventually prove not only the Salvation of this Extensive Continent, but also the Permanent Dignity of Great Britain,

"We therefore RESOLVE, to commit our cause under God, to them, and to adopt such Righteous measures as shall be by them recommended to the Colonies as necessary to regain and secure our free Constitution of Government.

"We wish them a seasonable and joyful meeting, and an happy union of sentiment: and may God Almighty direct and protect them.

"We return our sincere thanks to the Town of Boston for their indefatigable and noble Exertions in the cause of Freedom: and beg them still to watch upon the walls of our Jerusalem, and not to be weary in well doing.

"MILTON 25. July, 1774.

"DAVID RAWSON, RALPH HOUGHTON, AMARIAH BLAKE, OLIVER VOSE, JOSEPH CLAP, SAMUEL HENSHAW JR, SAM'L GARDNER, Committee.

"Voted: That said Report be read paragraph by paragraph, and the accepting or not accepting each paragraph to be put to vote separate; accordingly said report was read, and each and every paragraph was accepted.

"Voted: That Capt David Rawson, Col William Taylor, Dr Samuel Gardner, Amariah Blake, and Mr Ralph Houghton, be a Committee to correspond with the Committees of Correspondence in the Towns through this Province and through America, as occasion may require.

"Voted, That the Committee send a letter to the Committee of Correspondence for Boston, thanking them for their Public spirit, and noble Zeal for the weal of America.

"Voted, That the Town Clerk send an attested copy of the transactions of this Town respecting Public affairs to the Committee of Correspondence for Boston."

With this record the space in this work allotted to Milton is full, which we regret, as the next record in chronological order would be an account of the passage of the famous "Suffolk Resolves."

These resolves, drawn up and presented by Gen. Joseph Warren, were read several times, and unanimously adopted, paragraph by paragraph, at a convention of delegates of every town and district in the county of Suffolk (embracing at that time the territory now known as the county of Norfolk), held at the house of Mr. Daniel Vose, in Milton, on Sept. 9, 1774. They were forwarded to the Continental Congress then in session at Philadelphia, upon receipt of which, Sept. 18, 1774, they were then read, creating the wildest enthusiasm. (For copy of these resolves, see Frothingham's "Life of Warren.") Many other items of interest relating to Milton in the Revolutionary era could be adduced did space allow.

CHAPTER LXIV.

MILTON—(Continued.)

Ecclesiastical History—The First Congregational Society—The First Evangelical Society—The Second Evangelical Society—Lower Mills Baptist Church.

The First Congregational Society.¹—Two hundred years ago, on April 24, 1678, this church was formed. The town had been incorporated sixteen years before, in 1662. Two years after (1664), Robert Vose had deeded "eight acres of land for a meeting-house and other ministerial purposes, to eighteen trustees, probably every church member or freeman in the town," and eight years later (1672) a meeting-house had been built, during the incumbency of Rev. Thomas Mighill, of Rowley, whose eight years of service closed here in 1677, and he settled permanently at Scituate. That early church building,² of which no known trace remains, stood not far from here, near where Mr. William P. Blanchard now resides, corner of Centre Street and Vose's Lane. Previously to its erection, religious services had been held in the eastern part of the town, under the conduct of Rev. Joseph Emerson. The times were hard, the currency worse than it is to-day, and poor Mr. Emerson, not "passing rich" on fifty-three pounds—or one hundred and seventy-five dollars—a year,

² That this was not the first meeting-house erected in Milton appears from the following extract from the old town records:

"At a town meeting the last day of September 1670 it was agreed by the town vote that there should be a convenient meeting-house for the townes use built neare about Goodman Vose his loked barre, & also that the old meeting house should be repaired to meet in this Winter and Seargeant W^m. Blake, Seargeant Rob^t. Badcock, Seargeant Sam. Wadsworth, Thom Swift, Antony Golliford and Robert Tucker was chosen by the town to see the old house repaired as soon as they can and to geat the new one built in one yeers time if they can."

The following votes show how the cost of the new meeting-house was provided for: "Upon a training-day the 22^d of Oct. 1670 it was agreed by a vote of the Train Band and several other that were present that 6 acres of the Town Land should be Cleared of the Tim^r and wood to By nails & Glass for the new meeting-house."

The meeting-house was to be paid for by the proceeds of the wood from the above six acres. The town levied a rate of (fifty pounds) £50 towards the erection of the building. Each man could pay his share of that rate by cutting and hauling a portion of the wood to the town landing. Laid on the town landing it was reckoned at one shilling and three pence a cord! On Jan. 10, 1670/1, the town voted that if the 6 acres wood do not suffice to pay for the meeting-house, so much more shall be allowed out of the land "as will pay all the Rats for that building."

which his people were too poor to raise, "made shift to live without embarrassment" by being "passed about from one parishioner to another," until, after his marriage, difficulties arose, and, called to Mendon, he left the town in 1669. Not until the 24th of April, 1678, was a church organized. The "principal inhabitants were members of the Dorchester or Braintree Churches." But on that day, solemn services being held in the meeting-house at Dorchester, Governor Leverett being present, but the rain and snow keeping away many of the magistrates, "by the assistance of the elders and delegates from the churches of Boston, Weymouth, Braintree, and Dedham," this church was formed. Twelve men "of y^e Brethren of Milton w^h y^e chh was Gathered," of whom five were members of the Dorchester Church, one of the Second Church, Boston, one of the Weymouth Church, and five "admitted to covenant" at that time, joined themselves together there and united in the following covenant:

"We whose names are subscribed, being called of God to Joine ourselves together in Chh communion, from our hearts acknowledging our owne unworthynesse, of such a privileged, or of y^e Least of god's mercys, & likewise acknowledging our owne disability, to keep Covenant, with God, or to performe any spirituall duty, we hee calleth us unto, unlesse, y^e Lord Jesus doe inable, thereunto, by his spirit dwelling in us. Doe, In y^e name of Christ Jesus our Lord, & in trust & confidence of his free grace assisting us: Freely Covenant & bind our selues, solemnly, in y^e presence of God hims. his holy Angells, & all his servants here present, y^t wee will by his Grace assisting, Endeavour constantly to walk together as a right ordered, Congregation of Christ, according to all y^e holy rules of a Church body: rightly Established, so farre as wee doe already know it to be our duty; Or shall further understand it out of gods holy word: Promising first & aboue all, to give up ourselves & our ofspring unto y^e Lord, God father son, & Holy-Ghost, y^e only true and liueing God, & to Cleave unto him as our cheife & only Good, and unto our Lord Jesus Christ as our only Saviour, our Prophit, Preist & King, our spirituall head & Husband; & for y^e furthering of us to Keep y^e blessed Communion with God & his son Jesus Christ, & to grow up more fully herein, wee doe likewise promise, by his Grace Assisting us to Endeavour y^e Establishing, amongst ourselves of all his holy Ordinances, we hee hath appointed for his Chh here on Earth, & to Observe all & Every of y^m, in such sort, as shall bee most agreeable unto his will; Opposeing, unto y^e utmost of our chh power y^e Contrary. And lastly wee doe hereby Covenant & promise, to further unto y^e utmost of our power, y^e best spirituall good, of such other, & of all & Every One, y^t may become members of y^a Congregation, by mutuall Instruction, reprehension, Exhortation, Consolation, & spirituall watchfulnesse, over one another, for good; & to be subject in & for y^e Lord, to all y^e Administrations & Censures, of y^e Chh, soe far as y^e same shall be guides according to y^e Rules of gods most holy word in a way of order peace & vnion: with all promising to walk orderly in a way of fellowship, & Communion with all y^e Chhs of Christ among us according to Rule. y^t y^e Lord may be one & his name one in all y^e Chhs.

"This Covenant wee doe by solempne act of Chh Confederation Enter into, with full purpose of heart (as y^e Lord shall help us) to keep it forever, & where wee shall faile, y^er to waite upon our Lord Jesus, for healing & pardon for his Names sake."

The names to this covenant are Anthony Newton, member of Dorchester Church; Robert Tucker, member of Weymouth Church; William Blacke, member of Dorchester Church; Thomas Swift, member of Dorchester Church; George Sumner, member of Dorchester Church; Thomas Holman, admitted by covenant; Ebenezer Clap, member of Dorchester Church; Edward Blacke, member of Second Church, Boston; George Lion, admitted by covenant; James Tucker, admitted by covenant; Ephraim Tucker, admitted by covenant; Manassah Tucker, admitted by covenant.

For about two years they gathered around Rev. Samuel Mann, of Wrentham, driven thence by the Indian war, and afterwards returning to his people. Then came their own first minister, "the never-to-be-forgotten" Peter Thacher, of whom, fifty years later, Cotton Mather says, "The precious flock at Milton obtained this gift of our ascended Saviour." Six-and-forty years, from 1681 to 1727, he labored here, and "made his flight" hence to "the comfortable chambers" of God's "house of many mansions" in his seventy-seventh year. A man he was of uncommon gifts and acquirements, descendant and progenitor of a race of ministers,—“his grandfather was an eminent preacher at Old Sarum,”—and well fitted for the central position of influence assigned at that time in Massachusetts to the minister. He seems to have been physician to his people's bodies as well as to their souls, spending, says Cotton Mather, "in medicines, it may be some scores of pounds, and a great part of his yearly salary, which he freely bestowed upon the invalids among his people;" ay, it may be, on those of all the country around. He for years preached to the Indians at Punkapaug, "a monthly lecture, & furnished himself with skill in their Sesquipedalian language," says Cotton Mather, "that he might be able to do it." "On y^e Lord's days," says the same authority, "he fed his flock with two sermons. The manna was rained no less than twice in every Sabbath. He many years kept up a monthly lecture. He catechised as an Angel of the little ones. He neglected not the pastoral visits." "He often gave his presence at the private meetings of his neighbors, who met in course at one another's houses for agreeable devotions. Among these he took a special cognizance of, and had a special affection to, the societies of his dear YOUNG MEN, and always manifested a very great joy to see his children walking in the truth; and as great a care that they might none of them decline from good beginnings. He would sometimes go to them, and preach to them, as well as pray with them; and one of the sermons which he bestow'd upon them, they were at the expence of publishing, that they might enjoy it as their perpetual monitor. It is entitled 'THE PERPETUAL COVENANT.' What an interesting glimpse is here of the life of that young time! And it gives us no hint of the fireless churches, in which the long services of worship and fast, ordination and council, were held, sometimes lasting, especially those of ordination and installation, through a large part of the day,—no hint of the solitariness, rudeness, and danger of the ways through which the brave worshipers thronged to the house of public worship, on foot, on horseback; in wet weather, in ox-carts; on snow-shoes or sledges in winter; and whose very difficulty enhanced the sweetness and preciousness of the service and society of the house of God. Besides all which, he trained young men for college, not a few of whom made a mark in the history of New England. How he could stand it Mather answers by referring to his "travels" and "the exercise, than which the medicina gymnastica never prescribed a better. Thus, our ancient Peter held out so well, that even when he was old, he could gird himself, and go almost whither he would." So Peter Thacher lived and labored, in surroundings which perhaps the poorest of Milton's present dwellers would call hard, but so richly and faithfully that, as Cotton Mather says, he and his people "were so far from being weary of one another, that their mutual endearments were never stronger and more lively, than at the time when his death translated him to the upper chambers."

"Lamentable animosities & divisions,"¹ as this fine brave soul calls them, had caused him to hesitate about accepting the "unanimous, frequent & affectionate calls" which the Milton people gave him, and towards the close of his ministry they threatened to reappear. A new and larger meeting-house was needed, and where to put it was a disputed question,—not finally settled till after many town-meetings and votings running through seven years. The town no doubt had grown both in numbers and wealth. On the admission of his son to church-membership in 1715 he says, with a delicious unconscious parental exaggeration, "He is 176 members in full communion admitted by myself;"² among whom he had recorded "Peg my Indian servant (though now a free woman)." In 1724 he records "Hagar my negro woman." At the time of his death, twelve years later (1727), he had admitted two hundred and fifty-three. The Lord's Supper was administered by him for the first time here³ in 1681, June 19th, to "about fourscore communicants." This would imply a pretty large congregation. In the same period, on the other hand, he had "attended the departure of all the founders of the town," most of them long-lived men and bequeathing longevity to their children, and, better than that, a character and quality simple, strong, and serviceable. The new church was not built till the year after his death. It stood near the road, in front of the spot now occupied by this Milton Church. Its size was fifty feet by forty, and twenty-eight high, with a belfry, in which the town-meeting of April 3, 1729, voted to place "a bel" to weigh three and one-half hundred-weight "grose" (three hundred and ninety-two pounds), the expense to be raised by "supscription." The sound of that little "church-going bell" might well be as modest and diffident as that of the gentle and beloved parson John Taylor's voice, whose tones floated up into its vibrations. The town voted him liberty to cut timber in the ministerial land⁴—of which it had two hundred acres set apart for the support of the ministry, etc.—to build him a house; also that he shall have first choice of a place to build a pew for the ministry in the new meeting-house, and that his pew be built by the town. It was further voted that those who "draw pus shall sit in them themselves with so many of their family as conveniently can sit with them, and the rest of their family to be seated with the rest of the town." In that meeting-house Mr. Taylor labored through the most of his ministry. Ordained Nov. 13, 1728, he died Jan. 26, 1749-50, "after above twenty-one years eminent service in y^e ministerial office in y^e Town of Milton." His strength seems to have lain in his gentleness and worth rather than in self-assertion. A man apparently of real culture, by his contemporaries held "remarkable for his high rank in the republick of letters," he is described by Dr. Chauncy as "an agreeable, pleasant companion, and a friend that might be depended upon," but so shrinking that he would seldom preach from home, and would allow nothing of his to appear in print.

⁴ The town records of Oct. 21, 1728, contain a vote in town-meeting "that there should be wood cut in y^e land needful for fire at Mr. Taylor's ordination." For what purpose this fire does not appear, as the practice of heating churches was not yet.

² Milton Church Record, p. 6.

At his death Dr. Chauncy, by his orders, committed all his papers to the flames. Dr. Chauncy describes him as "rather an agreeable than a great man, rather pretty and delicate in his sentiments and expressions than strong and nervous. His head was clear, though not the strongest. Few were more universally beloved while they lived, and lamented when dead among those of their acquaintance."

During his ministry Deacon Manasseh Tucker, the last of the original twelve who founded the church, died, April 9, 1743. The church took the occasion, that earlier generation having passed away, on the sixty-fifth anniversary of its formation, to renew their "Cov^t with God & one another, which They did accordingly," says Parson Taylor, "April 24th, when the members of the C^h Male & Female manifested their Consent to their Fathers Cov^t by standing up while I read It over with a small Variation as the Change of Circumstances required."

About thirteen months after Mr. Taylor's death Mr. Nathaniel Robbins was ordained, Feb. 13, 1750-51. A long and honorable service was his,—running through four-and-forty years, closing with his death, May 19, 1795,—a period heaving with the agitations of the Revolution. Mr. Robbins was a patriot. At the battle of Lexington, fought when he was fifty years of age, two of his brothers were in Capt. Parker's company. He seems to have been eminently a man of affairs, and in 1788 was sent by the town to the convention which adopted the Federal Constitution. His practical wisdom showed itself in various ways. At his ordination a settlement of one thousand pounds old tenor—equal to five hundred dollars—was allowed him, and a salary of five hundred pounds, or two hundred and fifty dollars, per annum, and twenty-five cords of wood. But he bought land and built him a house and gradually acquired a considerable farm,—now owned by Col. H. S. Russell,—which doubtless was a faithful friend to him, as well as an abode of hospitality to many others in those distressful days. Then he showed rare tact and skill in adjusting apparently unmanageable disputes. In his preaching, says Thomas Thacher, "He refused to call any man master on earth, or to sacrifice truth to prevailing opinions, however conducive to popularity, to consideration, and consequence. Such candor and liberal principles were the more deserving of praise, since, in the first period of his ministry, such a spirit and temper were not common." So, in preaching, "plain and pathetick;" in prayer, apt and easy; in charity, so large and just that he would not allow even the good in bad men to be forgotten; in service to the unfortunate, the sick, the sorrowing, and the young, tender and faithful; is it wonder that he kept his church free from fanaticism and united and rational? How much he may have served to prepare for the changes that were to come when the Unitarian controversy broke out, we may imagine, though can never know.¹

In the latter part of his ministry the question of a new meeting-house again arose. Exactly why does not appear, for the town could hardly have recovered from the exhaustion of the Seven Years' war, the Revolution, and the long depression before the adoption of the Constitution. Indeed, in the thirty-two years ending with 1783, Mr. James M. Robbins says, Milton added nothing to its wealth and little to its population,—“the whole increase,” he says, “not exceeding one hundred persons.” In 1785 its population did not exceed twelve hundred persons, with two hundred and sixty-seven ratable polls. A town-meeting, however, voted, Oct. 3, 1785, to build a new meeting-house sixty-six by fifty-two feet,—that in which we meet to-day. Take sixteen feet off its length and twelve off its breadth, and you will get an idea of the surface dimensions of that older building, in which for seven-and-fifty years—a united church, the one church of Milton—our fathers worshiped. The cost was to be raised by selling the old church at auction, selling the pews in the new one, and assessing the balance on the polls and estates throughout the town. And two years were to be devoted to the building of the church. In six weeks (Nov. 14, 1785) the pews on the lower floor, sixty-two in number, were valued and sold. Valued at £904, they sold for £1191 2s.; £287 2s. being thus bid for a choice. The highest valuation set on a pew was £24; the lowest £11. The highest bid for a choice was £6 12s., by William Taylor; the lowest, £3 12s., by John Crehore, Jr., and John Marshall. Ten weeks later the twenty-four gallery pews were appraised and sold. Valued at £150,—the values ranging from £10 to £4,—they sold at £209 8s., the bids running from £1 10s. to £5 2s. above the valuation. The amount raised by these sales was £1400 10s., and this before ground was broken for the new church. Those simple-minded fathers of ours apparently did not believe in spending their money before they raised it. Is not that pretty good doctrine to build a church upon?

¹ During Parson Robbins' ministry Whitefield preached in Milton. His friends sought to get the meeting-house for him. But to this Mr. Robbins would not consent. Whitefield is reported to have said that "true religion would not flourish in Milton until they got a new minister." His preaching was held under the large tree which stood in front of the Foy house on Milton Hill, and which blew down in the memorable gale of 1857.

On May-day, 1787, they began to frame the house. June 19th they began to raise the frame. "And altho four days were Barely sufficient," says the record, "for accomplishing that important Difficult & Dangerous part of the Bussness yet as the Quantity of the Timber was Large and also very hevey as thare was No damage sustained or the most triffling accident hapned during the whol time these singular Circumstances were generally Considered as evident Tokens of the divin favour and supernatural Protection." December 31st the committee in charge of the building "were agreeably entertained with the Exhibition of very elligant clock Presented as a donation to the Town by Mr. Edward H. Robbins."¹

On the first day of the year 1788 the new church building was dedicated. It had cost seventeen hundred pounds,—five thousand six hundred dollars. The old church standing on the road was pulled down. Mr. Robbins, on occasion of the dedication, was furnished a new horse-hair wig and black gown. "In the spring," we are told, "every man in the parish brings a young elm-tree and plants it in the yard. The three Dutch elms before the door were brought from Brush Hill."² The building stood sideways to the road and faced southwest. It was open to the roof, had galleries around, and a pulpit high up on the west side, with sounding-board, according to the not always bad fashion of that time. Sixty years were to pass ere an organ's voice should here be heard.

Here the last eight years of Mr. Robbins' ministry centred. On his decease, in 1795, the church called Rev. John Pierce³ (June 19, 1796), afterwards the famous Dr. Pierce, of Brookline. But the town would not concur, and not till two and a half years after Mr. Robbins' death was a new minister, Rev. Joseph McKean, ordained here. Young, bright, eloquent, and from childhood of uncommon promise,—a promise which his young manhood's labors here did not disappoint,—he raised hopes for a long and excellent career. But a sharp attack of lung disease brought his ministry to an end, after seven years of service, in 1804. After his recovery, Harvard College welcomed him to the Professorship of Oratory that John Quincy Adams had held, which for ten years he filled acceptably, and whence he went to Havana, in 1818, to die, at the early age of forty-two.

In his theology Mr. McKean was not Calvinist but Arminian, preparing thus the way for the great change that was to come. But before naming his successor let us pause a moment to glance at the people whom this goodly succession of ministers served. Their story is largely

"The short and simple annals of the poor."

We know little of them beyond their names. But those names are a revelation. They are history of the best kind. They tell, if not of attainment, of, better yet, aspiration. How quaint and how religiously suggestive!—Mindwell Tucker, Preserved Lion, Silence Lion, Waitstill Williston, Charity Liscum, Experience Tolman, Deliverance Trot, Recompence Wadsworth, Freegift Cogshell, Comfort Foster, Submit Badcock, Hopestill Feild, Bethel Blair, Content Marah, Reform Knowlton, *Supply*⁴ Vose. Surely the people that of themselves run to names like these are such as will have "Religion in Common Life," if that be possible. They will not be empty and idle men or frivolous women. Indeed, "tramps" and idlers stood small chance of immunity at their hands. They builded ships and mills, and bridges and roads. In 1785, already seven mills kept the Neponset—at work,—one chocolate, one saw, one grist, one slitting, and three paper,—and orchards abounded, yield-the vote of the church in favor of inviting Mr. Pierce. And the weighty ground of Mr. Swift's opposition was that he did not like Mr. Pierce's stepmother.

⁴ I cannot forbear adding to this list of names that of "Role on God," which was given to a son of John Cotton. Its owner, I am informed, became minister of Sandwich, Mass. This, however, is not given as one of the Milton names.

A curious glance into the history of this class of names is afforded by an extract from the ancient record of the First Church of Dorchester. After mentioning that Wait Clap, daughter of Roger Clap, was baptized 24 1 mo 50,—i.e., March 24, 1650,—the record says: "Louetenant Clap declared y^e Reason why he called his child Wait was because he did suppose the Fall of antichrist was not Farre off."

² They were brought by Governor E. H. Robbins. There were originally four. The one nearest the southwest drive-way was blown down in the September gale of 1815. Like many other trees which shared its fate at that time, it was replaced, and it flourished for about twenty years. In 1835, however, when the meeting-house was turned round, as it showed signs of decay and obstructed one of the approaches to the church, it was cut down.

Of the other elms, more being offered than were required for the yard of the church, Mr. William Taylor took the remainder and planted them on the opposite side of the road in front of his land, where they remain "unto this present."

³ They who call the old times better than the new may find a grain of comfort in the following "little story." Dr. Pierce used to say, in his jovial fashion, that Mr. John Swift was the cause of his not coming to Milton. Being a man of influence, he made such a fuss in the town that the town refused to ratify ing ample supply of cider. But agriculture was the chief occupation, although even then the town began to develop the character which marks it to-day. Milton furnished her full quota to the Revolutionary war, and more. When Boston, in the severe winter of 1780, was so blocked by snow as to suffer for fuel, Milton farmers came to its relief with heavy supplies from the woods of Milton and Quincy, carried "by way of the river on the ice to Boston." And so they were "not slothful in business," because "fervent in spirit, serving the Lord." Honorable names in the pulpit, on the bench, in council, at the bar, in business, and in war arose among them, and of noble women not a few. Seventeen young men graduated from this town at Harvard College in the last half of the eighteenth century, all of whom proved "respectable," and "some of them distinguished." Thomas Thatcher, in his sermon on Mr. Nathaniel Robbins, 1795, says, "This town hath been celebrated for a pacifick temper and liberal sentiments, even from its first incorporation; so that in the course of one hundred and fifteen years I never heard of one ecclesiastical council being called, on account of any religious grievance."
